REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE to whom the FACTORIES and WORKSHOPS BILL was referred;—HAVE gone through the Bill, and made Amendments thereunto.

SPECIAL REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE to whom the FACTORIES and WORKSHOPS BILL was referred;—HAVE agreed to the following SPECIAL REPORT:—

THE attention of the Committee has been called to the operation of the Factory Extension Act and the Workshops Regulation Act, 1867, on persons professing the Jewish religion, and they are of opinion that the existing regulations bear hardly on that class of persons.

Your Committee, however, while recommending this subject to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government and Parliament, are not prepared to deal with this question in the Bill referred to them.

REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to Inquire and Report whether it is expedient that the CHARGES now locally imposed on the OCCUPIERS of RATEABLE PROPERTY should be divided between the OWNERS and OCCUPIERS, and what Changes in the Constitution of the Local Bodies now administering Rates should follow such Division;——HAVE considered the Matters to them referred, and have come to the following RESOLUTIONS, which they have agreed to Report to the House:

1. THAT your Committee, without pledging themselves to the view that all rates should be dealt with in the same manner, are of opinion:

(a.) That the existing system of local taxation, under which the exclusive charge of almost all rates leviable upon rateable property for current expenditure as well as for new objects and permanent works is placed by law upon the occupiers, while the owners are generally exempt from any direct or immediate contributions in respect of such rates, is contrary to sound policy.

(b.) That the evidence taken before your Committee shows that in many cases the burden of the rates, which are directly paid by the occupier, falls ultimately, either in part or wholly, upon the owner, who, nevertheless, has no share in their administration.

(c.) That in any reform in the existing system of local taxation, it is expedient to adjust the system of rating in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel an immediate interest in the increase or decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs.

(d.) That it is expedient to make owners as well as occupiers directly liable for a certain proportion of the rates.

(e.) That, subject to equitable arrangements as regards existing contracts, the rates should be collected, as at present, from the occupier (except in the case of small tenements, for which the landlord can now, by law, be rated), power being given to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, and provision being made to render persons having superior or intermediate interests liable to proportionate deductions from the rents received by them, as in the case of the income tax, with a like prohibition against agreements in contravention of the law.

2. That your Committee have examined many witnesses, and received at their hands very conflicting opinions as regards the proportion in which the burden of rates at present falls relatively on owners and occupiers.

3. That in the event of any division of rates between the owner and occupier, it is essential that such alterations should be made in the constitution of the bodies administering the rates as would secure a direct representation of the owners adequate to the immediate interest in local expenditure which they would thus have acquired.

4. That justices of the peace should no longer act ex officio as members of any local board in which such direct representation of owners has been secured.

5. That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities, even in the same area, on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense; and that, in any change of the law as regards local taxation, uniformity and simplicity of assessment and collection, as well as of economy of management, ought to be secured as far as possible.

6. That the consolidation into one rate of all local rates collected within the same area is a matter of great importance; and that your Committee concur in the Resolution of the Select Committee on Poor Rates Assessment, 1868, which recommended one consolidated rate, viz., "that a demand note should be left with each ratepayer on the rate being made, stating the amount of the requisitions, the rate in the pound for each purpose, and the period for which the rate is made, the rateable value of the premises, the amount of the rate thereon, and of each payment" of the instalments of the rates.

7. That whilst it is necessary to make provision for limiting, as far as practicable, the disturbance of existing contracts, it would be, on many grounds, undesirable, and almost impracticable, to extend the exemption of property held under leases from the operation of the proposed changes until the expiration of such leases.

8. That the exclusion of the owners of property held under long leases from the right of voting for local authorities, after the proposed changes had taken effect in respect of other property, would lead to much inconvenience and confusion, while, on the other hand, it would be inadmissible to allow them to vote unless they acquired an immediate interest in the rates.

9. That the difficulties of the case would be equitably met by exempting the owners of property held under lease from the proposed division of rates for a period of three years, and by providing that after the expiration of that time the occupiers of such property should be entitled, equally with all other occupiers, to deduct from the rent the proportionate part of the rates to which the owner may become liable, power being given to the owner at the same time to add to his rent a sum equivalent to the like proportionate part of the rates, calculated on the average annual amount of the rates paid by the occupier during the three years above referred to.

10. That by the terms of the reference to them, your Committee were limited to the question of the division of the charges on rateable property between the owners and occupiers, and what changes in the constitution of local bodies administering rates should follow such division; and they have consequently been precluded from entering upon the inquiry of the relations of local and imperial taxation, and the nature of the property liable to the same.

11. That your Committee are of opinion that the inquiry on which they have been engaged forms only one branch of the general question of local taxation, and that other considerations, besides those which have been submitted to their investigation, should be previously taken into account in any general measure giving effect to the above recommendations.

DRAFT REPORT proposed by the Chairman, read the first time, as follows:—

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to Inquire and Report whether it is expedient that the Charges now locally imposed on the Occupiers of Rateable Property should be divided between the Owners and Occupiers, and what Changes in the Constitution of the Local Bodies now administering Rates should follow such Division;——Have considered the Matter to them referred, and have agreed to the following REPORT:

"The general nature of the inquiry entrusted to your Committee is sufficiently indicated by the terms of the Resolution under which they were appointed; but it should be stated that it was an instruction to them to inquire further into the proper classification of rates, with a view to determine their proper incidence upon the owners or occupiers of rateable property.

"The principal points upon which your Committee have sought for and obtained information, are the following:

"(A.) The various kinds of local rates which are leviable.
"(B.) The purposes for which they are levied.
"(C.) The authorities by whom they are levied and expended.
"(D.) The manner in which those authorities are constituted.
"(E.) The persons by whom the several rates are paid.
"(F.) The difference in the scale of contribution; and
"(G.) The incidence of the rates, with respect to occupiers and owners generally.

"(A.) The various Rates Leviable.

"The following statement shows the principal rates levied for local purposes:—

"CLASS I.

"Rates levied in primary Districts, such as a Parish.

"1. The Poor Rate.
"2. The Highway Rate.
"3. The Burial Board Rate.
"4. The Lighting and Watching Rate.
"5. The General District Rate.
"6. The Sewerage Rate.
"7. The Towns Improvement Rates.
"8. The Animal Contagious Diseases Rate.
"9. The Church Rate.
"10. The Sewers Rate.
"11. The General Sewers Tax.
"12. The Drainage, Embankment, and Inclosure Rates.

CLASS II

"Rates Levied in Aggregate Districts, such as a County:

"1. The County Rates.
"2. The Hundred Rate.
"3. The Borough Rates.

Appendix, No. 6. "A complete list of the several local rates will be found appended to the evidence of Mr. Danby P. Fry.

"(B.) Purposes for which the Rates are Levied.

"The names of many of the rates mentioned in the foregoing statement show the chief purposes to which they are applicable; but with respect to some of them further explanation is required.

"In the first place it is important to distinguish between that portion of the poor rate which is applied specially for purposes connected with the relief of the poor, and the remaining portion which is devoted to paying the contribution required from the overseers for the county, borough, and other rates, totally unconnected with poor relief.

"It has long since been the practice of Parliament to provide for the levy, through the poor rate, of the sums required for many other local purposes, owing to the facilities afforded afforded for raising contributions in that manner. In the year ended Lady-day 1869, upwards of 4,000,000 l. sterling, out of the amount levied under the name of poor rate, were expended on other objects than the relief of the poor.

"The chief expenditure which the county rates are intended to cover may, as a rule, be taken to be that in respect of county bridges, gaols, and shire halls, county lunatic asylums and county police. But there are many other objects which, in the aggregate, form a large portion of the entire expenditure.

"The hundred rate is, as its name shows, limited to hundreds, and it is now only leviable for the purpose of making good damage to property in cases of riot.

"The borough rates are levied in municipal cities and boroughs in which the county justices have either no jurisdiction or a partial jurisdiction only; and they embrace, to a great extent, similar objects to those provided for by the county rates.

"The general district rate, which is levied by local boards under the Public Health and Local Government Acts, is applied in defraying the expenses of making and maintaining sewers and drains, public streets and highways, and various works of towns improvement; and the rates levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works and the several district boards in the metropolis are for the most part applied towards similar objects.

"The sewers rate is not, as its name would seem to imply, levied for the purposes of sewerage, as that term is now understood, but for works of drainage and embankment.

"A more detailed explanation of the purposes to which the several local rates are applied, is given in the statement handed in by Mr. Fry, and already referred to. Appendix, No. 6.

"(C.) Authorities by whom the Local Rates are Levied and Expended.

"It will be convenient to divide the principal local rates into two classes, for the purpose of distinguishing those levied by one authority and expended by another from those which are levied and expended by the same authority. The former may be termed precept rates.

"1. Precept Rates.

"The poor rate is made and assessed by the overseers, who are annually appointed by the justices; but only a small portion of the amount is expended by them or subject to their control. Poor Rate. 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1.

"The sums required by the guardians for the relief of the poor are contributed upon the orders of the guardians, which orders the overseers themselves have no alternative but to obey. 2 & 3 Vict. c. 84, s. 1.

"In like manner, the sums required for the county rate are paid over to the county treasurer by the overseers, sometimes directly, but generally through the Board of Guardians, upon the precepts of the county justices. A similar course is pursued with respect to the hundred rate. County Rate. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, s. 26. Hundred Rate.

"The borough rate also, whether paid out of the poor rate or levied as a separate rate, is paid over by the overseers upon the precept of the town council. Borough Rate. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 102.

"The highway rate in highway districts is paid by the overseers out of the poor rate, except in certain exceptional cases, when the rate is levied by the waywarden, and paid over by him on the precept of the highway board. Highway Rate in highway districts. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101, ss. 33, 34.

"The burial board rate is paid by the overseers, on the certificate of the burial board, in those cases where the board is elected under the Burial Acts. In other cases it is either collected as a separate rate, or paid out of the general rate of the authority acting as the burial board. Burial Board Rate. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, s. 7. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 22. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 64, ss. 1, 2.

"The lighting and watching rate is levied in parishes which have adopted the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90. Lighting and Watching Rate. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90.

"The expenditure under this Act is under the control of inspectors appointed by the ratepayers, subject to the restriction that a limit is annually fixed by the ratepayers, beyond which no expenditure can be incurred. The amount necessary to meet the expenditure is raised by the overseers, who, upon the order of the inspectors, levy a separate rate for the purpose.

"The library and museum rate, and the baths and washhouses rate, are sometimes paid out of the borough rate, which is itself a precept rate, and sometimes assessed separately as precept rates. In other cases they are paid out of the general rate of Improvements Commissioners, or other local boards, and in some instances they are levied by the authority directly entrusted with their expenditure. Library and Museum Rates. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 70, s. 15. 29 & 30 Vict. c. 114, s. 2. Baths and Washhouses Rate. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 94, ss. 16, 17.

"The following rates also come within the category of precept rates; viz.— Metropolitan Rates.

"(a.) The consolidated rate of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

"(b.) Rates for defraying the expenses of district boards and vestries under the Metropolis Local Management Act.

"(c.) The metropolitan police rate.

18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 172.

"The consolidated rate of the Metropolitan Board of Works is contributed upon the precept of the board by the several district boards and vestries in the metropolis, who in their turn obtain the sums required by them both for this rate and the rates expended by themselves by precepts addressed to the overseers. In the case of the City of London, the precept for the consolidated rate of the Metropolitan Board of Works is addressed to the Chamberlain of the City of London, and special provision is made for the assessment and collection of the rate in places where no poor rate is levied.

10 Geo. 4, c. 44. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 2, s. 1.

"The metropolitan police rate is paid by the overseers upon the warrant of the Chief Commissioner of Police.

2. Rates other than Precept Rates.

Highway Rate in separate parishes. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 27.

"The highway rate, when levied in parishes not within a highway district, is made and assessed by the surveyor of highways, who is annually appointed by the vestry. The vestry, however, do not appear to have any direct control over the expenditure, and the only checks upon the surveyor are his annual appointment, and the power which the justices possess of disallowing improper items in his accounts.

The Church Rate.

"The church rate, which no longer exists as a compulsory rate, except where it is continued for the purposes of liquidating existing charges, is made and collected by the churchwardens upon the resolution of the vestry.

Sewers Rate. 23 Hen. 8, c. 5. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22. 4 & 5 Vict. c. 45.

"The sewers rate and the general sewers tax are levied by the Commissioners of Sewers appointed under the 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, and are collected by officers specially appointed by the Commissioners.

Drainage, Embankment, and Inclosure Rates.

"Drainage, embankment, and inclosure rates are levied and expended under various Local Acts by the local authorities constituted by those Acts.

General District Rate.

"The general district rate is levied by local boards constituted under the Public Health Act and the Local Government Act.

Towns Improvement Rates.

"The towns improvement rates, in like manner, are levied by Improvement Commissioners appointed under various Local Acts, and the Towns Improvement and Police Clauses Act (1847), where those Acts have been adopted.

"(D.) The Manner in which the Authorities expending the Local Rates are constituted.

Boards of Guardians. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 38.

"The largest item of local taxation is that for purposes connected with poor relief, which amounted in 1869 to 7,700,000 l. The local authority entrusted with this expenditure is the board of guardians, composed partly of ex officio and partly of elected members. The ex officio guardians consist of the justices of the peace resident within the union, and acting for the county, riding, or division within which the union is situate; and the elected guardians consist of a certain number of ratepayers, elected by the owners and occupiers of rateable property within the several parishes of each union.

"The number of elected guardians for each union is regulated by the orders of the Poor Law Board; but the law requires that there should be at least one guardian for each parish, except in the case of certain small parishes, two or more of which may be united for the purposes of election.

31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 6.

"The qualification of the elected guardians consists in being rated to the poor rate of some parish or parishes in the union upon a rateable value, to be determined by the Poor Law Board, who are, however, prohibited from requiring in any case a qualification exceeding the rateable value of 40 l. The votes are given in writing by voting papers, and the scale of voting for both owners and occupiers is as follows:

7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 14.

"If the rateable value of the property is—

Less than 50 l.	1 vote.

s. 15.

"Owners may vote by proxy, but no owner can vote without sending in a claim previously, and, in the case of parishes having a population exceeding 2,000 persons, a register is required to be provided for owners and proxies, and the clerk to the guardians is authorised to hear and determine any objections which may be made to the names of the persons upon it.

Highway Board.

"The highway board, like a board of guardians, is composed of ex officio and elected members.

25 & 26 Vict. s. 61.

"The ex officio members consist of the justices of the peace acting for the county and residing within the highway district, or in an adjoining district under a local board; but no no justice of the peace can be a member of more than one highway board in the same county.

"The elected members consist of waywardens chosen annually for the several parishes within the district. The number of waywardens, when more than one, for each parish is determined by order of the justices. The qualification of a waywarden, which is similar to that which would have been required for the surveyor of highways for the parish, if the Highway Act of 1862 had not been passed, consists in his having an estate in lands within the parish, of the yearly value of 10 l., or possessing personal estate of the value of 100 l., or being an occupier of premises of the yearly value of 20 l. or upwards. 5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50.

"The waywardens are elected by the vestry. The persons who have a right to vote in vestry are the ratepayers, and every ratepayer assessed upon an annual rent, or value of 50 l. and upwards, is entitled to one vote for every 25 l. of annual rent or value upon which he is assessed; but no person is entitled to more than six votes. 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 3

"It will be seen that this scale of voting is quite different from that in the election of boards of guardians.

"Owners, as such, have no right to vote in vestry.

"Burial boards, when elected under the Burial Acts, consist exclusively of members appointed by the ratepayers in vestry. Burial Boards.

"The qualification for a member of the board consists in being a ratepayer of the parish, with the single exception that the incumbent of the parish is eligible, although he may not be a ratepayer. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87.

"Ratepayers voting in the election of the members of a burial board are entitled to a plurality of votes, as in the election of waywardens under the Highway Acts; but owners of property have no voice in the election of the board.

"The number of inspectors under the Lighting and Watching Act must not be more than 12, nor less than three. Inspectors under the Lighting and Watching Act.

"In order to qualify persons for the office, it is necessary that they should be resident in the parish, and be rated upon an annual value of 15 l. or upwards. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90.

"They are elected by the ratepayers; but there is no plurality of voting at their election, and owners of property, as such, have no right to vote; one-third of the inspectors so elected go out of office every year.

"When local boards are constituted under the Public Health Act or the Local Government Act, the members are elected by the ratepayers and owners of property within the district. Plurality of voting is allowed upon the following scale: Local Boards. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98.

"If the property in respect of which the voter is qualified is rated at less than 50 l. he has	-	-	-	1 vote.
"If rated at 50 l. and less than		100 l.	-	2 votes.

"The votes are given in writing and collected by voting papers.

"The qualification required for members of a local board under the Public Health Act, is that they should possess real or personal estate of a value to be fixed by Order in Council or provisional order, or to be rated upon an annual value to be fixed in like manner; but in the case of the qualification by estate, the value required must not exceed 1,000 l., and the rating qualification must not exceed 30 l.

"The Local Government Act fixes the qualification of members of the local board. In districts with less than 200,000 inhabitants, they must possess real or personal estate to the value of 500 l., or be rated on an annual value of 15 l.; and in districts containing 2,000 inhabitants and upwards, the property qualification is 1,000 l., and the rating qualification 30 l.

"The constitution of the various boards acting as towns improvement commissioners is regulated by the Local Acts under which they derive their authority, and both the qualification of the members and the mode of their election vary in different localities. Towns Improvement Commissioners.

"The authorities who control the expenditure of the rates levied for sanitary purposes and works of towns improvement in the metropolis are the Metropolitan Board of Works and the several district boards and vestries, elected under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act. Metropolitan Boards and Vestries.

The vestrymen are elected by the ratepayers, and the members of the district board are elected by the vestries of the parishes comprised within the district. The members of the Metropolitan Board of Works are elected by the district boards, in those cases where parishes are united into districts, and where they are not so united, by the vestries. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.

"The qualification of vestrymen consists in being rated to, and occupying, premises within the parish of the annual value of 40 l., except in parishes where the assessments, to the amount of 40 l., do not constitute one-sixth of the whole number, and in that case the rating qualification is reduced to 25 l.

"The mode of election is by ballot; and the Act expressly provides that 'each ratepayer shall have one vote and no more.' Owners are not entitled to vote as such in the election of the vestries.

23 Hen. 8, c. 5.

"Commissioners of Sewers are appointed under the 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, which enacts that Commissions of Sewers shall be directed, in all parts within this realm from time to time, where and when need shall require, 'to such substantial and indifferent persons as shall be named by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Treasurer of England, and the two Chief Justices for the time being, or by three of them, whereof the Lord Chancellor to be one.'

3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22.

"The qualification of Commissioner consists in his being the owner of land of a certain specified value in the county for which he acts, or in an adjoining county. In certain cases also the heir apparent of a landowner, or the agent of a corporation, or of a Commissioner, who may be absent, may be appointed to act. The person contributing to the rates which the Commissioners levy have no control whatever over the expenditure.

Drainage, Embankment, and Inclosure Commissioners.

"The various local authorities known as Drainage, Embankment, or Inclosure Commissioners are constituted under numerous Local Acts; and, as in the case of Improvement Commissioners, the mode of their appointment varies in different localities.

Courts of General or Quarter Sessions in counties.

"The Justices of the Peace for the county, assembled in general or quarter sessions, are the authority for assessing the county rate, and the control of its expenditure is vested absolutely in them.

"The ratepayers, who consist exclusively of occupiers, have no voice in their appointment.

Town Councils.

"The borough rate is imposed by the town council.

5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 28.

"The qualification for a town councillor is that he should be seised or possessed of real and personal estate, or both, to the following amount: In boroughs divided into four or more wards, to the amount of 1,000 l., or be rated upon an annual value of not less than 30 l., and in boroughs divided into less than four wards, or not divided into wards, to the amount of 500 l., to be rated upon an annual value of not less than 15 l.

32 & 33 Vict. c. 55.

"The members of the town council are elected by the rated occupiers whose names appear upon the burgess roll, and every person residing within the borough, or within seven miles of it, who has occupied for one year any house or warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building, and paid, either through himself or his landlord, the rates upon the property for a prescribed period, is entitled to be registered as a burgess.

"Owners of property, as such, have no voice in the representation, and there is no plurality of voting.

"In those cases where the Public Health Act or the Local Government Act is in force in a borough, the municipal boundaries of which are conterminous with those of the districts formed under either of those Acts, the town council is constituted the local board also; and in those cases where the district of the local board is more extensive than the municipal borough, the outlying places elect representatives under the provisions of the Public Health Act or the Local Government Act, as the case may be, who are added to a certain number of persons selected by the town council from their own body.

"It will be seen from the foregoing short description of the principal rating authorities, that in almost every case they differ from each other in one or more of the following respects, viz., the qualification required for their members, their election or mode of appointment, the composition of the constituent body, the number of votes which they may give, and the mode in which their votes are to be taken.

"For guardians of the poor and for inspectors under the Lighting and Watching Act, a rating qualification is required, but of a different amount; whilst it is sufficient for the members of a burial board if they are rated at any amount however small.

"For members of highway boards, local boards under the Public Health Act or Local Government Act, and for town councils, the qualification may either be in respect of ownership or of rating; the amount varying in each case.

"The element of rating does not enter into the qualification for Commissioners of Sewers, who must be owners of land, or the heirs apparent, or agents of owners of land of a stated value.

"In the case of the county rate assessed by the county justices, and the sewers rate levied by the Commissioners of Sewers, the ratepayers have no voice in the appointment of the authority levying the rate, or in the control of its expenditure.

"In

"In some instances, as in the case of boards of guardians and highway boards, a part only of the local authority assessing and expending the rates is elected by the ratepayers, whilst in other instances all the members of the board are elected by them.

"In the election of some of the rating authorities the owners as well as the occupiers participate in the franchise, whilst in the election of the others the occupiers alone are entitled to vote.

"In some cases there is plurality of voting, and in others no such privilege exists.

"Where a municipal corporation is the local board under the Public Health or Local Governments Acts, the rating authority is elected by the occupiers, who are entitled to a single vote only; but when the local board is elected under either of the same Acts, the owners vote as well as the occupiers, and both classes enjoy a plurality of votes. Where the local board consists partly of the town council and partly of members representing outlying districts, one section of the board is elected by the town council from amongst themselves, and the other by both owners and occupiers in the manner lastly described. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 12.

"In some cases the election is by voting papers, and in others vivâ voce; whilst in the instance of the metropolitan vestries the votes are taken by ballot.

"(E.) The Persons by whom the several Rates are paid.

"The poor rate is paid direct by the occupier, except in those cases where, under the Assessed Rates Act of 1869, the owner is rated by resolution of vestry, or agrees to pay the rates instead of the occupier; but under the provisions of the same Act, occupiers for a term not exceeding three months, are authorised to deduct the poor rates paid by them from the rent payable by them to the owner.

"The same system, of course, governs all those precept rates which are contributed out of the poor rate.

"The highway rate, when collected separately, is paid by the occupier, except where the owner is rated, or compounds under the Small Tenements Rating Act, which is still in force with respect to the highway rate. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99.

"In the case of the animal contagious diseases rate, the occupier may, as regards compensation for slaughtered animals and the repayment of loans and interest, deduct one-half of the amount from his rent. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70.

"The sewers rate, levied by Commissioners of Sewers, is assessable upon the owner and occupier, according to their respective interests; but it would appear that the tenant has no right to deduct from the owner any portion of the rate assessed upon the occupier in respect of his own interest.

"The general sewers tax is paid exclusively by the occupier.

"The lighting and watching rate is paid in like manner.

"The general district rate also is paid by the occupier, except in the case of small tenements, where the owner may be rated instead of the occupier; and with respect to private improvement rates under the Public Health Act and the Local Government Act, the occupier is entitled to deduct three-fourths of the rate from the owner, and the whole rate is chargeable upon the owner whilst the premises continue unoccupied.

"Somewhat similar provisions are contained in the Towns Improvement Clauses Act.

"With the exceptions before specified, all rates imposed by general Acts are paid by the occupier.

"(F.) The Different Scales of Contribution.

"As a general rule, all rates are levied upon the full rateable value of the property; but there are some exceptions to this rule, which may be here noticed.

"In the lighting and watching rate, the assessment upon houses, buildings, and property other than land, is 'three times greater' than that upon land.

"In the general district rate, land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and land covered with water, or used only as a canal, or towing path, or as a railway, and also tithes, are assessed at one-fourth part only of their rateable value.

"In like manner, in the public library and museum rate, lands used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, or market gardens, or nursery grounds, are assessed at one-fourth only of the assessment on other property.

"The sewers rate, raised under the Metropolis Local Management Act, is, as regards land, assessed and levied in the proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value.

"Where the owners of small tenements are rated to the highway rates, under the Small Tenements Rating Act, the assessment is made upon three-fourths of the rateable value; and if they agree to compound for the rates, the assessment may be reduced to one-half. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99.

"If the owners of small tenements agree, in conformity with the provisions of the Assessed Rates Act, to pay the poor rates, the overseers may allow to them a commission not exceeding 25 per cent. on the amount. If the owners are rated under the same Act, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41.

they are entitled to a deduction of 15 per cent. from the amount of the rate; and if they agree to compound for the rates, they are entitled to a further reduction of 15 per cent.

"Under the Public Health Act and Local Government Acts, local boards may compound with the owners of small tenements for the payment of the general district rates upon a reduced estimate, not being less than two-thirds or more than four-fifths of the net annual value at which the premises are assessed.

"Not only is the scale of allowance different under each of the three Acts lastly referred to, but the limit of value at which the owner may be rated or may compound for the rates varies in each case. In the Small Tenements Act the limit is 6 l.; in the Assessed Rates Act it is 8 l., except in the case of the Metropolis and two or three other large towns, where it is higher; and in the Public Health Act the limit is 10 l.

"It will be observed from the foregoing enumeration of the various local rates and the authorities by whom they are levied, that all local rates, with very rare exceptions, are charged upon the occupier, and not upon the owner; and that owners, as a class, have scarcely any direct representation on the various boards administering local affairs.

"Three questions naturally suggested themselves to your Committee, on a review of this state of things, in connection with the subjects referred to your Committee:—

"1. How far are owners exempt from local burdens?

"2. If, in fact, they are not exempt, and do indirectly pay a portion or all of the rates, how far is it just to them that they have no representation in the administration of the funds to which they contribute?

"3. Apart from the question as to the interests and claims of the owners, how far is the severance of owners, as a class, from the administration of local affairs injurious to the public interest?

"(G.) The Incidence of the Local Rates.

"The question as to the incidence of rates, as between owners and occupiers, has engaged the careful attention of your Committee. Irrespective of the third question suggested above, as to the public policy involved in the non-representation of owners in local bodies, it is clear that the expediency of a division of rates between owners and occupiers can be approached from two different points of view.

"There can be no doubt whatever that a portion of the rates does ultimately fall upon the owner; what is in dispute is, the amount which falls upon the occupier. It is held by some that all rates ultimately fall upon the owner; by others, that a large portion is borne, in fact as well as in form, by the occupier.

"On the first of these suppositions, that all rates ultimately fall upon the owner, it might be held that a re-adjustment of the system of local rating, by which a portion of the rates would be directly charged upon the owner, would from the pecuniary point of view make no difference to the occupier, as in any case the owner ultimately pays all. But on this supposition the division of rates may clearly be advocated, if not in the interest of the occupier, yet in the interest of the owner, in order to give him a "locus standi" in the administration of the rates, which at present, as not being a direct ratepayer, he does not possess.

"On the second supposition, that a portion of the rates remains as a burden on the occupier, it might be held that the present practice of charging them by law in the first instance upon the occupier, causes that portion to be larger than is just or expedient, and puts him to a disadvantage by forcing the initiative upon him of asking for a reduction of rent to compensate for increased rates. A division of the rates might accordingly be advocated in order to re-adjust the burdens between owner and occupier, with a view to relieve the latter from any disproportionate share in the risks or burdens of local taxation, to which it might be found that he is now exposed.

"In other words, the division of rates between owners and occupiers might be recommended, either on financial or on administrative grounds, or on both.

"As regards the proportion in which the burden of rates falls respectively on owners and occupiers, your Committee have examined many witnesses, and received at their hands many conflicting opinions. The point in dispute is the degree to which an increase of rates leads to a diminution of rent; that is to say, the degree to which occupiers are able to throw off upon the owners the increase in the local burdens to which, all rates being charged upon them, they are in the first instance exposed.

"It appears to your Committee that though the actual facts in particular cases scarcely admit of any positive proof, owing to the many counteracting influences which affect the amount of rents which occupiers would be prepared to pay, some definite principles are manifestly discernible which hold good as general laws.

"The question is too intricate to be discussed at length in this Report; but the importance of ascertaining, as far as practicable, how far it may be held that the owners of rateable properties, the occupiers of farms, and the inhabitants of houses, are respectively interested interested in the large amount annually levied for local purposes, renders it desirable to enumerate some of the main features of the case.

"It is important, in the first instance, to make certain distinctions the neglect of which has led to much confusion.

"Distinctions should be made—

"1. As regards the occupier, between the occupier of a house, who occupies for the purpose of residence, and the occupier of land, who occupies for the purpose of profit; and, again, between tenants who stand simply in a mercantile relation to their owners, as, for example, builders paying, or engaging to pay, a ground rent to the owners of the land on which they build, and tenants who stand in many relations other than mercantile towards their landlords.

"2. As regards rents, between ground rents and building rents, and again between rack rents and the rents actually prevailing in many parts of England.

"3. As regards tenure, between leases and tenancies at will.

"4. As regards rates, between that portion of the rates which may be called an hereditary burden on land, and that portion which has grown up subsequent to the period when the bulk of existing contracts were entered into.

"5. As regards the property rated, between houses which are themselves a product, created by the expenditure of a large amount of capital on a very small piece of land, and land which is itself to be used for purposes of production.

"Generally, the broadest distinction should be made between house property and landed property, regard being specially had to the fact that in the case of the former, there are mostly three parties on whom the burden of the rate might fall, the owner of the land, the builder of the house, and the inhabitant of the house (usually called the occupier, but who, in reality is the consumer of the commodity produced by the builder; viz., the house), whereas, in the case of landed property there are mostly two parties only concerned, the owner of the land and the occupier of the land.

"The distinction between house property and the inhabitant of that property on the one hand, and landed property and the occupier of that property who farms it for purposes of profit on the other, points to a clear and unmistakeable difference in the incidence of rates upon the occupier of a farm, and the inhabitant of a house respectively. Their cases only run parallel when they have entered into agreements to pay all local rates for a definite period. Where such agreements have been made, it is of course indisputable that the excess of rates falls exclusively upon the occupier; and it may be convenient to remark at this point that town property being held under lease much more generally than landed property, the increased burdens which have resulted to occupiers from the bargains made by them to pay all rates have covered a much greater range in towns than in country. But except in the case of existing leases, the position of the inhabitant of a house, and that of a farmer, widely diverge.

"It will be observed that in most respects the farmer stands rather in the position of the builder than in that of the occupier of the house; the occupier of the house corresponding not to the farmer, but to the consumer of agricultural produce. The farmer and the builder alike, in making their bargains with the owner of the land which they wish to take on lease, make their calculations with a view to profit. They know more or less at what price they may, on an average, expect to sell their produce; they compare that with the cost of production and all outgoings and charges; they must have a certain profit to induce them to enter on the business at all, and they determine accordingly what rent they can afford to pay to the owner of the land. In proportion as the charges in the shape of rates or other outgoings are high, they offer to pay a lower rent to the owner. Thus, as a general rule, both in the case of land and houses, where a fresh agreement is to be made with the owner of the soil, the whole of the existing rates comes out of the pocket of the landlord in the shape of a diminished rent; neither the farmer nor the builder knowingly or willingly intends any portion to come out of his own pocket; if it does, it is because he has miscalculated the future.

"But while the positions of the farmer and the builder resemble each other in the points just enumerated, they differ in many other respects, and especially in these: that the builder has a long and definite contract with the owner; that at the close of that contract the bargain is practically not renewed, as the house itself becomes the property of the owner; and that, therefore, the readjustment of rents at the close of leases, in view of increased rates, seldom, if ever arises between the original parties to the contract. The very contrary holds good in the case of those who take land intending to cultivate it for the purposes of profit. The majority have no lease at all, and stand in relations to the landlords under which rack rents are on the whole unusual. If tenants holding at will, or on a yearly tenancy, had to pay rack rents, there can be little doubt that every increase of rates imposed upon the tenant would render it necessary for him to demand a reduction of rents; otherwise the reduction of his profit would leave him in the end no option except to throw up his farm. But, as a matter of fact, it appears that a great portion of the farms in England are not rack rented. If so, it is clear that any increase in local burdens must fall upon the margin between the actual rent and the rack rent, and so far diminish the advantage derived by the farmer from his actual rent being below a rack rent; and till that margin were exhausted it would naturally be useless for him to apply to his landlord to readjust his rent.

"It may further be stated that even when that margin is not great, and where the occupier is paying a full rent, he would be in practice at a considerable disadvantage in applying for a reduction of rent in consequence of increasing local burdens. It would be exceedingly difficult to obtain readjustments of rents at short intervals, and it is contrary to the usual practice to make them. The manifest inconvenience and expense attending a change of farms on the part of the tenant increase this disadvantage.

"The case of the incidence of rates as regards landed property between owner and occupier, may, accordingly, be thus summed up:

"1. In the case of leases, the average burden of past rates invariably enters into account, with other outgoings, when a tenant first takes a farm, and the rent which he would be prepared to give is greater or smaller in proportion to the amount of the rates to which the land is liable. To this extent the rates distinctly fall upon the landlord. On the other hand, after the agreement has once been made, the excess in the rate beyond the amount estimated by the tenant when he took his farm falls upon him, and where, owing either to legislation or to changes brought about by local circumstances, a serious increase has taken place, the tenant upon whom the whole risk is invariably thrown by the terms of his agreement or his lease, feels that increase as a grievance.

"2. Where there are no leases, the occupier might theoretically seek a readjustment of rent with every increase of rates upon his farm; but, practically, it appears that the prevailing custom of rarely changing the amount of rent, except simultaneously with a change of tenant, added to the increasing value of land, and the greater competition for it, which has been steadily progressing in most parts of the kingdom, and, lastly, the circumstance of farmers being very generally charged with a lower rent than the rack rent, have all tended to throw by far the greater portion of the increase of the rates, where there has been an increase, upon the tenant.

"A division of rates between the owners and occupiers, coupled with an enactment similar to that which prevails in the case of the income tax, by which owners are prohibited from exempting themselves by contract from any share in local taxation, would in this respect probably afford considerable pecuniary relief to the occupier of a farm. What places him now at most disadvantage is, that he has to pay the rate in the first instance, and that it is he who must disturb the existing state of things before any part of an unforseen increase of rates can be thrown on the owner. His position would be much improved if the onus of changing the rent in consequence of changes in the rates were put upon the owner, or made equally applicable to them both.

"To return to the case of house property, it has been stated that the incidence of rates must there be considered with reference to three parties: the owner of the soil, the builder, and the occupier. On making the same distinction as in the case of land, between the moment when the first bargain is made and the subsequent period during which no re-adjustment takes place, it is clear that in the former case the owner pays the bulk, if not the whole, of the rates. The builder calculates on a certain profit, or else he would not build; he knows that tenants of a certain class can afford to give a certain rent, and no more, for a certain kind of house; and, therefore, if building is to take place at all, it is clear that the rates must fall there, where alone a margin exists to bear them; that is to say, on the price given, or ground-rent promised to the owner of the soil.

"It is conceivable, however, that the rates might be so high that the builder would not be able to offer a sufficient ground-rent to the owner of the land in order to induce him to part with it. In such a case the result of the high rates would certainly be a diminution in the supply of houses, and the rents of existing houses would proportionately rise, to the detriment to the tenants; but it will be observed that this result is only likely to ensue where ground-rents are very low and the rates very high. Where the ground-rents demanded are high, it is almost certain that the rates will affect the ground landlord alone, and in such cases it is highly improbable that the supply of houses would be lessened owing to the existence of rates. In fact, the ground-rent appears to bear the rates as long as there is any margin. In the case of agricultural land, that margin nearly always exists, and therefore the rates on such land fall ultimately on the owner. In the case of houses, on the other hand, that margin does not always exist; the rates sometimes even exceed the value of the ground-rent; they would then fall on the consumers; that is to say, on the inhabitants of the houses, by impeding the operations of the builder, and thus checking the supply.

"There remains to be considered the question of the incidence, as between the builder or owner of the house and the inhabitant of the house, of the excess of rates beyond that average amount which was taken into consideration when the house was built. The case of existing leases has already been dealt with. Where houses are occupied under leases, the excess beyond the calculated amount always falls on the occupier till the expiration of the lease. But it is important to discover what principle can be ascertained as regulating the incidence of that excess where houses are let on yearly, or other short tenancies, and generally, when the lease between the owner of a house and the occupier of a house falls in; in other words, on whom the increase of rates generally falls, when rents are re-adjusted, adjusted, or can be readjusted. Does it fall on the receiver of the house-rent, or on the inhabitant of the house who pays the house-rent? It is clear that the two parties stand to each other in the relation of seller and consumer, and that the question as to who will bear the increased rates will be settled exactly on the same principle as the question of increase or decrease of rent at that moment. It will be determined by the state of the demand for houses, and the supply of houses. Still, there are circumstances which constitute a distinction between the case of houses and that of most other articles. Where the house to be let is in a neighbourhood which possesses any special advantages, it has a kind of monopoly value. The commodity cannot be increased, and the price which may be obtained for it is limited, not by the fear of competition, for the supply of houses on a given spot cannot be multiplied, but only by the amount which the consumer, in the last resort, can afford to pay. On the other hand, property in houses is subject to this disadvantage as compared with other property, that the owner has only one market and one use for it. If the business of letting his house becomes unprofitable, if the rents fall, and if, on any increase of rates, he is obliged to let his house at a further reduction of rent, he cannot take his capital out of the business, he must bear the burden of increased rates without escape. When capital, sunk in irremoveable property, is taxed, as is the case with house property, the owner cannot shift the burden when the demand for the use of his property falls off. So far as he possesses a piece of property available only for one purpose, and irremoveable, he is at a greater disadvantage than owners of other property at a time of falling demand; but so far as he is a monopolist, owing to the peculiar value of a given piece of ground, the owner of a house is at a greater advantage than others at a time of increasing demand.

"To sum up the case of house property generally, it appears that the owners of building land, like the owners of other land, have to submit to a reduction of rent equivalent to the average amount of rates which the builder or other lessee calculates that he would have to pay according to the average of past rates; and that, as regards any subsequent excess after the owner of the soil has made his bargain, it is borne, in the case of leases, exclusively by the occupier. When leases expire, and in the case of short tenancies, in fact wherever readjustments take place, the above excess is borne sometimes by the leaseholder, or owner of the house, sometimes by the occupier, according to the state of supply and demand.

"A distribution of rates, between owner, leaseholder, and occupier, coupled with an enactment prohibiting contracts by which either party could exempt himself by anticipation from all future local taxation, would probably be to the pecuniary advantage of the occupiers of that class of houses which are usually held under leases, and would, at all events, relieve them from what is now considered a grievance, even under their bargains to undertake all risks, i. e., their liability to pay for permanent improvements, which, while made at their expense, they themselves will only enjoy for a limited time.

"As regards property held under tenures which admit of frequent readjustments of rents, it may fairly be argued that the question as to the person from whom the rate is levied, will not much affect the incidence of the rate. In short, a system of rack-rents and frequent readjustments diminishes the importance of the division of rates to either party.

"The foregoing considerations show the very material distinctions, in most respects, between the cases of rating the inhabitants of houses and rating the occupiers of farms, in relation both to the incidence of the rate, and to the arguments which might be adduced in favour of a division of the rates.

"But the division of rates between owners and occupiers must be considered not only in reference to the interests of the two parties immediately concerned.

"It is necessary to consider whether the public interest does not suffer from the present system. It appears to your Committee that the following disadvantages, amongst others, have resulted from it:—

"(1.) Two different sets of persons believe that they are paying the same rates at the same time; the occupiers, in many cases, denying that any portion of the rates is paid by the owners, and the owners contending that the burden of those rates is actually borne by them.

"(2.) Notwithstanding the contracts made by occupiers, that they will pay all local taxes, a sense of injustice has sprung up, in consequence of a portion of those local taxes being devoted to permanent improvements, by which the owner, who does not pay, gains as much as the occupier who does pay. This sense of injustice has had an injurious influence where the duty has been cast upon ratepaying occupiers, of making improvements of great importance but of a permanent nature.

"(3.) More generally, the exemption of the owners of property for long periods from the fluctuations of local expenditure is a serious public disadvantage from an administrative point of view. The exemption of owners from the direct payment of rates has made it impossible to give them a direct share in the administration of the rates, notwithstanding their indirect and ultimate interest in them. How great that indirect interest really is has been already shown; but the fact that it is indirect and free from fluctuations for a long time has deprived the owner of a 'locus standi' on local boards.

"Your Committee feel that on administrative grounds they may strongly recommend that the indirect interest of the owners shall be converted into a direct interest, with a view of securing them that just position in the administration of local affairs side by side with the occupiers, which their great ultimate stake in local expenditure, no less than public considerations, appear to require.

"It may be contended that the owners are at present more or less represented, firstly, by ordinary votes at many local elections; secondly, and more especially, by the plurality of votes which is secured to them; thirdly, by the admission of justices of the peace as ex officio members of the board of guardians and highway boards.

"It has already been stated that the owners of property have a right to vote in the election of guardians and of local boards under the Public Health and Local Government Acts. The evidence, however, shows that they seldom exercise that right; and this may be attributed to various circumstances. In the first place, it must be borne in mind that the number of owners is always so much less than that of the occupiers, that they feel they can exercise little influence in the elections. In the next place, the owners cannot vote unless they have previously gone through the formality of sending in a claim in writing for that purpose. Moreover, in those cases where the property is let for a term with the usual stipulation imposing the payment of all the rates upon the occupiers, the owners are not affected, except remotely, by any increase which may take place in the local burdens. It is not surprising, therefore, that the owners should take very little interest even in those elections in which the law enables them to participate.

"The system of plurality of voting does not strengthen the position of the owner as compared with that of the occupier; it might even weaken it. The owner of 10 houses of 200 l. each would only have six votes, which is the maximum number allowed; but the occupier of each of these houses would each have five votes, or, in the aggregate, 50 votes against the six of their landlord. But irrespective of the fact that plurality of voting does not secure adequate representation to the owner, it appears to your Committee that it would be out of the question to attempt to extend the system to the case of elections where it does not at present prevail.

"It is commonly supposed that the property element is represented on boards of guardians and highway boards by the ex officio members. But having become members of these boards, not by any direct nomination or election, but by virtue of being members of another body constituted for a different purpose, they are in a somewhat anomalous position. Their elected colleagues consider themselves alone the real representatives of the contributors of the funds which are being spent; and the ex officio guardians themselves do not have the same sense of being bound to give a regular and continuous attention to the business, as they would feel if distinctly elected for the purpose of discharging it. Irrespective of the fact that the system under which justices of the peace act as ex officio members of local boards, could scarcely be extended beyond the local authorities, where it now prevails, it appears to your Committee to afford an unsatisfactory and insufficient representation of owners.

"Having in view these considerations, it appears to your Committee that the only mode of securing for the owners a fair share in the representation is to constitute them an electoral body by themselves, with the power of electing a certain number of persons to represent them on all boards administering rates to which they may be liable to contribute.

"Your Committee have alluded to the duty now imposed upon the owner of sending in a formal claim before he is entitled to vote, whether for guardians of the poor or members of a local board of health; and this is rendered necessary in consequence of the defective information afforded by the rate book (which is the register for most parochial purposes) with respect to the owners of property within the parish,

"The owners' column in the rate book contains only the name of the person in immediate receipt of the rack rent, and is usually filled up by the overseers upon the information of the occupier of the premises; but it frequently happens that several other persons are interested in the same property. In that case their names would not appear, and the occupier would probably be unable to supply them, even if required to do so.

"In order to constitute such an electoral body of owners as your Committee contemplate, it is essential that means should be provided for ascertaining and registering their names without subjecting them to the inconvenience of making a claim; and with the view of solving this difficulty, your Committee have had to consider whether there is any public record of the names of the owners of property which might be rendered available as the basis of such a register as would be required.

"The register of voters for counties contains the names of all owners of property, whether as freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, who are entitled to the county franchise, and the qualifications are now so low that very few owners are excluded from the list.

"The register itself is so printed and arranged that the list of voters for each separate parish may be conveniently and completely cut out and detached from all the other lists in the book, so that the list for each parish may be ready for use.

"It is scarcely necessary to add that the county register is subject to an annual revision, and that owners who have once established their claim are continued upon it so long as they possess the same property.

"Under these circumstances, it appears to your Committee that, so far as regards ownership, the register for counties may, with great advantage, be adopted either as a register or a basis of a register for the proposed owners' local franchise.

"Your

"Your Committee consider that if the representation of owners were provided for, as they have suggested, it should supersede the system of justices of the peace acting as ex officio members of local boards; and, further, that as the claims of the owners of rateable property would have been met by direct representation, it would be unnecessary and undesirable to continue the present system of plurality of voting. The object of the Legislature in establishing that system would be accomplished in a much more simple and effectual manner by conferring upon the owners of property the direct representation proposed.

"Your Committee are of opinion that the arguments in favour of interesting both owners and occupiers in the administration of local affairs, apply with as much force to county expenditure as to any other.

"Your Committee are not insensible of the difficulties in the way of giving immediate effect to any proposal for imposing upon the owner a portion of the local burdens. The most prominent of these difficulties is the existence of a large number of leases, many of them for long terms of years, under which the owners have expressly stipulated that all local rates shall be borne by the occupiers. At the same time it is obvious that no change or improvement in the present complicated system of local taxation can be effected without interfering more or less with some existing interests, and if, on grounds of public policy, a change is required, it only remains to be considered how the equitable claims of those who may be affected by it can best be met.

"Your Committee deem it of very great importance that, for the reasons already stated, all local burdens should be equally distributed between the owners and the occupiers, and that, as a consequence, the owner should be distinctly represented on every local board. But it is obvious that if no arrangements were made with respect to existing contracts, serious difficulties and complications would arise. It would be hardly admissible to allow the owner to participate in the representation so long as he had no direct and immediate interest in the rates, and, on the other hand, it would lead to the greatest confusion if owners not paying their moiety of the rates were omitted from the register.

"It only remains, therefore, to be considered in what manner those cases are to be dealt with, in which the owners have contracted themselves out of the payment of the local rates.

"Any arrangement dealing with existing leases, so as to bring the owners and occupiers of the property held under them within the operation of the proposed plan, must necessarily bear the character of a compromise. It can scarcely be overlooked that the result of the present law has been to impose many charges upon the occupier, which neither he nor the owner foresaw when they entered into their bargain.

"Your Committee do not propose that any portion of the burthens which have accrued up to the present time shall, where there are leases, be transferred from the occupier to the owner; and they think that, as regards the present burthens, it will be desirable to follow the precedent of the Small Tenements Act, which, in an analogous case, enabled the landlord to add to his rent those rates with which he was made chargeable under the provisions of that Act notwithstanding his agreement with the occupier that such rates should be borne by the latter.

"They therefore propose that the tenants under leases should be entitled to deduct one-half of the rates from their rent, while the landlords should have the power to add to their rent one-half of the rate taken over an average number of years.

"The risk of future fluctuations would, in such a case, be shared by the owners equally with the occupiers; but it must be borne in mind that if on the one hand the owner will have to bear his share in any future increase, he will on the other have the advantage of any reduction in expenditure which improved administration may effect.

"At the same time, your Committee are aware, that there might be considerable difficulty in many instances in ascertaining the average amount of rates paid over a given number of years prior to the present time; and in order to meet this difficulty, as well as to avoid the disturbance of existing leases having but a short time to run, your Committee contemplate that in the case of leases the proposed change should not take effect for a period of three years. During that time, the rates would continue to be borne wholly by the occupier, and the average yearly amount so paid would afford a basis for calculating the amount to be added to the rent. One moiety of that amount would accordingly be added to the future rent, the owner being charged with a moiety of all subsequent rates during the remainder of the lease.

"Your Committee are aware that the proposed change will have the effect of imposing upon the owners a portion of any increase in the local expenditure which may take place, notwithstanding the obligation entered into by the occupiers to bear the whole amount themselves. In many instances, however, the Legislature had not hesitated to impose new local burdens upon the occupiers of property which could not have been contemplated by them when entering into such agreements: and this has been done without affording them any opportunity of re-adjusting the terms of their holdings.

"The conclusions at which your Committee have arrived are expressed in the following Resolutions:

"1. That the present system of local taxation, under which the exclusive charge of almost all local rates leviable upon rateable property, both for current expenditure and permanent works, is placed by law upon the occupiers of such property, is contrary to sound policy.

"2. That any system of local taxation under which legal recognition is given to the practice, on the part of owners of the property, of exempting themselves prospectively (and often for long terms of years), by stipulations in their leases or agreements, from bearing any portion of the increased burthens which the Legislature may impose upon rateable property, thus throwing the whole future risk of such burthens upon the occupier and leaseholder, must be attended with serious public disadvantages, and prove oppressive to the occupier.

"3. That in any reform in the existing system of local taxation, it is expedient to adjust local taxes in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel a direct interest in the increase and decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs.

"4. That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities, even in the same area, on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense, and has led to many administrative difficulties; and that in any change in the law as regards local taxation, uniformity, simplicity, and economy of management ought to be secured as far as possible.

"5. That all local rates collected within the same area should be consolidated into one rate, to be collected by the same collector on a uniform assessment of property, with a uniform scale of deductions.

"6. That such consolidated rate should, in the first instance, be collected from the occupier (except in the case of small tenements, for which the landlord can now, by law, be rated), with power to the occupier to deduct one-half of such rate from his rent, provision being made to enable intermediate leaseholders to make proportionate deductions from the rents paid by them, as in the case of the income tax, with a like prohibition against agreements in contravention of the law.

"7. That while it may be admitted that the reasons for a division of the charge between owners and occupiers, apply with greater force to some rates than to others, yet the benefits to be derived from classifying the rates and varying their incidence according to the purposes for which they are levied, are not so great as to outweigh the advantages of the consolidation of all rates into one rate, to be assessed on a uniform principle with uniform incidence, and to be collected by one officer.

"8. That it is essential that the division of the rates between the owner and occupier should be followed by such alterations in the constitution of the bodies administering the rates, as would secure a representation of the owners adequate to the direct and immediate interest in local expenditure which they would thus have acquired.

"9. That inasmuch as the owners are likely to be always in so small a minority as compared with the occupiers, that such representation cannot be secured to them simply by enabling them to vote as ordinary ratepayers; and, inasmuch as, on the other hand, an extension of the system of plurality of voting is neither desirable nor practicable, it is expedient that the owners should be constituted into a separate electoral body to vote by themselves, and to elect a certain number of members to represent them on all boards administering rates to which they contribute.

"10. That the property franchise for voters in counties offers a convenient and sufficient basis for the proposed owners' local franchise; and that the electoral register for counties may be made available for the purpose of local elections so far as it shows the names of the persons in every parish entitled to vote in respect of the ownership of property.

"11. That when such direct representation of owners has been secured, the justices of the peace should no longer act ex officio as guardians, or members of a local board.

"12. That both owners and occupiers ought to be allowed to take part in the administration of county business, as in the administration of the business transacted by other local authorities entrusted with the expenditure of local funds.

"13. That in the event of the constitution of local bodies being changed by the introduction of the direct representation of owners, plurality of voting, either on the part of owners or occupiers, ought to be abolished.

"14. That for the purpose of electing the various local authorities, all occupiers' franchises should be assimilated as nearly as possible; one electoral machinery and one register being made available as far as practicable for all.

"15. That whilst it is necessary to make provision for limiting, as far as practicable, the disturbance of existing contracts, it would be, on many grounds, undesirable, and almost impracticable, to extend the exemption of property held under leases from the operation of the proposed changes until the expiration of such leases.

"16. That the exclusion of the owners of property held under long leases, from the right of voting for local authorities, after the proposed changes had taken effect in respect of other property, would lead to much inconvenience and confusion, while, on the other hand, it would be inadmissible to allow them to vote unless they acquired a direct interest in the rates.

"17. That

"17. That the difficulties of the case would be equitably met by exempting the owners of property held under lease, from the proposed division of rates for a period of three years, and by providing that after the expiration of that time the occupiers of such property should be entitled equally with all other occupiers to deduct one moiety of the rates from the rent, power being given to the owner at the same time to add to his rent a sum equivalent to a moiety of the average annual amount of the rates paid by the occupier during the three years above referred to."

DRAFT REPORT proposed by Mr. Corrance, read the first time, as follows:—

"INCIDENCE OF RATES.

"THE evidence upon this head, notably under the answers given by Danby P. Fry, 80. 89, 90, 281, 382. 293; Taylor, 462. 470; Sewell Read, 1280 to 1284; George Andrews, 2432 to 2437; Pitts Squarey, 3090 to 3092; J. Grant, 4746 to 4750, and 4868 to 4902; W. Middleton, 5557. 5564. 5571 to 5576. 5602. 5604; T. Avery, 5705. 5707. 5750; Baxter, 5791. 5795. 5800, 5801. 5815. 5831. 5863. 6000, points to the conclusion, that the incidence upon the landlord and tenant respectively is determined by the following circumstances, namely, that the rate will fall upon the landlord in cases—

"1. Where the readjustment of rent is periodical, as under leases of long or short duration.

"2. Where the competition is not excessive.

"3. Where the amount of the rate has not varied.

"4. When levied for uses not purely local.

"5. Where the value of the property is stationary and unimproving.

"That it falls upon the tenant wholly—

"1. In respect of any improvements he may make, thereby adding to the rateable value of the premises.

"2. In respect of any increase of rateable value during the term of any leasehold tenure.

"3. Upon tenants under Small Tenements Act. Vide Report, 1867.

"INCIDENCE UPON TENANTS PARTIALLY.

"Tenants under building leases; partially,

"1st. Under tenures practically life held, or for long terms renewable.

"2nd. Upon tenants under an enhanced assessment, in respect of profits arising out of business carried on on the premises.

"3rd. On farms and agricultural occupations let upon fixed terms, under improving leases.

"4th. Generally upon all capital expended by tenant in improvement.

"GENERAL RESULTS arising out of Facts above mentioned.

"1. In the case of houses. To tax trades of various descriptions unequally, and upon the profits.

"2. To increase the rents of small tenements by diminishing the inducement to build.

"3. To fall upon tenements of the worst description at a higher ratio ad valorem than upon houses of a better class.

"4. To fall upon buildings used for the purposes of manufacture at a lower rate ad valorem than upon dwelling-houses or shops.

"5. In the case of land and farming occupations. To tax the profits of such business to the amount of two-thirds the gross annual value arising out of stock in trade and capital.

"6. To fall upon farm buildings at an equal or proportionate rate to that on houses.

"7. To restrict the application of capital to lands or houses in consequence of a diminished profit upon outlay.

"The answers which seem to establish the above will be found under the names of Danby Fry, 234 to 250; Clare Sewell Read, 1444. 1447. 1453. 1473; 1862 to 1869.

1475. 1479; 1680. 1702; George Andrews, 2569 to 2603; Pitts Squarey, 3167 to 3169. 3175 to 3180; Sidney Waterlow, 3380 to 3383. 3390 to 3462; Grey Grey, 3564 to 3590. 3532 to 4804; J. Grant, 4810 to 4877; J. Innes, 5065 to 5070; W. Middleton, 5606, 5607; D. Baxter, 5933 to 5936; John M'Culloch, 5992.

"Classsfication.

"A large body of this evidence fully bears out the Report of the Commissioners in 1844, 'That the present assessment of rates under common heads is not based upon any intelligible or even uniform principle. That subjects, the most incongruous, are grouped together without reference to their use or purpose, or even the area of taxation of each respectively.'

"The general division of such rates is also defective.

"In the 1st division or class, namely, the poor rate, are comprised no less than 18 distinct heads, the greater part of which have little or no affinity to the poor's rate. On the Report of Mr. Danby P. Fry, this will be found fully exemplified. The rates for aggregated districts, although assessed upon a standard fixed by the justices, are levied with the poor's rate often upon a different valuation, while the rates for primary districts sometimes fall upon owners and occupiers indiscriminately, and sometimes upon the poor's rates; of this the parish improvement rate is an instance. The evidence given by Danby Fry, 80 to 90; Clare Sewell Read, 1442, 1443; Lambert, 1807; Glossop, 2255 to 2260; Grey Grey, 3613 to 3617. 3648 to 3696; J. Grant, 4800 to 4801; Innes, 4957 to 5023, will be found to establish this.

"Assessments.

"The assessment of these rates is also extremely imperfect, principally from these causes, namely—

"1. An imperfect standard of rateable value and definition.

"2. A want of uniformity between the Local Assessment Committees.

"3. The absence of conformity between the valuation for poor's rate and for aggregated districts. The principal evidence upon this point will be found under the names of Tom Taylor, 556 to 558. 664; Clare Sewell Read, 1507; 1502 to 1524. Lambert, 2339; Dashwood, 3871 to 3878; J. Grant, 4862 to 4868. 4929, 4930; James Innes, 5047 to 5055. 5115. 5154; J. May, 5359; T. Avery, 5679, 5680.

"Administration.

"The answer given to question respecting administration would seem to establish the expediency of introducing, as far as practicable, the system of mixed administrations, representing direct interests in the expenditure.

"The system of administration, ex officio, is one which does not work satisfactorily, and is deficient in the valuable quality of personal responsibility. On the other hand the owners of rated property are under certain disqualifications, and can exercise no adequate control in proportion to their admitted interests in the rates and ultimate responsibility. The answers to questions pertinent to this are as follows:—T. Taylor, 529. 620; Clare Sewell Read, 1327; Lambert, 1754. 1777. 1815; T. Rogers, 2731 to 2735; T. Dashwood, 3865 to 3871; Neilson Hancock, 3909. 3913; G. Grant, 4789 to 4794; J. Innes, 5070 to 5072; J. May, 5372 to 5405; Baxter, 5880, 5881. 5978, 5979. These are mostly confirmatory of the above.

"General Conclusions.

"The general conclusions to which the foregoing would give rise are—

"1st. As regards the incidence of rates, that there is no certain or absolutely satisfactory data, this being determined by a variety of purely accidental circumstances. It is, nevertheless, beyond doubt that some improvement might take place through a redistribution of local burdens.

"As a guide to this, the interests of the various classes might be most properly considered, and, as a matter of no less importance, the influence exerted and controlling power exercised over its application and expenditure. It will be found, upon this principle, that a complete subdivision of the rates would be inexpedient.

"Of this, the most striking instance is the poor rate, in which, restricted to its legitimate uses, we must recognise a character especially distinctive and peculiar. The highway rate is also exceptional.

"The former is at once an auxiliary labour rate and a provident association. The maintenance of a test would establish the former proposition.

"The

"The admission of this distinctive character formed the basis of the Poor Law of 1834, and still obtains, though under changed conditions. It also differs from other rates, its subject being one over which we are unable to obtain complete control, through administrative prudence.

"Under these circumstances it was considered by the framers of the Poor Law in 1834, that the incidence of the tax should be on the occupier, as an employer of labour, and the well known fact, that a large portion of the working classes in England are in a social condition, which places them but one remove above actual destitution (pauperism being their inevitable lot upon any large disturbance of employment), renders it necessary that the interests of employers should be both engaged and protected.

"Hence the necessity of entrusting the administration of the rate to a class, upon whom the direct burden is also properly imposed.

"The interference in the general labour market by the operation of a law so exceptional in its character, is an argument of greater stringency than any other, in determining incidence; and the effect of the relaxation which has taken place, in consequence of the extension of the area of contribution under the Union Chargeability Act, is too remarkable to be lost sight of. The fact will, under the following witnesses, be found to be sufficiently attested, namely, Grey Grey, 3564; Sewell Read, 1574 to 1576, 1862 to 1869; Charles Grey, 3719 to 3724; J. Grant, 4804 to 4806. 4810; Baxter, 6024, 6025, and others. It would seem, therefore, until extensive changes in the present law of relief shall take place, that the present incidence of this tax must remain unaltered, and that no division or subdivision of such a rate could take place without materially weakening the safeguards which now exist against careless or corrupt administration. This view it must be held that experience has sufficiently confirmed and tested.

"To other rates the objections here stated do not apply, and it is upon other grounds that any objections exist to their subdivision. Among these, the disturbance likely to accrue to existing interests ought to be considered, and fairly balanced against the countervailing advantages which much of the evidence would seem to establish, in respect of direct administrative responsibility, and the relief of the occupier from the entire load of increasing burdens. The evidence to this effect will be found the names of T. Taylor, Charles Sewell Read, Lambert, T. Rogers, C. Grey, Neilson Hancock, G. Grant, J. Innes, T. May, under numbers previously referred to.

"The re-classification of rates in respect of use or purpose as well as conterminous districts would indicate a separation, in the first instance, between the poor's rates levied upon independent districts, those levied upon independent districts, not upon basis of poor's rates, and rates for aggregated districts.

"The redistribution of the rates within one or other of such classes would seem greatly necessary, according to the principles already stated, although beyond this their consolidation would not present any important advantages.

"In this respect all requirements would be met by an improved system of collection, suggested by the evidence of T. Rogers, 2671 to 2786; Charles Grey, 3748; T. Dashwood, 3892 to 3898; W. Myddleton, 5508. 5529. 5543.

"The assessment of all rates within a common area should be made upon a common and, if possible, a uniform standard, while the general basis of rateable value should not be fixed by independent local bodies, or purely local administrations. The obvious inconvenience arising out of such practice is illustrated by the frequent incongruity between the assessments to county rates and poor's rates, while the evidence given by C. Grey Grey, Neilson Hancock, and J. Lambert, of the advantages derived from the Irish general system is confirmatory of that conclusion.

"A large body of the evidence tends also to establish the imperfection of existing local administrations, both as regards valuations, assessments, and control over expenditure.

"The chief evidence upon these points will be found under the names of T. Taylor, Read, Lambert, Rogers, Neilson Hancock, G. Grant, J. Innes, and John May, and has been already referred to.

"Reforms might be sought in extensive changes of both county and union administrations, upon a more general and comprehensive basis, and it is obviously desirable to remove all obstacles, (such as those existing in the general sewer rate and district rate,) to the representation of owners. The answers given by Charles Grey, 2691 to 2694, furnish the examples referred to; and at 3735 to 3737. The operation of a contrary system, by the election of owners for the management of highways in Ireland, is also worthy of attention. The evidence afforded does not permit any general conclusion with respect to an apportionment of rates between the local and imperial taxpayers; but the influence exercised by the Government over local expenditure is sufficiently demonstrated by several witnesses, and proves that this part of the subject requires especial investigation. In the expenditure under various heads, to the county rate, and the powers claimed over gaols, &c., this is especially apparent; while it is evident that the amount and application of Government grants follow no certain rule or principle.

Mr. Charles Seely.	Mr. Ayrton.

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by the Chairman, read as follows:

"THAT your Committee, without pledging themselves to the view that all rates should be dealt with in the same manner, are of opinion:

"(a). That the existing system of local taxation, under which the exclusive charge of almost all local rates leviable upon rateable property, both for current expenditure expenditure and permanent works, is placed by law upon the occupiers, while the owners are exempt from any direct contributions in respect of such rates, is contrary to sound policy.

"(b). That in any reform the existing system of local taxation, it is expedient to adjust local taxes in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel a direct interest in the increase and decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs.

"(c). That this result will be best attained by making the owners as well as the occupiers chargeable to a certain proportion of the local rates; the rates to be collected, as at preseat, from the occupier (except in the case of small tenements, for which the landlord can now, by law, be rated), with power to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, provision being made to enable intermediate leaseholders to make proportionate deductions from the rents paid by them, as in the case of the income tax, with a like prohibition against agreements in contravention of the law.

"2. That it is essential that the division of the rates between the owner and occupier should be followed by such alterations in the constitution of the bodies administering the rates as would secure a direct representation of the owners adequate to the immediate interest in local expenditure which they would thus have acquired.

"3. That justices of the peace should no longer act ex officio as members of any local board in which such direct representation of owners has been secured.

"4. That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities, even in the same area, on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense, and has led to many administrative difficulties.

"5. That in any change in the law as regards local taxation, uniformity, simplicity, and economy of management ought to be secured as far as possible; and that the consolidation into one rate of all local rates collected within the same area is a matter of paramount importance.

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Sir Massey Lopes, read as follows:

"1. THAT the evidence taken before your Committee shows that almost all local rates are now levied upon the occupiers of rateable property, yet that his interests are in reality chiefly affected by the fluctuations of the rate, the average rate being borne by the owner, so that in the case of any serious alterations by way of increase or diminution, the same is taken into consideration in the case of a new tenancy in re-adjustment of rent.

"2. That the exceptions to the above general rule are to be found in the densely populated districts of large cities and towns, where, under the compounding Acts, the owner has been made liable for the rate; but in such cases, owing to the great demand for house accommodation, and the fluctuating nature of the tenancies, he has generally been enabled to compensate himself for any increase of rates by an immediate addition to the occupier's rent.

"3. That the fact that the occupier is affected by the fluctuations of rate has given him the strongest interest in keeping down the expenditure, while the fact that he is generally a resident, and well acquainted with the wants of the locality, makes him in the case of most rates able to exercise discrimination, and to give that constant attention to details which is requisite for the proper control of such expenditure.

"4. That, although it might be just and politic to place a portion of the charges for some new objects upon the owner of property, yet it would not be advisable to disturb existing agreements, or interfere by general enactment with the freedom of contract.

"5. That the compulsory division of rates between owners and occupiers of real property would facilitate the continued increase of burthens on the property of both these classes, and that any division of the interest hitherto felt and expressed by the occupier in the growth of local burthens, would have a tendency to diminish legitimate resistance to any augmentation of old charges or imposition of new ones.

"6. That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities, even in the same area, on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense; and that, in any change of the law as regards local taxation, uniformity and simplicity of assessment and collection, as well as economy of management, ought to be secured as far as possible.

"7. That all local rates collected on the same property, within the same area, should be based on a uniform assessment of property, with a uniform scale of deductions, and shall be consolidated into the collection, such collection to be preceded by the service of a demand note, which shall particularise the different rates, objects, amounts, and poundage for which such collection is to be made.

" 8. That both owners and occupiers ought to be allowed to take part in the administration of county financial business, as in the administration of the business transacted by other local authorities entrusted with the expenditure of local funds.

" 9. That great hardship is inflicted upon ratepayers by the imposition of local taxation for national purposes; and that the powers which are given from time to time by the Legislature to departments of the Government to require outlay at their discretion at the cost of the ratepayers, without the check or control of Parliament or of any local authorities, are contrary to sound policy.

" 10. That the whole system of Local Taxation requires revision, and that it would be unadvisable to deal with it piecemeal. That no change should be made in one portion of the existing law until Parliament has dealt with the whole subject in a comprehensive manner, and has decided whether the whole burthen of Local Taxation shall be exclusively confined to the same description of property as at present.

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Mr. Corrance, read as follows:

" 1. UPON the premises heretofore laid down, and the evidence taken before your Committee, upon the present evidence of local rates, it may be held, That a primâ facie case for their division between owners and occupiers has been established, together with a joint administration in all such cases; for this, the reasons adduced would seem, although not conclusive in all cases, to be sufficient. To this, however, the rate levied to the relief of the poor would seem an exception (when confined to that object), involving considerations which rise above the question of simple expediency or convenience.

" 2. That the system when established would require no legislative guarantee or protection, inasmuch as under ordinary circumstances it would recommend itself both to owners and occupiers of rated property, as the best basis for free contract.

" 3. That all rates levied within any district to uses and purposes not dissimilar, should be classified and consolidated, with a further view to common collection, assessment, and administration, upon a common and uniform principle.

" 4. That the administration of any consolidated rate should be formed upon the principle of the direct representation of all who share its incidence.

" 5. That the election of such representatives to any board or council should be through the votes of one elective body, constituted through the like principles in any defined area or district; but that it is expedient that the qualification for candidates shall rest upon a separate and distinct basis, as owners, leaseholders, and occupiers.

" 6. That it seems to your Committee that the system of grants from the Imperial Exchequer, in aid of certain local rates, is capricious, and requires revision upon a sounder principle than hitherto recognised, namely, ' That the amount and apportionment of such grants ought to be determined by the national character of the objects of the impost, as well as the respective interests of the general and local taxpayer.'

" 7. That the difficulties of effecting such changes without disturbance of existing interests are not insuperable, and deserve the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government and the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, both for the removal of existing grievances and tending to secure a better local administration to objects intimately concerning the well-being of the people."

Motion made, and Question proposed, " That the Resolutions to be proposed by the Chairman, be now taken into consideration."—Amendment proposed, to leave out the words " The Chairman," in order to insert the words " Sir Massey Lopes "—(Mr. Pell),—instead thereof.—Question put, That the words " The Chairman," stand part of the Question.—The Committee divided:

Ayes, 8.	Noes, 8.

Mr. Acland.	Sir Massey Lopes.
Mr. Rathbone.	Mr. Pell.
Sir James Lawrence.	Colonel Brise.
Mr. Charles Seely.	Mr. Wheelhouse.
Mr. Ayrton.	Mr. George Gregory.

Whereupon, the Chairman declared himself with the Ayes.

Motion made, and Question proposed:—

"1. That your Committee, without pledging themselves to the view that all rates should be dealt with in the same manner, are of opinion:

"(a.) That the existing system of local taxation, under which the exclusive charge of almost all local rates leviable upon rateable property, both for current expenditure and permanent works, is placed by law upon the occupiers, while the owners are exempt from any direct contributions in respect of such rates, is contrary to sound policy.

"(b.) That in any reform in the existing system of local taxation, it is expedient to adjust local taxes in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel a direct interest in the increase and decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs.

"(c.) That this result will be best attained by making the owners as well as the occupiers chargeable to a certain proportion of the local rates; the rates to be collected, as at present, from the occupier (except in the case of small tenements, for which the landlord can now, by law, be rated), with power to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, provision being made to enable intermediate leaseholders to make proportionate deductions from the rents paid by them, as in the case of the income tax, with a like prohibition against agreements in contravention of the law."

Amendment proposed, in line 4, to leave out the word "local"—(Mr. Pell).—Question, That the word "local" stand part of the Question, put, and negatived.

Another Amendment proposed, in line 4, after the word "for," to leave out the words "current expenditure"—(Mr. Pell).—Question put, That the words "current expenditure" stand part of the Question."—The Committee divided:

Mr. Charles Seely.

Another Amendment proposed, after the word "policy," to insert the words, "That the Evidence taken before your Committee shows that in many cases the burden of the rates which are directly paid by the occupier falls ultimately, either part or wholly, upon the owner, who nevertheless has no share in the administration"—(Mr. Walter).—Question, That those words be there inserted, put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed, in line 17, to leave out the words "enable intermediate leaseholders to take proportionate deductions from the rents paid by," in order to insert the words "render persons having superior and intermediate interests liable to proportionate deductions from the rents received by them"—(Mr. Smith),—instead thereof.—Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question, put, and negatived.—Question, That those words be there inserted, put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed, in line 19, to leave out from the words "Income Tax" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "the system when established, would require no legislative guarantee or protection, inasmuch as under ordinary circumstances it would recommend itself both to owners and occupiers of rated property, as the best basis for free contract"—(Mr. Corrance),—instead thereof.—Question put, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.—The Committee divided:

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. GOSCHEN in the Chair.

Mr. Walter.	Mr. Backhouse.
Mr. Acland.	Mr. Birley.
Mr. Smith.	Mr. Charles Seely.
Sir Massey Lopes.	Mr. George Gregory.
Mr. Pell.	Mr. Corrance.
Colonel Brise.	Mr. Fielden.
Sir James Lawrence.	Mr. Ayrton.
Mr. Wheelhouse.

Motion made, and Question, "That your Committee have examined many witnesses, and received at their hands very conflicting opinions as regards the proportion in which the burden of rates at present falls relatively on owners and occupiers"—(Sir M. Lopes)—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That in the event of any division of rates between the owner and occupier, it is essential that such alterations should be made in the constitution of the bodies administering the rates as would secure a direct representation of the owners adequate to the immediate interest in local expenditure which they would thus have acquired"—(The Chairman)—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That justices of the peace should no longer act ex officio as members of any local board in which such direct representation of owners has been secured"—(The Chairman)—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities, even in the same area, on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense, and has led to many administrative difficulties"—(The Chairman).—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "expense" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "and that in any change of the law as regards local taxation, uniformity and simplicity of assessment and collection, as well as economy of management, ought to be secured as far as possible"—(Sir M. Lopes),—instead thereof.—Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question, put, and negatived.—Words added.—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That in any change in the law as regards local taxation, uniformity, simplicity, and economy of management ought to be secured as far as possible, and that the consolidation into one rate of all local rates collected within the same area is a matter of paramount importance"—(The Chairman).—Amendment proposed, to leave out the words, "That in any change in the law as regards local taxation, uniformity, simplicity, and economy of management ought to be secured as far as possible; and"—(The Chairman).—Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question, put, and negatived.

Another Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "and that your Committee concur in the Resolution of the Select Committee on Poor Rates Assessment, 1868, which recommended one consolidated rate. That a demand note should be left with each ratepayer on the rate being made, stating the amount of the requisitions, the rate in the pound for each purpose, and the period for which the rate is made, the rateable value of the premises, the amount of the rate thereon, and of each payment"—(The Chairman).—Question, That those words be there added, put, and agreed to.—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put, "That by the terms of the reference to them, your Committee were limited to the questions of the division of the charges on rateable property between the owners and occupiers, and actual changes in the constitution of local bodies administering rates should follow such division; and they have consequently been precluded from entering upon the inquiry of the relations of local and Imperial taxation, and the nature of the property liable to the same"—(Mr. Gregory).—The Committee divided:

Ayes, 12.	Noes, 4.
Mr. Backhouse.	Sir Massey Lopes.
Mr. Birley.	Colonel Brise.
Mr. W. H. Smith.	Mr. Fielden.
Mr. Corrance.	Mr. Wheelhouse.
Mr. Walter.
Mr. Acland,
Mr. Rathbone.
Mr. Pell.
Sir James Lawrence.
Mr. Charles Seely.
Mr. Ayrton.
Mr. George Gregory.

Motion made, and Question, "That whilst it is necessary to make provision for limiting, as far as practicable, the disturbance of existing contracts, it would be, on many grounds, undesirable, and almost impracticable, to extend the exemption of property, held under leases from the operation of the proposed changes until the expiration of such leases—(The Chairman)—put, and agreed to.

Motion, made, and Question, "That the exclusion of the owners of property held under long leases, from the right of voting for local authorities, after the proposed changes had taken effect in respect of other property, would lead to much inconvenience and confusion, while, on the other hand, it would be inadmissible to allow them to vote unless they acquired an immediate interest in the rates"—(The Chairman)—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the difficulties of the case would be equitably met by exempting the owners of property held under lease, from the proposed division of rates for a period of three years, and by providing that after the expiration of that time the occupiers of such property should be entitled equally with all other occupiers to deduct from the rent the proportionate part of the rates to which the owner may become liable, power being given to the owner at the same time to add to his rent a sum equivalent to the like proportionate part of the rates calculated on the average annual amount of the rates paid by the occupier during the three years above referred to"—(The Chairman),—put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That your Committee are of opinion that no alteration in the incidences of local taxation, involving as a natural consequence a re-adjustment of rents, will be satisfactory to the ratepayers, unless it is preceded by a further inquiry into the charges which now fall upon the ratepayer"—(Mr. Smith).—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "your Committee" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "these Resolutions be reported to the House"—(Mr. Ayrton),—instead thereof.—Question put, That the words "are of opinion" stand part of the Question.—The Committee divided:

Mr. Pell.	Sir James Lawrence.
Colonel Brise.	Mr. Charles Seely.
Mr. Fielden.	Mr. Ayrton.
Mr. Wheelhouse.
Mr. George Gregory.

Another amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "opinion" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the inquiry on which they have been engaged forms only one branch of the general question of local taxation, and that other considerations besides those which have been submitted for their investigation should be previously entertained and be taken into account in any general measure giving effect to the above recommendations"—(Colonel Brise),—instead thereof.—Question put, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question, put, and negatived,—Words added.—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

Resolved, " That your Committee are of opinion that the inquiry on which they have been engaged forms only one branch of the general question of Local Taxation, and that other considerations besides those which have been submitted to their investigations should be previously taken into account in any general measure giving effect to the above recommendations."

Question, That the Resolutions agreed to by the Committee be reported to The House, put, and agreed to.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Tuesday, 15th March 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Acland.	Sir James Lawrence.
Mr. Backhouse.	Sir Massey Lopes
Mr. Birley.	Mr. Pell.
Colonel Brise.	Mr. Rathbone.
Mr. Corrance.	Mr. St. Aubyn.
Mr. Fielden.	Mr. Charles Seely, jun.
Mr. Goschen.	Mr. Walter.
Mr. George Gregory.	Mr. Wheelhouse.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. DANBY P. FRY, called in; and Examined.

1. Chairman.] YOU are a Member, are you not, of the Legal Department of the Poor Law Board?—Yes.

2. And you have devoted some attention to the question of rates?—I have had occasion to do so a great deal during the discharge of my official duties.

3. You have followed, have you not, the course of legislation upon rating for some 25 years?—Yes. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I prepared a book upon the subject of local taxes in 1846, and since that time, of course, my official duties have called my attention to the subject very constantly.

4. When you wrote that book upon local rates it succeeded, did it not, a Report of Sir George Cornewall Lewis's upon Local Taxation?—It did so; that Report was made in 1843. In 1845 Sir George Lewis requested me to bring the state of the law down to the then present time, in continuation of the Report of 1843; and I then prepared the work on "The Local Taxes," which was published in 1846.

5. Can you state the chief rates that were levied in 1843, at the time of the last Report upon Local Taxation?—They were divided into three classes; the first class being rates of independent districts on the basis of the poor-rate, comprising the poor-rate, the workhouse building rate, the survey and valuation rate, the goal fees rate, the constable's rate, the highway rate, the lighting and watching rate, and the militia rate. The second class were the rates of independent districts which were not on the basis of the poor-rate; that is to say, not required by law to be on the basis of the poor-rate.

6. Mr. Corrance.] Does that refer to 1843 or to the present time?—To 1846, and it applies equally to 1843; there was no increase in the number of rates in the interval, except that there is one rate here which was not in the Report of 1843, a museum rate, for which the Act was passed afterwards.

7. Chairman.] When was that Act passed?—After 1843 and before 1846.

8. Mr. Rathbone.] Is that collected with the poor-rate?—No, that was a separate assessment.

8.* Chairman.] Will you state the rates comprised in the second class?—Those in the second class were not on the basis of the poor-rate, and they comprise the church rates, the sewers rates, the general sewers tax, the drainage and inclosure rates, the inclosure rate, and the regulated pasture-rate; that was a very special rate under the Inclosure Commissioners for managing common lands under certain circumstances.

9. Sir James Lawrence.] Why should you draw a distinction between the drainage and inclosure rate and the inclosure rate?—They are distinct rates according to the Acts; they answer similar purposes, but they are levied under different provisions.

9.* Chairman.] Will you proceed with your enumeration?—The third class are rates of aggregate districts. The distinction was between independent districts, such as a parish, and aggregate districts, such as a county; the county hundred, or other district containing the parishes collectively. The mode of collection is entirely different with regard to the two classes of rates, and for that reason they were distinguished in this manner.

10. You have spoken of three classes of districts?—Yes; first, independent districts, on the basis of the poor rate; secondly, independent districts, districts, not on the basis of the poor rate; and thirdly, aggregate districts.

Mr. D. P. Fry.

11. Classes one and two are confined, are they not, to what you may call independent areas?—Yes.

12. And class three is an aggregate area?—Yes.

13. Sir Massey Lopes.] Would not the last be what you would call county rates?—Yes; you may call the one the poor rate series, and the other the county rate series.

14. Chairman.] With respect to the third class, which is the first division?—The county rate. The rates of aggregate districts may be subdivided into three classes; those which are levied in the counties, those which are levied in the hundreds, and those which are levied in the boroughs. In the counties we have the county rate, the county police rate, the shire-hall rate, the lunatic asylum rate, and the burial rate. The burial rate is a special rate for the burying of dead bodies cast on shore by the sea. The hundred rate is like the county rate, only levied in the hundreds. In case of riot and destruction of property the damage is to be made good by the hundred, and for that purpose a hundred rate is still levied. Then in boroughs, there is the borough rate, the watch rates, the goal rate, and the prisoners' rate, for the maintenance of prisoners; that is practically abolished now.

15. Mr. Corrance.] Did that exist in 1843?—It did.

16. Chairman.] What are the other rates under that head?—The lunatic asylum rate and the museum rate, and besides that there was a district prisons rate which was levied conjointly in counties and boroughs; that is to say, districts were formed of portions of the counties and boroughs, and the district prison rate is therefore a common rate. These were the whole of the rates at that time existing.

17. Sir Massey Lopes.] How many in number are there in each of those classes?—Some of those, I should explain, were never actually levied; they are rates by law, but not rates in fact. There were eight in the first class, six in the second class, and thirteen, including the district prisons rate, in the third class.

18. Mr. Walter.] Were the rates that you have mentioned all leviable in 1843?—Yes, they were, except the museum rate.

19. Chairman.] Will you state the rates that have been levied since?—Of the rates levied since, some are new rates, and others are modifications of the old ones. There is the special drainage rate, which is a modification of the sewers rate under the Drainage of Land Act.

20. Mr. Corrance.] What was the date of the imposition of that rate?—1861.

21. Chairman.] Will you go on with your enumeration?—There are general district rates which are leviable by local boards of health in the districts of the local boards, and there have been a great many Acts of Parliament upon that subject. I do not know that I can specify any particular date. First of all there was the new Health of Towns Act, then there was the Public Health Act, and the Local Government Act, and a great many others. The present rate is the general district rate, which is now levied by local boards.

22. Is not it the fact that the general district rates levied by local boards are practically levied under those successive Acts?—Yes, and a great many more amending Acts, but practically it is all now under the Local Government Act of 1858, which has superseded the previous Acts, but which has itself been modified by several subsequent Acts.

23. Those general district rates are levied by the local boards of health, are they not?—Yes, they are levied by the local boards of health.

24. Do you include in that the rates levied by improvement commissioners?—No, they are quite separate. The local boards do act as improvement commissioners, under certain circumstances and under certain powers, but they are not improvement commissioners. Improvement commissioners are different bodies under local Acts.

25. Mr. Gregory.] Are there not various local Acts in existence still, independently of the general Acts under which rates are levied?—Yes, an immense number.

26. Chairman.] You have stated so far two rates, the special drainage rate and the general district rate, will you proceed with the enumeration?—Besides those there are some which are not so much separate rates as payments made by the overseers, or local officers of parishes, or similar districts, out of other rates, to district boards of various kinds for various purposes. There are the highway boards, which are formed under the Highway Acts of 1862 and 1864. I should explain perhaps a little more fully that those boards are formed for districts, and they call for the moneys which they require by contributions from the different parishes in those districts. The highway boards call for their moneys from the overseers or waywardens, sometimes out of the poor-rate and sometimes not, according to circumstances, and therefore it is not a new rate. It is a new charge, and levied in a new manner, but it is not specifically a new rate, therefore I rather call it a payment under the Acts relating to the highway boards. Then there are burial boards, and baths and washhouses; and also public libraries and museums, the rate for which is a modification of the museum rate, and superseded it. Then there is the Sewer Act, under which a rate is levied, which is quite different from the old sewers rate. It is a new law, applying to cases where the vestries are the local authorities.

27. Mr. Rathbone.] Is that a substitute for the old law, or is it an addition?—It is an addition. Then there is the animals' contagious diseases rate: that is, the cattle plague rate; and in the metropolis there are the following rates:—first, there are the rates levied by vestries and district boards, which include three rates; that is to say, they make one call, including three sub-divisions; first, the sewers rate, secondly, the lighting rate, and thirdly, the general rate; they are required by the Act to subdivide the expenditure in that way.

28. Chairman.] Is that rate equivalent more or less to the general district rate levied by local boards of health?—It is very similar; it is under Sir Benjamin Hall's Act in the metropolis. Then, besides that, in the metropolis, there is now the consolidated rate, which is levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works. That consolidated rate is a substitute for several previous rates which the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorised by successive Acts of Parliament to levy, and it is required to include the same purposes with some additional ones, which are these: first, the main drainage; secondly, the fire brigade; thirdly, thirdly, the payment of interest on the loans and repayment of the loans borrowed under former Acts; fourthly, the dividends and the redemption of the consolidated stock, which is authorised by the same Act to be constituted by the Metropolitan Board of Works; and, lastly, all the other expenses of the Board.

29. Have you now concluded the enumeration, so far as you are aware, of the rates now in existence?—Yes, so far as I am aware. I should like to put in a general saving clause that there may be others which I have not come across; the Acts of Parliament on the subject have been so numerous of late years that it is quite impossible to be certain.

30. It would appear that those last rates all belong to the third class?—They do practically.

31. Can you see any rate amongst them which is levied upon an independent area?—No, I think not, except perhaps in the case of a rate levied under the Sewer Authorities Act.

32. In the main, they belong to the class of rates which we have called the rates of aggregate districts?—Yes, quite so, and, indeed, the sewage utilisation does, but it is also levied by the vestry. The vestry of the particular parish acts as the sewer authority in that parish; they may call for money from the overseers of that parish; but, practically, it belongs to the aggregate district series.

33. Could you state the difference between independent areas and aggregate areas?—The difference is this, that the rate of an independent district is levied in the same district in which it is expended, whereas in aggregate districts it is levied in a number of separate units, but expended for the benefit of the whole district.

34. For instance, the poor rate is levied in a parish and is spent in the union?—Yes, to a certain extent; the poor rate may therefore be said now to belong to an aggregate district, but it is under peculiar circumstances, and it is really levied in the parish.

35. Mr. Pell.] Or, as in the case of a highway-rate, where a portion of it is appropriated to the district in which it is raised and the remainder goes to a general fund; which class do you put that in?—I put that in the districts. Originally the highway rate was a parish rate levied and expended in the parish; but the present highway rate is a district rate under the Act of 1862.

36. Chairman.] On what basis is the special drainage rate levied; is it levied on the basis of the poor rate or the county rate basis?—On the basis of the sewers rate; it is levied in the sewer districts or drainage districts, which are formed under that particular Act of 1861, and they are formed upon the application of the Inclosure Commissioners.

37. Mr. Walter.] Will you explain what you mean by its being levied on such-and-such a basis?—The basis requires a great deal of explanation. The basis of the sewers rate, according to law, is entirely different from the basis of the poor rate.

38. Chairman.] Will you state in what respects they differ?—The sewers rate is to be raised under the Act of Hen. 8, according to the judgment of the Commissioners of Sewers, upon the persons who have done any damage, or who have suffered any damage, and who have or hold any land in the district which is either damaged by the water or benefited by the sewer. The Commissioners are to rate all those persons according to their own judgment of the value of the benefit which those persons receive.

39. Do the Commissioners of Sewers act upon that generally?—I am not practically acquainted with what they actually do, but I believe they do not. I believe that practically the sewers rate is levied entirely contrary to law; but when I speak of the basis of the rate, of course I speak of the legal basis of the rate.

40. When you speak of the basis of the county rate and the basis of the poor rate, do you mean that the valuation is taken differently in the case of the poor rate from what it is in the county rate, and by an independent authority?—I suppose that the basis would include two separate elements: first, the kinds of property which are subject to the rate; and secondly, the mode in which that property is valued for the purposes of assessment.

41. As a matter of fact, is there not property which is not liable to poor rate, but which is liable to other rates?—To some of them; the sewers rate in particular.

42. And to the highway rate?—As to the highway rate, there are special provisions in the Highway Act of 1835 reserving the peculiar assessment of the rate in particular parishes, but only in those parishes in which a special custom existed prior to the passing of the Highway Act, and those special customs were continued by the Highway Act.

43. Without going into particulars, are the county rate and the highway rate, and the poor rate, regulated by different laws as regards their assessment?—Not the county rate, because the county rate is paid out of the poor rate primarily, or where it is not paid out of the poor rate it is levied by a special rate which is similar to the poor rate.

44. But the county rate is made on a different valuation, is it not?—Yes, on a different valuation, but it is on the same classes of property.

45. But it is on a different valuation, and therefore you speak of a different basis for county rate and poor rate?—As far as regards the valuation the basis is different, but as far as regards the property it is the same.

46. There are two elements that enter into that; there is the question, is there not, of the property assessed, and there is the authority which makes the assessment?—Yes.

47. And those two constitute differences in the basis on which the rate is imposed?—Quite so.

48. Sir James Lawrence.] Is not the valuation for the county rate taken from the poor rate?—Yes, the county rate is paid out of the poor rate in individual parishes.

49. Chairman.] Are you aware that a portion of the county rate is not levied with the poor rate, but there is a county rate which is levied independently?—A portion of it is certainly.

50. In Mr. Ward Hunt's return you find, do you not, the sum which is levied separately?—Yes; it is only levied separately from the poor rate where the parish is divided by the boundary line of the county. If a parish lies in two counties, the half of the parish which lies in the one county must have a separate rate levied to pay the county rate; or if it is divided by the boundary line of a borough, there is a special rate levied in each half of the parish; but those special rates are precisely analogous to the poor rate in every respect.

Mr. D. P. Fry.

51. Sir James Lawrence.] In the return which you have been asked to make of those different rates, could you classify them according to the basis upon which they are respectively assessed?—Yes; you may find that that classification will come out very similar to this.

52. Mr. Pell.] Do you mean the old sewers rate in the county, or are you confining that term to the more modern acceptation of the word?—The sewers rate, as such, is a rate levied by the Commissioners of Sewers, appointed by the Lord Chancellor, under the old Act of Henry the 8th, in various parts of the country.

53. Mr. Acland.] Are they all levied on the same system; for instance, in Lincolnshire and Somersetshire, is the law the same?—The law is the same, but I believe the practice is very different.

54. Chairman.] To go through the basis upon which the new rates are levied, the second rate which you came to was the general district rate; on what basis is that levied?—The general district rates are levied by the local boards direct, and they are assessed upon the occupier in the same way as the poor rate, although just as in the poor rate the owner may be assessed instead of the occupier in certain cases.

55. The general district rate is not paid out of the poor rate?—It is not paid out of the poor rate, and it is assessed quite independently of the poor rate, but it is assessed upon the same kinds of property and the same classes of persons, but with this difference, that the contribution is different from the houses, and from tithes, arable lands, market gardens, canals, and railways. The houses pay the full amount, and the tithes, arable land, market gardens, canals, and railways pay one-fourth.

56. The next that you come to are the highway boards, burial boards, baths and washhouses; those are not separate rates, are they?—They may be under certain circumstances, but generally they are paid out of the poor rate. The highway board does not make any rates, but it calls by precept for the money that it requires from the overseers of the parishes included in the highway district; but if the whole parish is not in the district, but only a part of it, then the highway board send their precept to the waywarden and not to the overseers, and the waywarden then makes a separate rate upon that particular portion of the parish which is included in that district.

57. In fact, it is something analogous, is it not, to the county rate?—Yes, it follows the same principle.

58. Where they have got one area to deal with, it is paid out of the poor rate, is it not?—According to the terms of the Act where the poor law parish and the highway parish are identical, the payment is made out of the poor rate, but where the poor law parish and the highway parish are not co-extensive the precept is addressed to the waywarden, who makes a separate rate upon the highway parish.

59. Will you state what is the situation as regards the burial rate?—The principle there is very similar. A burial board district is formed according to the provisions of the Act, and the burial board calls for money from the overseers. If the parish is wholly within the district the overseers pay it from the poor rate; but if the parish is not wholly within the district, but a portion of it only, then it is paid out of a separate rate, but that separate rate is levied in precisely the same manner as the poor rate; and in boroughs where the town council act as the burial board, it is paid either out of the borough fund or out of the borough rate.

60. How is it as regards baths and washhouses?—That also is very similar. If it is in a borough the expense is paid out of the borough fund or the borough rate, and if it is under a local board it is paid out of the general district rate.

61. The next is the public library and museum rate; how is that rate paid?—In boroughs that is paid out of the borough fund or the borough rate; and under improvement commissioners it is paid out of the improvement rate—that I have not got in my series, because, as I explained, they are all under local Acts; but under the Public Libraries and Museums Act improvement commissioners may establish a library and pay the expense out of the improvement rate; in other cases it is paid out of a special rate. Where a public library and museum is established elsewhere than in a borough or under improvement commissioners, it is paid out of a special rate which is levied like the poor rate; but the agricultural lands and market gardens are rated at one-third only.

62. Will you now look at the next rate on your list?—That is the sewage utilization rate, levied under the Sewer Authorities Act, which I have explained, and it is very similar as regards the scale of contribution to that just described; it is a separate rate to be levied like the poor rate, but the tithes, arable lands, market gardens, and other similar property, are rated at one-fourth only.

63. Those sewer authorities must be separated, must they not, from the sewer rate and special drainage rate which you referred to previously?—They are quite distinct.

64. The sewer authorities for the sewage utilization are urban authorities generally?—No; they may be constituted in the country also, all over the kingdom. In the towns and boroughs there are Local Boards Acts; but in the parishes in the country the vestry is constituted the sewer authority by the recent Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 113.

65. Is it in the country that land is only valued at one-fourth for this purpose?—Everywhere it is only valued at one-fourth.

66. Sir James Lawrence.] Do you draw a distinction between the sewage authority and the sewers commission?—Yes, they are quite distinct. The sewer authorities are quite modern, within the last few years.

67. Mr. Fielden.] Do they levy a separate rate for it?—Yes; the object of making a separate rate distinct from the poor rate is to provide for the difference in the scale of contributions.

68. Chairman.] That circumstance of the exemption of this graded rate, as an honourable Member has called it, has affected the whole series of those rates that you have mentioned, has it not?—Exactly so; that is the reason why they have been required to be separate rates, levied separately from the poor rate; but as regards the basis, i. e., the kinds of property, and the valuation, they follow the poor rate, but the scale of contribution is different.

69. What have you to say with regard to the Animals Contagious Diseases Act?—There is a distinction drawn between the compensation for slaughtered slaughtered animals and the other expenses incurred under the Act, and it is either to be levied as a separate rate, or be paid out of the existing rates, according to the district in which they are. Either the county rate or the metropolitan consolidated rate, or the borough rate, or the police rate; but the amount is to be specified in the demand when it is collected from the individual ratepayer; for this reason, that he is authorised by the Act to deduct from his rent one-half of the rate which he pays for the slaughtered animals, but not for the general expenses.

70. That exhausts your list, does it not, with the exception of the metropolis rates?—Yes.

71. Having gone through the whole of those rates, is it the fact that there are rates levied under local Acts which you have not enumerated?—Yes.

72. Have you enumerated so far what you may call rates levied under general Acts all over the country?—Yes, under general Acts all over the country.

73. That is to say, those Acts are not necessarily in force all over the country?—No.

74. But when they are levied, they are levied under general Acts, not under local Acts?—Yes, the general Acts are applicable all over the country, but they are not in all cases applied all over the country.

75. But besides those there are local rates, are there not, levied specially in various districts under local Acts?—Yes.

76. Are you aware of there being any statement that gives a history or an analysis of those local Acts?—I never met with one, and it has never yet been done, as far as I know.

77. Therefore, the aggregate of the local taxation would not be represented by the total addition of the sum levied under the rates which you have specified?—No.

78. But the further sum it would be difficult to ascertain?—It would be very difficult to ascertain.

79. To go back to your first list of rates, would you state, as regards the poor rate, to what other purposes the poor rate is applied besides what you may call the poor relief proper?—In my work on the local taxes, in 1846, I enumerated the secondary purposes which were at that time cast upon the poor rate. I said that there were upwards of 20 distinct purposes besides the primary object, that primary object being the relief of the poor.

80. Which 20 objects have very little to do with the poor relief at all?—Yes; I will read them. They are as follows:—The cost of prosecuting persons for keeping disorderly houses; the expenses incurred by constables in doing the business of the parish; half the expenses incurred by overseers in prosecuting masters for ill-treatment of parish apprentices; the cost of prosecuting pawnbrokers in certain cases; the fine for not providing militia men; the remuneration of the examiners of measures, and the cost of procuring measures in certain cases; the salaries, allowances, and compensations payable to gaolers and others in certain cases; the costs of making out, preparing, printing, and collecting the jury lists; the costs of prosecuting for felonies and misdemeanours in places not contributing to any county rate; the compensations payable by the hundred in places not contributing to any county rate (those are, of course, special provisions, and they are only to meet particular cases); the expenses of emigration in certain cases; the cost of offices, books, and forms for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, and the fees to the registrars; the maintenance of lunatics suspected of crime (since that time the Criminal Lunatics Act has been much extended); the expenses of public vaccination; the expenses of taking the census of the population in June 1841 (of course that occurs every 10 years); the discharge of outstanding parish debts, liabilities, and engagements (which is a special provision); the fees and allowances payable to justices' clerks and parish constables, and the salaries of parish constables under the Parish Constables Act, in substitution, in fact, of the old constables rate; the expenses incurred by the town clerks and returning officers of cities and boroughs, and by overseers of the poor in carrying into effect the Act relating to the Registration of Voters and the election of Members of Parliament; the expenses properly incurred on the triennial perambulation of parish boundaries, and in setting up and repairing the boundary stones; the expense of fencing, draining, and levelling lands allotted under the Commons Inclosure Act for the exercise and recreation of the inhabitants.

81. Mr. Corrance.] There is a power, is there not, for hiring separate cottages within a parish for the reception of persons afflicted with any contagious disease?—I am not quite sure whether that Act has been repealed, but it certainly has not been acted upon of late years. It was acted upon at one time; there were a great many pest-houses, but it has not been acted upon for many years. I believe that a great many of those pest-houses were provided quite illegally.

82. Chairman.] Will you state the heads into which the accounts relating to the poor rate are generally divided now for all those purposes?—Poor relief; the cost of legal proceedings connected with relief; constables' expenses; expenses under the Registration Act; vaccination fees; Parliamentary and municipal registration; and expenses under Parochial Assessment Acts.

83. And then there is another column, parochial expenditure for all other purposes?—Yes, that is very comprehensive.

84. Mr. Corrance.] Under what precepts are those severally levied; that is to say, who issues the power for them, and under what precepts?—There is a great variety; they are all paid under those special Acts of Parliament which I have specified, and which provide very various modes of doing it. For instance, in prosecuting for keeping disorderly houses, there is special provision under the Act as to the mode in which it is to be done.

85. Some of the precepts would come from the clerk of the peace, would they not?—Yes.

86. Would some be levied by the overseers themselves under parochial powers?—Some would be paid by the overseers under the provisions of particular Acts.

87. Chairman.] Would this be correct, that besides the poor relief there are various purposes which represent the legal business of the parish which come out of the poor rate?—Quite so; that is to say, by the parish you mean also the union.

88. Since 1846 what have been the new Acts which have been passed imposing charges upon the poor rate?—I do not think that there are any

15 March 1870.

Acts which have imposed specifically new charges on the poor rate as such, except those which I have specified already as charging the poor rate indirectly, through the medium of those various boards. For instance, the burial board may be called a new charge upon the poor rate, and the baths and washhouses may be called a new charge upon the poor rate; but it is an indirect charge; it is a charge through the medium of the baths and washhouses authorities.

89. Is it your general impression that where there has been a new charge, which Parliament has desired to impose for local purposes, and where it has been over a limited area, the poor rate has always been taken as a convenient way of levying it?—It has been so whenever the whole parish is included within the district; but where the parish is not wholly included within the district, or where there is a different scale of contribution,—in those two cases a special rate has been required.

90. Could you state roughly what proportion of the aggregate poor rate is levied for those purposes; would it be about one-third of the aggregate poor rate levied for purposes quite unconnected with poor relief?—I should not like to answer that question off hand, because I have not examined it.

91. Mr. Pell.] Where the local board has jurisdiction only over a part of the parish, I presume that the whole would be levied as a separate rate, and not paid out of the poor rate?—The Act generally requires that there should be a separate rate levied in the same manner as the poor rate upon the particular portion of the parish which is to be charged, or in the case of a rate where there is a different scale of contribution over the whole parish; it is similar to the poor rate, but it is in a separate book, and collected separately.

92. Chairman.] Will you go through the county rate and state the purposes for which that is applied, in the same way as you have done with regard to the poor rate?—I am not prepared at the present moment to specify the new charges which have been placed upon the county rate since 1846; I should not be prepared to say off hand certainly, as I am not so familiar with the county rate as with the poor rate.

93. Your official connection with the Poor Law Board has made you more conversant with the poor rate than with the county rate?—Just so.

94. With regard to the poor rate, the poor rate is always levied upon the occupier, is it not?—Yes, except where the owner is substituted for the occupier.

95. Would you state the principle of those rates generally, as regards their imposition upon the owner and the occupier—that is, taking the whole of the series which we have been now considering?—I think that except the church rate, with regard to which the law was always very doubtful, the only rate which is required by law to be assessed directly upon the owner in respect of his ownership,—not as a substitute for the occupier, but in respect of his ownership,—is the sewer rate, and the special drainage rate, which is the modern representative of it. That is the only rate, as far as I know, in which the owner is assessed in respect of his ownership.

96. Mr. Pell.] Do you mean by the general Act of Parliament?—Yes.

97. Chairman.] You draw a distinction between the owner being rated where he is rated for the purpose of convenience instead of the tenant under the Compound Householders Act, and similar Acts, and where he is rated in his own capacity as owner?—I draw a very marked distinction between the two. If he is rated as a substitute for the occupier, the rate is in fact upon the occupation; if the owner is assessed directly, it is in respect of his ownership.

98. Mr. Rathbone.] Did I rightly understand you to say that sewers rate is empowered to be levied directly upon the owner?—Yes; and also the special drainage rate, which is levied on the owner in certain cases; there is a special provision about it. Under the Land Drainage Act of 1861, the rate for improvements or new works, not exceeding 1,000 l., shall be deemed to be a special rate, and shall be deemed to be a tax on the owner of the property, the owner being defined to be the person entitled to the rack-rent.

99. Are you aware of the object of that limitation?—I do not know what the object was; I can only guess.

100. Are you aware whether the receiver of the rack-rent could go back upon any previous owner?—Not under the Act, certainly not.

101. Sir James Lawrence.] Strictly speaking, that would seem to imply that it was the leaseholder, and not the freeholder, who was charged with that tax?—He might be the long leaseholder. The word "owner" is used in so many senses in Acts of Parliament, especially in connection with this subject.

102. Chairman.] In this case the owner is distinctly defined to be the person entitled to the rack-rent?—Precisely.

103. And if he were the freeholder, it would be the freeholder?—He might be the freeholder, but he might be the long leaseholder.

104. Are you aware of any rate that goes back to the various owners in proportion to the poundage which is raised?—Not in proportion to the poundage; but the sewers rate itself goes back not only to the owner, but to the prospective owner, for it includes the reversioners and the remainder men.

105. Could you explain that a little more fully?—Originally the sewer rate under the Act of the 23rd Hen. 8, c. 5, is to be assessed, according to the Act, upon everyone who hath or holdeth lands within the district which may be injured or benefited; and the courts have held that that includes reversioners and remainder men after an estate for life or years, but not in expectancy; it goes beyond the assessment upon the actual owner; it includes even the prospective owner.

106. Mr. Corrance.] Are you aware that the Commissioners have a right to define and tax the subjects of occupation enumerated, besides those enumerated in the statute?—Yes.

107. It comprehends mines, woodlands, mountainous and high lands, and several others; also, tenants, rents, commons, and profits of fishings; also, private furnaces, ferries, and easements, and various other species of incorporeal hereditaments. Are you aware that the Commissioners have power to levy upon all those different properties?—Not upon mountainous and high lands; they are exempted, not by the Act, but by the construction of the courts.

108. Chairman.] As regards the general sewers tax levied under 4 & 5 Vict., that is a special tax, tax, is it not, to be levied upon the occupier?—Yes, that is levied upon the occupier by the Act, and the reason of that is, that it is a tax for the annual contingent expenses.

109. Are the contingent expenses levied upon the occupier?—Yes.

110. But the expenses of the permanent works in theory were to be levied upon the owner?—That is the theory, but it is not the practice.

111. That has been the theory of all legislation upon sewers, has it not?—Yes.

112. Can you state whether, in practice, the rates have been levied upon the occupier, or upon the owner, notwithstanding the law?—I believe that the practice, as far as I know anything about it, is to levy from the occupier, who deducts it from the rent, so that it is ultimately levied upon the owner. I believe that that practice has arisen from the convenience of the case.

113. If there is no contract to the contrary in the lease, the occupier would deduct the sewers rate from the landlord, would he not?—I believe he would do so in practice; but I should like to say, that although it is a popular impression that it is a landlord's tax, and although it seems to have been the object of the Act of Henry the 8th that it should be a landlord's tax, a recent decision of the Queen's Bench has decided that it is a tenant's tax. In the case of the Queen and Hall Dare, which came before the Court of Queen's Bench some three or four years ago, the question was, whether the sewers rate was to be be deducted as one of the usual tenant's rates and taxes in ascertaining the rateable value under the Parochial Assessment Act, and the Court of Queen's Bench decided that it was one of the usual tenant's rates and taxes, which ought to be deducted or allowed for in computing the gross estimated rental.

114. That is the first decision, is it not, that has been given in that direction?—Yes; I have quoted the Lord Chief Justices' remarks.

115. Did the Chief Justice make use of these words, "I think we are authorised to say that these rates (namely, the sewers rate and the general sewers tax), are tenant's taxes"?—Yes.

116. Will you state the remainder of the Lord Chief Justice's decision?—It is as follows: "The old Sewers Act, the 23rd of Henry the Eighth, directs the Commissioners to inquire 'who hath or holdeth any lands or tenements' in the neighbourhood, 'and every of them, to tax, assess, and charge,' 'after the quantity of their lands, &c., after the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit;' and I apprehend that whenever the Commissioners find any one in possession of land they are bound to tax him. What would be the position of the imaginary tenant from year to year in occupation within this district? He is liable according to the quantity of his interest, and as this is an annual assessment, he would be liable to pay it." (That is, a tenant from year to year.) "I find nothing in the Act, either expressly declared or leading to the inference, that a tenant from year to year is not included, or that he will be reimbursed by the landlord; the inference is rather the other way, as the Commissioners must distinguish and tax according only to the quantity and tenure. If this be so, this is a tax which the tenant would be liable to be assessed for and to pay, and would therefore be properly a tenant's tax; by which I understand a tax which the tenant in occupation is not only bound primarily but ultimately to pay." That was the decision of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn.

117. That is entirely contrary, is it not, to the received views upon the subject of the sewers tax?—I think it may be reconciled in this way, that under the 23rd of Henry the Eighth the sewers rate is to be laid both upon the owner and the occupier, according to their several interests; and that each is liable to pay so much as is assessed upon him; that where the occupier pays the owner's share he can recover it by deducting it from the rent; but that he is not entitled to deduct from his rent that portion of the sewers rate, if there be any, which is assessed upon himself as occupier. It is evident from the Act of Henry the 8th that it was not confined to what we should call owners, that is, to landlords; the persons living there were liable to be charged as well as the owners, because it was the persons who did the damage who were to be assessed, or those who received damage and got the benefit, and, therefore, it included the occupiers as well as the owners. What I understand the Queen's Bench to have decided is, that where the occupier has to pay, it is a tenant's tax, and is to be deducted or allowed for accordingly.

118. The sewers tax is nearly the only tax, is it not, which has been regarded as an owner's tax?—Yes; there was another Act of Parliament passed a few years ago for the improvement of lands, in addition to the drainage of lands. The Drainage of Land Act was passed in 1861, and the Improvement of Land Act was passed in 1864, and that provides that the tenant or occupier may agree to bear a portion of the charge for improvements; but that is his own voluntary act.

119. This is not the special drainage rate?—No, it is an additional Act passed in 1864. It is, perhaps, hardly to be called a rate, but it charges the land with improvements which may be carried out under the Act, and it so far bears upon the subject that it enables the tenant to bear a portion of it if he thinks fit; if he does not he is entitled to deduct the whole amount from the rent.

120. What is the name of the charge?—The improvement of land; the other is the drainage of land.

121. What is the object of that charge?—It is for doing other works besides drainage.

122. Mr. Gregory.] That is in respect of money borrowed, is it not?—Yes, that is in respect of money borrowed. It is not a rate, it is a part of a series of Acts for the improvement of land. It is connected with this subject, but it is a private affair; it is not a public rate.

123. Chairman.] Is this what is commonly called a private improvement rate?—Yes, I think it is.

124. Will you state, as to those private improvement rates, in what proportion a man may deduct them from his rent?—In this particular case he may bear any proportion that he selects himself; it is a matter of agreement.

125. Is it left entirely to agreement?—Quite so.

126. If there is no agreement, who bears them?—He deducts the whole from the rent, and the owner bears the rate.

127. Is there not one rate where it depends upon whether the rack-rent is the full rent?—In the Drainage of Land Act the owner is described as being the person entitled to the rack-rack-rent. I do not think otherwise it makes any difference.

128. Is there not a clause in some Act which is something to this effect: that if the rent is the rack-rent then the tenant may deduct the rate from it; but if it is less than the rack-rent then a certain proportion is charged to the tenant?—There may be such an Act, but I do not remember it at this moment.

129. Sir James Lawrence.] You stated, did you not, that the person who received the rack-rent was to be regarded as the owner?—That is the definition of the Act of Parliament. The person entitled to the rack-rent is to be regarded as the owner for the purposes of that Act of 1861.

130. Chairman.] Are you aware whether, in the case of any of the local rates, there is a provision, as there is in the income tax, that prevents the tenant agreeing to pay the whole, because, as you are aware, in the case of the income tax, the tenant is bound to deduct it from his rent?—No; I think I may say positively that that is not the case.

131. Otherwise the landlord can compel the tenant to agree to pay even the landlord's rates?—Yes; though I think there is some provision to prevent that with respect to the cattle plague rate.

132. Can the tenant make an agreement with his landlord to pay the metropolitan sewer rates?—Yes, he can do so.

133. Therefore, the fact is this, that as regards the legislation on local rates, whether the charges are imposed upon the owners or not, the effect of the Act of Parliament can be neutralised by contracts between the owners and occupiers?—Yes; there is a special provision in the Metropolitan Act of last Session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 102) that it shall not interfere with any agreement between landlord and tenant in this respect, but that "where any portion of the consolidated rate represents any rate, which for the purposes of any contract or otherwise is deemed to be a landlord's or tenant's rate, such portion shall for those purposes be deemed to be such landlord's or tenant's rate as the case may be."

134. The Act has gone out of its way to give the owners and the occupiers the freedom of settling who is to pay the rates?—Yes, exactly.

135. As a matter of fact, the result has been that the occupiers pay the rates in almost every instance?—No doubt.

136. Are you aware whether, as a matter of practice, the sewers rates are ever paid by the owners directly in the metropolis?—I am not aware that it is so.

137. Mr. Gregory.] With respect to the Metropolitan Act, and with respect to rates made under that Act, does that Act throw them primâ facie on the occupier or on the owner?—It is on the occupier primarily, but as regards the sewers rate it is provided that the tenant may deduct it from the rent, where he would have been entitled to do so if this Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) had not been passed.

138. Chairman.] The Metropolitan Board of Works has not imposed the new rate upon the owner?—No, it is to be upon the occupier; but it provides that where any portion of the consolidated rate represents any rate, which for the purposes of any contract or otherwise, is deemed to be a landlord's or a tenant's rate, such portion shall, for those purposes, be deemed to be either a landlord's or a tenant's rate, as the case may be; but that I understand to refer to an agreement between the landlord and the tenant.

139. Are you aware that that clause was put in partly on account of the great difficulty of defining what the landlord's rates were and what were the occupier's, and it was in order not to change the Legislation upon the subject, but to allow the old system to continue?—Quite so.

140. Mr. Corrance.] In the case there was such an agreement existing between the owner and the occupier; if the occupier made default in his payment, would it be legal to levy a distress upon his property for the rate?—If the occupier was assessed it would be recoverable by distress.

141. Chairman.] Even as regards the owner's rates, if the owner does not pay, the distress would be levied upon the occupier, would it not?—Yes; that is expressly so provided in the sewers rate.

142. Everywhere wherever the owner is rated I understand that the authorities have always kept the occupier responsible for the payment of the rate, as far as his chattels are concerned?—That would be so in the metropolis; it was not quite so under the old sewers rate; if the old sewers rate was levied according to the provisions of the Act of Henry the Eighth they might sell the land in case of non-payment.

143. Mr. Birley.] In a case where the rate is laid expressly upon the owner, if there be special conditions in the lease that the occupier shall pay all the landlord's rates, would in any instance the Act of Parliament override the terms of the lease?—I apprehend that the two things would be quite distinct. If there were a rate made upon the owner, which I do not believe there is in fact, but if there were it would be recovered from the owner; and if the occupier has undertaken, by a covenant in his lease, to pay it, the owner would have his remedy against the tenant, but that would not affect the officer levying the rate in the slightest degree.

144. Mr. Rathbone.] With reference to your last answer, are there not those two cases which were mentioned just now of the income tax and the Contagious Diseases Act, in which the law does override agreements to pay the tax?—I understand the question to refer to levying the rate, which does not appear to me to be in the slightest degree affected by the covenants of a lease; the covenants would affect the two parties to the lease, but not the officer levying the rates; but the rates are, in fact, levied upon the occupier.

145. Sir Massey Lopes.] All rates are primarily levied, are they not, upon the occupier?—Yes, no doubt.

146. It is quite true that the Government come down upon the occupier, and he is the responsible person, but may there not be a private arrangement, as between the landlord and tenant, that even income tax should be paid by the occupier?—Yes; there is nothing in the law to prevent it, unless there was an express provision in the Act to prevent its being done, and, in that case, the covenant or the agreement, if entered into, could not be enforced. No law could possibly prevent the tenant from carrying it out, if he chose, but it could prevent the owner from enforcing if the occupier refused to adhere to the covenant.

147. Mr. Pell.] Did I rightly understand you to say, with reference to the metropolitan sewers rate, that the landlord could contract himself out of the operation of the Act, that is to say, out of the payment of the one-third by an agreement with the tenant, which is the same thing in practice?

tice?—Yes; I am not aware that there is anything to prevent that, if the tenant likes to undertake to pay it.

148. Mr. Fielden.] Under this Act of Hen. 8, I think you say that the land was seized in distress?—Yes; the occupier was liable, no doubt, for his portion, but it was to be assessed according to the interests which each person had in it, if it was actually assessed upon the landlord, and not paid, the land might be sold; there is a special provision in the Act that the sale must be registered in the Court of Chancery, and then it is binding against all parties, even against the reversioner and the remainder man.

149. But there is nothing of that kind in modern Acts, is there?—No; that is a special provision in the Act of Hen. 8; it is very precise and very positive.

150. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Is not this the upshot of all this inquiry, that all rates are finally levied upon the occupier, but everything is subject to arrangement, and all that can be done is to recover from the occupier in case of legal proceedings being instituted?—Yes, subject to those exceptions which I have already named with regard to the owner's liability.

151. And even that could be made a matter of arrangement between the owner and the occupier; between the remainder man or the reversioner on the one side, and the holder or the occupier on the other?—Certainly; I am not aware of anything to prevent it.

152. Mr. Gregory.] With respect to this consolidated metropolitan improvement rate, does that include the sewers rate under the general Act?—An Act was passed last year, I think, under which all the rates are put up together and called the metropolitan consolidated rate.

153. And that includes the sewers rate, as I understand?—No, it does not include the sewers rate, because the sewers rate is levied by vestries and district boards, but the metropolitan consolidated rate is not.

154. The sewers rate is still in existence in addition to that, is it not, under the statute of Henry the 8th?—Not in the metropolis, under the statute of Henry the 8th; it is really under Sir Benjamin Hall's Act, it is under the special provisions of that statute.

155. Then there is this consolidated rate under the Metropolitan Board, and there is the sewers rate under the vestries?—Yes; there is a rate under the vestries and district boards, which includes the sewers rate, but which also includes other things; it includes the sewers rate, the general expenses of the vestry or the board, and the lighting rate.

156. What would paving and flagging come under?—That would come under the general improvement rate.

157. But is there not a power of throwing a portion of it upon the owner?—Yes, there is.

158. Chairman.] Will you state what the power is as to throwing the rate upon the owner?—I do not know that it is the paving rate; it is the cost of the paving which is laid upon the owner, which is a different thing; I should say it is not a paving rate, but the cost of the paving.

159. Mr. Gregory.] Is not that which is levied upon the owner carried to the credit of the rate?—Of course it would be practically so, either before or after.

160. And of course the pavement is debited to the rate?—Yes.

161. You told us, did you not, that the sewers rate under the Act of Henry the 8th, was charged upon the remainder man or the reversioner?—It might be.

162. Do I understand you aright, that it is apportioned between the tenant for life and the reversioner?—Yes, in cases where this is done it is apportioned by the Commissioners according to their view of the interests of the respective parties; it is left entirely to the Commissioners.

163. Although the remainder man, of course, is not in possession, still he may be made liable to the rates?—The remainder man after an estate for life or years, but not the remainder man in expectancy.

164. That is to say, the vested remainder may be made liable to the rate?—Yes.

165. Although the remainder man is not in possession of the property?—Quite so.

166. Chairman.] With regard to the case of mines, the owner is rated for the poor rates instead of the occupier in certain cases, is he not, under the general law?—He is rated for the produce of the mine when it is delivered to him in kind, but in that case he is not considered by the court to be rated for the mine, but for the land.

167. But the occupier of the mine is not rated in certain cases, where the produce of the mine is paid to the landlord in kind?—No; the occupier is not rated for any mine, except a coal mine.

168. But in those cases where the landlord is rated in respect of the produce which he receives from mines, other than coal mines, he is not rated as a landlord, but he is supposed, is he not, to be occupying the land to that extent?—Precisely so.

169. Therefore, although for all practical purposes he is the owner of the mine, and one may say that the owner is rated, yet he is rated qua occupier of the land?—Yes.

170. And that would not be an instance where the theory of the law is that the owner is rated?—No, it certainly would not be an instance of the theory, whatever you may consider it in fact.

171. Speaking generally, are the owners of mines, other than coal mines, rated to the poor?—The owners of mines, other than coal mines, are not rated, except when they receive the produce in kind.

172. Is the position this, that the occupiers of coal mines are rated in the ordinary way?—Yes.

173. In the case of some other mines the owners, when they are paid in the produce of the mines, are rated, but if they receive money then they are not rated?—If they receive money they are not rated, but if they receive the produce of the mine in kind they are rated as being occupiers of the land to that extent; that is with regard to underground mines, but open workings are rated to the occupier.

174. One might call it straining the law to say that the owner was the occupier of the land, but he has been treated so, has he not, by legal decisions?—Quite so; that is the result of the decisions.

175. Could you on some other day give the Committee the details, or let us have a paper stating the decisions?—I can state it at once. I should say that the dispute arose first in 1762, which was about 160 years after the passing of the Act of Elizabeth, and there was very great inquiry then as to whether the mines had, in fact, been rated prior to that time, and it was ascertained that they had in some cases been rated, but generally speaking they had not; and after a great deal of argument and a great deal of consideration, the court came to the conclusion that mines, other than coal mines, were intended to be exempted by the Act, on the ground that coal mines were solely mentioned; that coal mines were not to be taken for an example, but for an exception.

176. Upon the theory of expressio unius exclusio alterius?—Yes. The first case was the case of the Lead Company v. Richardson, and that was the ground upon which the original decision went, although there was a very great deal of doubt whether it was not intended that the occupier should be rated originally. That being the result that was come to in the case of the Lead Company v. Richardson, of course there was a great deal of dissatisfaction about it, and ultimately a case came before the courts of the owner having reserved the royalty in kind, and then by an extremely ingenious process they arrived at the conclusion that it was an occupation of the land by the owner to that extent, and that he was rateable as occupier of the land, and not as owner of the mine.

177. But where he was paid in money instead of in produce, that ingenious interpretation could no longer be applied, and he would be free, and has gone free to this day?— He could not be rated for the money, because they decided in other cases that money is not rateable as such.

178. So that the owner is rated as the occupier of the land in the case of mines other than coal mines, in respect of the produce which he receives in kind?—Yes.

179. Mr. Gregory.] Is it only in respect of the produce which he receives in kind that he is rated?—Only in respect of that.

180. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is not this the distinction, that the owner is rated upon the corpus of the property?—That is not the distinction drawn by the court.

181. Mr. Pell.] Do I understand you correctly that in the case where an owner took his royalty of 1-16th in kind of a mine worked from a shaft, he would be rated, but that the other 15-16ths would not be rated?—That is decidedly the present state of the law.

182. Mr. St. Aubyn.] In fact, he is rated upon the proportion of the produce which he receives, whatever that proportion may be, provided that proportion is paid in kind?—Yes, and the rest is not rated at all.

183. Mr. Wheelhouse.] In the case of stone quarrying, there are some places where stone is dug from a shaft, and in other cases, as we all know, it is quarried from the depth, as it is called; is there any distinction between the two cases with respect to the incidence of the rating?—Yes; the stone that is obtained from an open quarry is rateable, and the stone that is obtained from an underground shaft is not rateable.

184. Although it should come from the same parish?—Yes; it does not depend upon the nature of the substance, but upon the mode of working.

185. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Are you aware of the case of a copper mine in the Isle of Anglesea, where part of the workings were open and part of them were underground; and the part of the mine that was underground was not rated, but the open workings were, on account of their being considered a quarry?—I was not aware of it, but I have no doubt that it is so; it certainly is so in law.

186. Mr. Walter.] Can you state whether any rate is leviable in respect of chalk dug from a chalk pit?—Yes, certainly; any open chalk pits are certainly rateable.

187. Is the rating upon the estimated value of the chalk, or is it upon an estimate based upon the value of the soil of the surface?—It is to be upon the annual value of the corpus which is taken; that is the decision of the court in the case of brick-fields. The court decided that brick-fields were to be rated according to the annual value of the produce, even though it took away the corpus.

188. Chairman.] That is to say, what the brick-field would let for from year to year, with the power of working?—Yes, and taking the corpus away.

189. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Does the decision to which you referred, by which owners are rated in respect of the portion of the produce paid in kind, lead to the substitution of money payments for payment in kind?—No doubt it does so to a very great extent.

190. And the consequence is that with very few exceptions the owners of mines are now paid their proportion of the produce in money, and thereby escape the payment of rates altogether?—That is the result.

191. Mr. Birley.] Is it possible that the theory can be that the surface of the land is rated, but not the interior, and that, therefore, when you have an open quarry it would be rated as such?—No. It depends entirely upon the language of the Act of Elizabeth, which refers to coal mines, and everything which was a mine but was not a coal mine was held by the court to be exempt from rates. Therefore the question was whether the mode of working constituted it a mine or not; and the court decided that open working in a quarry did not constitute a mine, but that underground workings did constitute a mine, without reference to the nature of the substance which is obtained; therefore, whether it was stone, or whether it was lead or copper, or any other metal, it was established that the underground working constituted a mine, which was exempt from rate.

192. Chairman.] Could not the substance of the matter be shortly stated in this way; that it was felt that the Act of Elizabeth worked some injustice, and was rather anomalous, and the interpretation has been strained in order to carry it as far as possible?—I suppose that is the effect.

193. As regards railways the owners of railways are rated; but would you say that they are rated as owners or as occupiers?—Certainly as occupiers. They are rated as occupying the land for the purposes of the support of the railway; they do not cultivate the land; the land produces nothing under the railway at all.

194. Mr. Walter.] Are they rated in respect of the profits made from the length of the line that passes through a particular locality?—No; they are rated upon what is supposed to be the letting value of the lands which they occupy for the purposes of supporting the railway.

195. Sir Massey Lopes.] It is upon the mileage profit, is it not?—With a great number of deductions, it is upon the earnings within each parish.

196. Chairman.

196. Chairman.] It is not upon the general profits of the whole of the railway, divided at so much per mile, but each parish is taken into account, is it not, by itself?—Yes; the principle contended for in the first instance was the mileage principle.

197. Mr. Backhouse.] Can you tell the Committee upon what principle coal mines are rated, where the owners of the royalty bear no charge for poor rates?—I believe they are rated very differently in different places, and that it is practically very much a matter of compromise between the overseers and the owners of the mines, They value it and go into a calculation; it is very much upon the same plan as a railway; they take the produce of the mine for a year, the amount of the tonnage at the pit's mouth, and they deduct the working expenses.

198. Chairman.] Will you state whether it is the owner or the occupier that is rated?—The occupier.

199. Mr. St. Aubyn.] There is no general principle applicable to all the coal mines throughout the country, is there?—No.

200. It is the case, is it not, that even in adjoining mines they are rated differently?—Yes, I believe it is a compromise in every case; the law says nothing about it. The occupiers are rated by law unquestionably, but I believe that in every case they get at a compromise; it is so difficult and complicated that it is hardly possible to do it otherwise.

201. Mr. Backhouse.] Does the owner of the royalty bear any proportion of the rating?—The royalty is certainly not rated as such, and I do not think that it enters as an element into the calculation in the assessment of coal mines.

202. Mr. St. Aubyn.] You are, no doubt, aware of the distinction between royalty and rent, properly so called, that royalty is a portion of the produce?—Quite so; but royalty may be paid in money too.

203. And that that money represents the value of the proportion of the produce?—Yes.

204. It is not a case of fixed money rent?—Quite so.

205. Chairman.] Have you anything more to say to the Committee as regards cases where the owner is rated?—No; I think I have mentioned all the cases that I have come across.

206. Mr. Gregory.] With respect to the rating of coal mines, are you aware whether the general principle has ever been applied or attempted to be applied of rating a coal mine as a profitable occupation, as a tenant's occupation, in fact?—No, I do not know that it has. I dare say the overseers very often put the rate very high.

207. But you are not aware whether it has not been reduced to that, either judicially or in practice?—No.

208. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Will you state distinctly your opinion that in the case of mines the owner is not really rated as the owner, he is only rated as the occupier?—He is rated as the occupier only.

209. Therefore it cannot be said in the case of mines that the owner is rated?—No, certainly not.

210. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion upon the general point, as to whether in the long run it makes any difference as to whether the rate is put upon the owner or the occupier?—I should think it would make this difference, that if the occupier undertakes to pay a certain fixed rent, and also to pay the rates, it would make all the difference to him whether the rates exceeded or fell short of the amount which he estimates that he will be called upon to pay. If a man takes a house at 50 l. a year, upon the understanding that the rates will be 20 l. a year, and if, by his skilful management as a guardian or an overseer, he can reduce them to 10 l. a year, he puts 10 l. into his pocket, and therefore it does make a difference to him whether the rate is paid through the rent or independent of the rent, and so it would be with the owner; if the whole amount were paid by the owner, it would make all the difference to him whether the rates were reduced or increased; but it is only to that extent, as it seems to me.

211. In fact the point is this, that that portion of the rates which constitute an increase or a decrease between the periods of adjustment of rents would be borne by the parties upon whom the rates are put in the first instance?—Precisely; it is in that interval, as it appears to me, that there is the result that if the occupier can diminish it he gets the benefit, and if it is increased he loses, because he never can recover that portion from the owner.

212. Would you go this much further, that when you come to the re-adjustment of the rent, if there is no disturbance of occupation, the party who is to take the first step in asking for a reduction of rent or an increase of rent, in consequence of increased or decreased rates, would have the worst of it in the bargain?—Perhaps he might; I do not know that he would.

213. Supposing there was a tenancy which had come to an end, and a negotiation ensued for its renewal, do you not think that that person would be in a favourable position who had to take the initiative in asking for a reduction or an increase of rent, in consequence of the change in the rates, rather than the person who would be content to continue on the old footing was asked for it?—It might enter as one element, but I do not think it would be a decisive element. I think the decisive element would be the actual facts of the case, and not the accident of the origination of the proposal.

214. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you think that there would be any benefit to the occupier by any alteration of existing arrangements?—Perhaps it is a subject which I have not fully considered so as to be able to give an opinion upon it.

215. Do you think that it would have the effect of disturbing existing arrangements, if there was any legislation to make the owner pay any proportion of the rates?—As far as I can judge I do not see that charging a portion upon the owner will make any substantial difference in the ultimate incidence of the charge; the owner now pays it in the long run substantially, except the variations; he does not pay the variations.

216. Where a man has a lease for seven, 14, or 21 years, if there are any conditions in that lease that the occupier is to pay the outs, if any different arrangement is made, would it not disturb that arrangement?—If the Act were to override the lease, of course it would.

217. Would that not, in your opinion, lead to some alteration of the present arrangements between landlord and tenant, and lead to re-valuations and re-adjustments; must it not necessarily do so?—I should think that the landlord would raise the rent in precise proportion to the amount of rate which he is called upon to pay.

Mr. D. P. Fry.

218. Therefore you are of opinion that it would not make very much difference to the tenant?—I do not see that it would make any difference at all in the long run to either of them, because they certainly would adjust it by agreement.

219. Chairman.] When you say the long run, you mean that if the rates tended to increase before the re-adjustment took place, of course the occupier would have the benefit of the suggested change?—Yes, to that extent he would.

220. Supposing that new rates were imposed, would it not make all the difference whether it was upon the owner or upon the occupier in existing tenancies?—Yes; if a new rate were imposed, of course in the absence of an arrangement between them.

221. But as regards a division of the existing rates, what would be the effect of charging half upon the owner and half upon the occupier, under a lease renewed under the passing of such an Act: supposing the rates to increase, after the new lease was granted, would not the occupier be in a different position to what he would be in if he were paying the whole rate?—Yes, it would be so to the extent of the increase.

222. Is this your opinion, that if the rates were a permanent quantity then it would not matter at all upon whom they were placed?—Quite so.

223. But that if there are variations, the division between the owner and the occupier makes a very considerable difference?—In respect to all variations the excess falls at present upon the occupier, and if you were to divide the charge half-and-half, half the excess would fall upon the occupier and half would fall upon the owner.

224. Mr. Gregory.] As to the term owner in the case of a building lease for 99 years, for instance; you have a lessor, and you have a lessee, and a groundrent, and you have very often a sub-lessee under him at an improvable ground rent, and you have the tenant ultimately at a rack rent; which of those three would you term the owner for the purposes of rating?—For the purposes of rating it would depend entirely upon the definition which you gave in the particular Act; there is no doubt that they are all owners.

225. How would you determine the rates between them?—That does raise a very complicated question certainly.

226. Mr. Walter.] Have you any doubt that in making an arrangement between landlord and tenant, the amount of the rate materially affects the question of rent?—I have no doubt it does.

227. Do you think that there is any difference between landed property and other kinds of property, for instance, house property in respect to the incidence of that kind of taxation?—I do not think that there is any difference in consequence of the nature of the property, the whole difference seems to me to arise from the terms of the letting, that is to say, whether the letting is for a long period or a short period; where it is for a long period, of course the interval is longer before a readjustment can take place, whereas if the interval is short, a readjustment can take place soon, and that would apply equally to houses and to land; of course the periods of letting vary very much in different parts of the country, both for houses and for lands.

228. Mr. Rathbone.] You stated just now, did you not, that in all cases the landlord ultimately paid the rate, and not the occupier?—I qualified that by an explanation with regard to excess and fluctuation.

229. Beyond that do you mean to apply that statement to towns which are increasing, and in which houses have to be built; in that case, would you say that the occupier has not to pay any more rates and rent together if he has to have new houses built for him, and therefore to bring new capital into the business?—I cannot myself see that it makes any difference.

230. Do you mean that a man when he is considering whether he shall build fresh houses or not, will take only the gross and not the net rent that he is to receive into account before he builds them?—He would take the net rent into account.

231. Would the amount of rates that have to be deducted from the gross income have to be paid by the occupier, who is to pay the landlord?—I think not, for this reason: the occupier is prepared to pay, we will say, 70 l. a year for his rent and rates; it matters nothing to him whether he pays 50 l. to the landlord and 20 l. to the parish, or whether he pays the whole 70 l. to the landlord. If there were no rates at all the landlord would get 70 l. for his house, but as the tenant has got to pay 20 l. to the parish he only gets 50 l. for his house.

232. In this case you assume that a tenant has it all his own way; that he is to choose what he will pay for his rent; as he has to live in a certain place, and it is not certain that a man who is willing to invest money in building need build those houses in that particular place; surely is it not the builder that is free and the tenant that is fixed?—That is a matter which seems to me to depend entirely upon the competition of the supply on the one hand and the demand on the other, quite irrespective of the question of rates. The inducement which a builder has to build is the net rental which he can get; if he gets 70 l. and has to pay 20 l. himself to the parish, he gets 50 l.; if he gets 50 l. from the occupier and the occupier pays 20 l. a year in rates, the builder still gets 50 l.; he would get no more than 50 l. whichever way the assessment is made. The rate is a burthen upon the property; it is a deduction from the rent.

233. Chairman.] Do you draw no distinction between the groundrent and what may be called the building rent?—I am taking what is called the rack rent. The division of that rack rent amongst the series of owners who stand behind is another question altogether.

234. Supposing there is a piece of ground that is not covered with houses at all, and a builder is going to employ his capital in building houses upon that ground, would it not be an element in the builder's mind what rates would come upon the house which he builds?—I should think it would certainly be an element in his mind.

235. And if he found that the rates in the neighbourhood were exceedingly high, I presume that he would not build?—That would depend upon the rent which he could get for his house; because, although the rates might be very high, the convenience of the situation, or other circumstances, might be an inducement for great competition amongst the tenants of houses, and houses might let for very high rents although the rates were also high.

236. Would he calculate in this way: I can get a certain rent, and that is the highest rent that that I shall be able to get for a house in that position?—Yes.

237. And then he would make a calculation how much it would cost him to build?—Yes.

238. And what capital he would put in?—Yes.

239. And then he would say, what rates would the tenant and the landlord, or between them, have to pay, and what would be the outgoings?—Yes.

240. And if he found that those outgoings were such that either the tenant could not pay the rent, or that he could not get sufficient profit upon his building, he would not build? – It would not be worth his while to build.

241. If he did not build, then the number of houses would be diminished?—Yes.

242. And the consequence would be that there would be no fresh supply of houses pro tanto; would not that be the fact?—Precisely so.

243. And there being no fresh supply of houses, that would tend to keep up the price of the houses that were existing?—Certainly, if the demand continued the same.

244. And therefore the result would be that, in the absence of a fresh supply, and the demand remaining the same, the rents would rise; they would rise, that is to say, from the absence of competing new houses which would otherwise be built?—If the rents rose that would have the effect of producing those new houses, for if they really did rise, it would be an inducement to the builder to go on; that would alter the conditions.

245. What I mean is this; do you not recognise that a charge upon the building of houses interferes to a certain extent with the building of houses?—Undoubtedly it must do so.

246. And, so far as it does so, would not the occupier have to pay the penalty of something which is an obstacle to the building of new houses?—But he would have to pay that penalty, if he paid at all, in the rent which he paid, and not in the rates.

247. The rent would be raised, because otherwise the builder, who has got to pay those rates, would not build, and they must be paid out of the rent one way or the other?—Yes; and if the rates were really so high as to prevent any new houses being built in a district, and the rents of the other houses were therefore to rise in consequence, there is no doubt that indirectly the occupier would have to pay through the medium of increased rent; but I did not understand that that was involved in the question of the distribution or division of the rates themselves between the owner and the occupier, because it seems to me that that is an effect which arises from the total amount of the rates, and not from the occupation.

248. The amount of the rates would touch the occupier, would it not?—Certainly, the total amount must.

249. Mr. Rathbone.] In a place where the competition was such as to necessitate the building of new houses, as is the case with most of our large towns at present, would not the amount paid by an occupier for rent and rates together be larger if the rates were higher than if they were lower?—They would be larger; and if the amount was so large as to have the effect of preventing the building of houses, of course to that extent it would so, but it is only in that extreme case that it would operate; if it did not come up to the point of preventing the building of new houses, it would not have that effect.

250. According to the law of supply and demand, would not the price of the article which had to be brought in greatly affect the number of houses built, if you had any material increase in the rate?—Not necessarily so; I think the law of supply and demand has two sides to it. The competition of the supply is just as much to be taken into account as the competition of the demand; the demand may go on increasing so much that rent will be higher from the demand, and not in consequence of the rates in any way.

251. Mr. Birley.] With regard to the question of the distribution of rates between landlord and tenant, the incidence of the rate, may not a distinction be drawn in those rates between those which are simply outgoings, such as the poor rate, or the vaccination rate, and rates of that kind, and those which are a positive improvement of the property itself, because in many cases the lighting rate, the highway rates, and the sewers rates, positively improve the property quoad rent, and are actually an addition to the value of the neighbourhood, and those rates would not fall upon the landlord, would they?—There are two distinct principles upon which the rates are, in point of fact, assessed; there is the ability to pay on the one side, and there is the benefit received on the other, and those two principles have been adopted by the Legislature in different rates and in some rates both together. In the lighting and watching rates both elements are taken into account, and agricultural land and market gardens pay so much less, because it is supposed that they derive so much less benefit, but that land, I suppose, is assessed with reference to the presumed ability to pay, and in that case the benefit is derived by the occupier, and not directly by the owner; to a certain extent the owner derives a benefit in the increased protection to his property and in other ways, but a great deal of it is peculiar to the occupier, and the owner has no benefit personally from the lighting of the roads which the occupier uses. If you could distinguish between those two classes of rates and the two principles upon which the rates are, in point of fact, assessed, and you could distribute so much to the principle of ability to pay, and so much to the principle of the benefit received, you might then draw a distinction, and assess the one upon the owner and the other upon the occupier; but in practice it would be so extremely difficult, and would involve so many refined distinctions, that I think it would be hardly possible to carry it out, except in a very rough sort of way.

252. Mr. St. Aubyn.] In the answers which you have given to the last two questions, when you speak of the owner, do you mean the person who receives the rack rents, or do you mean the ground landlord?—I was speaking of the person who receives the rack rents; in all rating Acts the person who receives the rack rents is regarded as the owner. It is a mere matter of convenience; of course the freeholder is the real owner.

253. Mr. Walter.] Should you say that, other conditions being equal, the rent of houses would vary according to the amount of rates to which they were liable?—Yes, other conditions being equal, it certainly does seem to me to be so. I cannot come to any other conclusion.

254. To that extent the rates would be paid ultimately by the owner?—Yes, but it is very seldom seldom that all the other conditions are exactly equal.

Mr. D. P. Fry.

15 March 1870.

255. Mr. Acland.] Is not the practical working of the payment of rates by agricultural occupiers this: that whereas the rent of land is gradually rising in England through the general prosperity of the country, and as the rates are also rising, the landlords do not, in fact, feel the increase of the rates, because they are simply paid by their tenants under the general consciousness that the tenant is not wronged, because he is making more profit, and that, therefore, the increased rate, which is falling upon the occupier, if felt to be no injustice, because he is assumed to be generally better off than he was before; is not that the practical working of things?—I dare say it is.

256. Is it not the fact that the owners of the broad acres of England are almost unconscions of the increase of rates, except ultimately?—If their rents are rising of course they would be so, and that is, no doubt, a general fact.

257. You were asked just now whether a change in the law, making the landlord pay half the rates, would not be a great disturbance of the relations between landlord and tenant; if the rates on a farm of 200 acres were 2 s. in the pound, that is to say, 20 l. a year, and if the law decided that 10 l. should be paid by the landlord and 10 l. by the tenant, it is not to be supposed that there would be a general transfer of income from the one to the other, without any consideration of existing engagements; do you contemplate that, or not?—What I said was, that the agreement between the two would eventually adjust the matter; that is the only conclusion that I can come to.

258. May we not assume, that if the law were now changed, and that the 20 l. poor-rate now paid by the occupier were in future to be paid half by the owner, and half by the occupier, the Act of Parliament which enacted that would take the existing engagements into account, and make some arrangements for the transfer of the obligation?—I presume that the Act would do so.

259. Would not the practical working in future, if that clause should pass, be this, that whereas the landlord now does not feel the rates at all, he in future would feel, as regards half the rates over the whole of his property, whether they were going up or going down?—Yes, he would feel that.

260. Would not that have the effect, that the landlord would take greater interest in the management of the rates, and he would be more disposed to make a provident outlay, tending to the ultimate diminution of pauperism?—Undoubtedly, I should think so; I should think that the effect of giving him a direct interest by a direct charge would be to increase his interest in the good management of the rate.

261. Have you any acquaintance with the system in Scotland and Ireland?—No, not much; nothing that I could give any evidence upon that would be of any value.

262. Mr. Gregory.] Do you contemplate the disturbance of existing contracts in the apportionment of the rates?—In my answer, I did not, certainly.

263. Do you contemplate any alteration in the representation when you alter the incidence of the rates?—I should think that that would be a very proper thing to follow from the operation; if the owner were charged with half the rate, it would only be fair to give him a proper control of the expenditure of the rate, and if he were not so charged, it would be equally fair. I do not think that whether you charge him directly or not it makes any difference; he is equally interested now in the good administration of the rates, and would be equally entitled to have his fair share.

264. Mr. Rathbone.] Only he does not know it?—Perhaps not; but I think he is so in fact.

Mr. Francis James Cochran, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. J. Cochran.

265. Chairman.] You are a Collector of County Rates for the County of Aberdeen, are you not?—Yes.

266. And you have been so for 16 years past?—Yes.

267. Have you held any other offices?—I was also assessor under the Property and Income tax Acts for a large district of the county of Aberdeen, including also the whole of the city of Aberdeen, for 20 years, ending in 1862; I set a-going the first poor assessment in the parish of Oldmachar in the year 1835, the parish of Oldmachar being a very populous parish, including part of the city of Aberdeen, and I had the superintendence of the levying of that assessment for nearly 20 years.

268. So that you have been engaged both as regards county rates, as regards the assessment of income tax, and as regards poor rates?—Yes; and, as professionally engaged as an advocate in Aberdeen, I and my firm have charge of very considerable heritable property both in the city and the county.

269. Have you been agent for the parochial boards or managers of the poor?—Yes, I have been so for several parochial boards, and am and have long been a member of two parochial boards.

270. Will you give the Committee some information with regard to the county rates at the present moment?—The county rates, the levying of which is under my charge, consist of the following: the county general assessment, the police assessment, the prisons assessment, milita depôt assessment, the registration of voters assessment, the court-house assessment, the Aberdeen county and municipal buildings assessment, the cattle diseases prevention assessment, the turnpike road debt assessment, the commutation road debt assessment, the roads maintenance or roads repair assessment, and the roads construction assessment.

271. Are all those in operation at present?—All those are in operation at present, excepting the cattle diseases assessment, which does not happen to be required this year.

272. Will you state over what areas those rates are levied?—The whole of them are leviable over the whole area of the county, with one or two exceptions.

273. Will you state those exceptions?—The commutation road debt assessment is parochial; it only applied to certain parishes where there happened to be a commutation road debt in existence. Then the roads repair assessment is over the whole county, but it varies, according to the expenditure for the repair of roads, within each each of the eight districts into which the county is divided. At present it happens that the rate is equal throughout, being 6 d. per pound, but that is so far accidental, and the roads construction assessment is only in the district where the construction takes place.

274. Those rates, I presume, are equivalent to what we should call the county rate and the highway rate in England?—Yes. I may mention, with reference to the four different road assessments which I specified last, that those are all in virtue of a local Act called "The Aberdeenshire Roads Act, 1865;" and the object of that Act was to provide for the debts affecting the turnpike roads and other roads, and to abolish the exaction of tolls. Consequently, under this Act a tax had to be provided to extinguish the debts in a certain number of years, and then a large tax to pay for the repairs as a substitute for the tolls.

275. Are those various assessments or rates levied from the occupiers or from the owners?—In all the cases that I have mentioned the tax is levied from the owner only. The owner's name alone is entered in the roll of assessment, and it is the owner who pays it.

276. Are there any cases in which the owner can deduct a portion from the tenant?—Yes, in two of the cases out of them all. The most important one is the road maintenance assessment, an assessment which has come in lieu of the tolls upon the roads. The tenants of course had the greatest part of the tolls to pay, and the arrangement in the local Act was, that the landlord paying the road maintenance tax should be entitled to recover from his tenant, along with his tenant's rent, one-half of that tax. At present the rate that the landlord pays of that tax, which is by far the largest of any of the taxes under my charge, is 6 d. per pound, and the landlord recovers from his tenant 3 d. per pound; he is entitled to recover one-half. The only other one where there is a similar right to recover is the cattle diseases rate, which I stated was not in operation for this year, and which is generally, and will be, a very small tax altogether. In all the other cases the tax comes out of the landlord's pocket entirely.

277. Mr. Rathbone.] With regard to the cattle diseases tax, does he deduct one-half or the whole?—The landlord is charged for the whole tax. The tenant has to pay his rent to the landlord, and in doing that the landlord, in the case of the road maintenance tax, exacts from the tenant, in addition to his rent, one-half of the tax, and the cattle diseases assessment follows the same rule. In the terms of the statute, as to the cattle diseases rate, the tax in the case of that rate would be exigeable, one-half from the landlord and one-half from the tenant, but, being the only exceptional case to our general rule in making up the assessment, and as we have only had it one year, we put it in the same position as the others; we put in the landlord's name only, putting a note to the notices and receipts, that the landlord on paying the tax was entitled to get one-half of it from his tenant in the same way as in the case of the roads maintenance rate; and that was the plan upon which it was carried out.

278. Chairman.] Is there no case where you deduct three-fourths from the tenant?—That was the law with reference to the commutation road assessment prior to the passing of the Act of 1865, to which I have referred. The public roads of the county, like most public roads in Scotland, were classified into two classes:—one, having tolls, which were called turnpike roads; the other, without tolls, which were called commutation roads; and those without tolls, viz., the commutation roads, were maintained by a small assessment laid upon the owners only, the owners in Aberdeenshire having the right to recover three-fourths of that assessment from their tenants. It is with regard to the commutation road assessment that the three-fourths arises; but that is all done away with now by the Act of 1865, by which the whole management both of turnpike roads and commutation roads is thrown into one, and the share that a tenant has to pay of the whole maintenance is one-half.

279. Under what statute are the whole of the above assessments assessed?—Except the last four, which have reference to roads, and which are all under the Statute of 1865, a local statute for Aberdeenshire, all the rest are each under a separate statute.

280. What is the Scotch Lands Valuation Act of 1854?—That was merely to settle the mode of valuation, and, that being settled, there are different statutes for raising the different taxes and administering them.

281. You have had considerable experience in collecting those rates; have you not collected them always from the owners?—Yes, always. I am now referring to the county rates.

282. Have you found any inconvenience in collecting them from the owners instead of from the occupiers?—No, but quite the reverse; I should say that it is far more easy to do it from the owners than from the occupiers.

283. How do you manage to get at the owners?—I issue notices telling them the amount of rental upon which they are charged, and the amount of assessment in each case for the different assessments I have referred to, all contained in one notice; and those notices are served upon the owner or upon the agent, or factor, as we call him in Scotland, having charge of the estate, and in that way the money is got in very readily.

284. Now, we will take the case of owners who are not the owners of estates, but of cottage property; do you ever find that the owners are absent, or that you cannot find them?—No, I have not found that in experience; I send my clerk, or go to the village or town, sending a notification five or six days before, with notices to each owner. If an owner is absent necessarily he has some person to look after his property, and to draw the rents of it, and that person is the person who receives the notice and comes and pays the rate.

285. You keep your list of the owners, but I suppose you do not even enter the names of the occupiers at all?—No, that is true. But there is a provision in the Lands Valuations Act which makes a slight exception to that, namely, that where the lease is for 21 years and upwards, then the lessee or tenant is to be held quasi owner, and to be entered in the book as owner; but that is a speciality which does not occur very often.

286. Mr. Walter.] In that case can the tenant recover the rate from the owner?—He can recover the proportion of the rate applicable to the actual rent which he pays. The provision of the Act is, that when the lease is for 21 years and upwards, the actual rent in the lease is disregarded by the assessor under the Valuation Act, and he is then entitled to put such a fair value upon the farm, or whatever it is, as he thinks proper; and that is the value which is set down against the lessee; and he being called the proprietor under the Act, and he paying assessments on such value as the proprietor under the Act, is then entitled to retain from the real proprietor a proportion of the tax which he has paid, applicable to the actual rent which he pays. But, of course, in either case you will observe it is the proprietor's rent which is charged; the actual proprietor bearing the tax upon the rent which he receives, and the quasi proprietor in that way being left out of pocket the rate applicable to the surplus value

Mr. F. J. Cochran.

287. Chairman.] During the 16 years that you have been the collector of the county rates, have you never found inconveniences from the absence of the owners, and a difficulty in getting their address?—I cannot say that I have. On the property, whether it is a cottage, or a house, or a landed estate, or a salmon fishing, or whatever it is, there is always some person who is collecting the rents of it, and taking charge of it, and that is the party who pays the rates.

288. Is a notice served upon the agent a legal notice upon the owner; I presume that by the Statute you are required to give notice to the owner?—Yes, I think that a notice served upon his factor or agent is quite sufficient; but in a few cases that I have, and I annually have a few cases where I require to proceed to legal distress, or diligence as we call it in Scotland, in such cases I send the officer to the ground or to the house to poind the effects which he takes there, and in such cases the tenant who suffers is entitled to all the costs as against his landlord.

289. Then your position in Scotland is this, that the owner alone is responsible for the county rate?—Yes, in the county of Aberdeen.

290. But if he is absent you can temporarily take hold of the effects of the tenant in order to recover the rate?—Yes.

291. You were collector of the poor rates also, were you not?—Yes, formerly I was.

292. Therefore you are acquainted with the collection of the rates from the tenants and occupiers?—Yes, I collected them also from tenants and occupiers in that case.

293. Which did you find the most convenient, the collection from the owner, or the collection from the occupier?—I should say that collection from the owner is far more convenient, especially in one respect, that the payments are fewer; that is to say, the number of parties to deal with is greatly fewer, and the money being paid generally by a party who is in better circumstances than many of the small tenants it is more easily got.

294. Then the county rate being levied from the owner, and only in two cases deductions being made by the owner from the tenant, can you state to the Committee who administers those rates?—With the exception of the four road assessments which I have specified, the management of the whole is either actually or virtually with the commissioners of supply.

295. Will you state who they are, and how they are appointed?—The qualification of commissioners of supply is now fixed by the Lands Valuations Act, 1854, and as far as I remember it is the ownership of heritable property within the county amounting to 100 l. per annum of rent.

296. The rates being levied from the owners, the owners alone administer the rates?—Yes.

297. And no representation is given to the tenants?—Not in any of those cases that I have referred to.

298. We are speaking now, are we not, of the county general assessment?—Yes, the county general assessment and police, and all the other county assessments under my charge excepting the road assessments. It is right to mention, when I say the commissioners of supply, that sometimes they appoint committees, and they are a large body; for instance, there is the police committee, who by the police statute have certain powers and duties in the administration, and there is the prison board of the county, but the members of it are named by the commissioners of supply.

299. Are not the commissioners of supply what you may call the general governing body for local purposes?—Yes.

300. How are they appointed?—They are appointed from the ownership of property, of heritable subjects, within the county, of the annual value of 100 l.

301. Are all of those heritors then commissioners of supply?—Yes, and the eldest sons of those whose rents amount to 400 l. are commissioners, and the factors of those whose estates amount to 800 l., as far as I remember; I did not bring the Act with me, but it is the Act of 1854 which regulates that.

302. Those commissioners of supply are the general assembly of all the owners of the county above a certain line, are they not?—Yes.

303. And besides those, the eldest sons of a portion of them and the factors of a certain portion of them?—Yes.

304. In fact, every one interested in an estate above 100 l. has a voice in the administration of those rates?—Yes.

305. But they proceed, do they not, by electing committees for the various purposes?—Yes.

306. Now, will you state in what way the four last rates mentioned, those connected with the roads, differ from the remainder; I mean the turnpike road debt assessment, the commutation road debt assessment, the roads maintenance assessment, and the roads construction assessment?—With regard to the turnpike road debt assessment, it is the same as I have stated before; the owners are the commissioners of supply, virtually. The commissioners of supply are named by the Road Act of 1865 as the general road trustees; then the commutation road debt assessment is in the same position; but both those assessments are terminable when the debts are respectively paid off; the next, which is the most important one of all, the roads maintenance assessment, of which, as I stated, the landlord has a right to recover one-half from his tenant, the parties in the administration of that assessment, which is for a very important object, namely, keeping in repair all the public roads in the county, are the commissioners of supply, and two tenant farmers, elected in each parish by the qualified voters; and the qualified voters are the tenants occupying lands or heritages within the parish of the annual value of 20 l. and upwards. They meet in the month of November every year to elect two farmers to be road trustees in each parish in the county; then those two farmers, road trustees, meet meet along with the owner trustees, as members of the district boards, for the repair of the roads; the whole county is divided into eight districts, each district containing from eight to fifteen parishes, varying according to the size of them; there are eight districts in the county, and the trustees, that is to say, the commissioners of supply and the two tenants elected from each parish, meet at a specified place in their district, and have the whole management of the repair of the roads within the district, employing a qualified surveyor under them for that purpose; and from their proceedings there is an appeal to the general road trustees, who meet at Aberdeen, the head place of the county. But, practically, the administration of the road maintenance fund is in the district trustees, to which body the tenants in each parish send two of their number; then, of those two who represent the tenants at each district board, each district board annually select one, who is sent up to Aberdeen as a member of the general board.

307. There are three divisions, the parochial division, the districts, and the whole county?—Yes.

308. And the representation of the tenants is secured at each?—It is practically, and in terms of the Act; the arrangement of the district, and the general superintendence is in the general board at Aberdeen.

309. That applies to maintenance; how far does it also apply to construction?—It does not apply to the construction at all. The tenants are not assessed in any way, directly or indirectly, for any construction, and they have no voice whatever in regard to that matter; it is merely the maintenance that they have to do with.

310. Mr. Rathbone.] Who do manage the construction?—The heritors, the commissioners of supply, and the general road trustees.

311. Chairman.] Does the roads construction include the building of bridges?—There is a separate power to assess for that. I have not included it in my list, because we have never yet had it in operation; but the roads construction assessment is a district assessment. The building of a bridge, if it has got into the class of county road bridges, is a county assessment charged over the whole county. We have never yet had that in operation; but the rebuilding of an ordinary bridge, or the repair of an ordinary bridge, falls under the roads maintenance assessment. The roads construction assessment is an assessment for making a new road, and the rule about that is that the proprietors interested in it must put down one-half the cost themselves, and then the road trustees, if they think it of general utility, agree to pay the other half, and they impose an assessment called the roads construction or new roads assessment.

312. The tenants only pay in the case of the maintenance?—Yes, that is so.

313. Are they not outnumbered very much at the boards to which they go, if all the proprietors are represented, and there are only two tenant farmers to each parish?—At the district boards, many of our parishes contain so few heritors (they may have large estates, but they are few in number, and often non-resident or from home) that, generally speaking, at a meeting of the district board, the tenants would be fully one-half if they attended regularly, and they do sometimes; particularly at the outset of the procedure under the Act they attended very regularly; but at the general board in Aberdeen, we generally find that they do not come up so well; and there they would be outnumbered; although, if they were coming up two from each parish throughout the whole county, I do not know that they would be outnumbered according to the general attendance that is given by the proprietors.

314. You said that there were eight districts, how many parishes are there in the county?—There are 87 parishes in the whole eight road districts.

315. Could you state to the Committee the number of heritors above 100 l.?—About 220.

316. That is so far as regards the county rate, are you acquainted with the general mode of assessing the poor rate?—Yes.

317. Can you state how that is assessed, chiefly with regard to owners and occupiers?—They are both assessed for the poor rate. The rule for levying the poor rate throughout Scotland is, that one-half of the gross sum that is required is levied from the owners, and the other half of the gross sum is levied from the occupiers.

318. When you say the gross sum, supposing that you required a certain sum in the year, that sum would be divided into two portions, as I understand, and one-half would be assessed on the owners and one-half upon the occupiers?—Yes.

319. It would not all be collected either from the owners or the occupiers, but there are two collections?—Yes, there are two collections.

320. Is it necessary to have the two collections; why could you not follow the same principle as in the county rate, namely, that the owner should pay it all and deduct from the tenant, or the tenant pay it all and deduct from the owner?—I am not quite certain but that in some country parishes that course is really adopted to save expense and trouble, and no doubt in a country parish that course might be adopted; not consistently with the present statute, because the present law under the statute is clear that we must assess both the owner and the occupier each for one-half; that is to say, the whole amount is divided into two equal portions, and one of those portions is raised from the owner and the other portion from the occupier. But it does not follow that the rates are precisely the same, because, with regard to the occupier's half, the Assessment Act permits what is called classification, arising from the nature of the occupation; the principle of which is, that all residential occupancies shall be charged at a high rate, whilst an occupancy merely for the purpose of business or manufacture should be charged at a comparatively low rate. That is the principle of the classification. Farms, of course, are assessed at a low rate compared with dwelling-houses, and the classification only becomes necessary where the parish is of a mixed nature, because if a parish is composed entirely of land there is no use for the classification at all. If it is composed partly of land and partly of house property, then the classification becomes necessary in point of equity. The classification amounts to this, that it is a rule laid down, and parishes have a certain latitude allowed to them in the framing of that rule, but they must specify the rule distinctly, and have it approved of by the Board of Supervision of the Poor in Edinburgh, stating what the terms of the classification are. In the parish of Old Machar the classification that we have adopted is contained in the rules of assessment which I will read, and the Committee will see what is meant by classification.

321. In the classifying, do you say that a person shall only be rated upon a quarter of his rent, or do you say that he shall pay so much less in the pound?—It is so much less in the pound. Formerly, before the present Poor Law Act passed, in 1845, that very plan which you have mentioned was adopted. In Old Machar, where I started the assessment, instead of making the rate different we made the rate the same, but charged the occupier only upon a certain proportion of the rent. The principle of poor's assessments in the law of Scotland is this, that while one-half of the assessment was required to be levied from the landlord on heritable property, the other half was required to be levied from the inhabitants of the parish, according to their means and substance. Many disputes arose about means and substance, and the Court of Session ultimately came to the decision, which they made authoritative, that it was a preferable plan to take the rents of occupied premises, as an index of means and substance, rather than to attempt to get at the means and substance themselves. But then as premises of different kinds did not equally indicate means and substance, but rather residential premises indicated the means of a man to pay, while his business occupancy was incidental to the occupation which he had, and was rather the means of his living in his house than an index of his wealth, the principle was introduced of charging residential premises at the higher rate, and charging a comparatively low rate upon business occupancy; and then the rule which we have in Old Machar just now, and which I might read, is very short.

322. Sir Massey Lopes.] With regard to the meaning of this expression, "means and substance;" will you state to the Committee whether you mean by "means and substance" personal property as well as real?—The expression "means and substance," I think, was first introduced about the middle of the sixteenth century in the Scotch statutes, and its interpretation at first, no, doubt, was not very clear or well-defined or understood, but ultimately it came to be understood in the poor law phraseology as meaning all estate except heritage, which was charged separately. Then various disputes necessarily occurred as to whether it was chargeable upon a man at the place in the parish where the business was carried on, or in the parish where he lived. Some people had the pleasure of being assessed both where they lived and where they carried on their business; but the Poor Law Act of 1845 put all that right, and defined it distinctly. But I may mention that the system was found to be unworkable; and those parishes which had the means and substance system, which were very few, had it gradually changed, as they were permitted to do under the Act; and in 1861, or thereabouts, an Act was passed by the Legislature abrogating it entirely; so that it is at an end, and the index which the Court sanctioned is adopted instead of it, namely, occupancy.

323. You substituted this graduated income tax for the old system of means and substance?—Yes, if you call it so.

324. Chairman.] Would you call that an income tax?—A means and substance tax was a very different thing from an income tax, the difference being this, that an income tax is only manageable as a general rating over the whole kingdom; but for local objects, such as it would be for the poor of a particular district, it is a different thing; means and substance tax, instead of being an indirect tax upon income, as the income tax is just now, was what the mercantile community of this country would never suffer, viz., a direct tax upon A. B. and C.; that is to say, a committee sitting round a table, and saying, "So-and-So lives in the parish, what do you put him down at?" and so on. Of course that became utterly unworkable in a short time.

325. Will you now read the classification?—"Rules of assessment for the poor of the parish of Old Machar, under the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83, entitled 'An Act for the Amendment and better Administration of the Laws relating to the Relief of the Poor in Scotland.' One-half of the whole assessment required for the parish shall be imposed upon the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, and in levying each half the following rules shall be observed: As to classification of lands: The lands and heritages in the parish of Old Machar shall, for the purposes of the assessment on the tenants or occupants, be distinguished into three separate classes; the first class consisting of dwelling-houses and whole other lands and heritages, except those mentioned in the second and third classes; the second consisting of shops, warehouses, and stables, used solely in the occupier's trade or business, business offices, spinning mills, manufactories, brickworks, quarries, water-powers and railways, gaspipes, waterpipes, and ground used for such pipes; and the third class consisting of farms, cultivated grounds, and fishings; and that the rates of assessment upon the tenants or occupants as such, shall be so fixed as that the rate upon those of the second of the said classes shall be as nearly as possible one-half, and the rate upon those of the third class as nearly as possible one-fourth part, respectively, of the rate upon those of the first class; and where these proportions cannot be exactly obtained, without adopting fractional parts of a halfpenny in the rate, the nearest proportion shall be adopted when above or below the proportion before mentioned, so as to avoid fractional parts of a halfpenny in fitting the said rates." Those are the rules which were sanctioned by the Board of Supervision; then as to the deduction from the gross rental there is a certain deduction which I need not read.

326. The second class pay what proportion?—Half.

327. And the third class pay what?—One-fourth. The result of all that upon the rates was this:—The owners being rated at 9 d. per pound, that raises 4,275 l.; the occupants, class first, are rated at 1 s. 1½ d. per pound, producing 3,776 l.; class second, at 7 d., producing 633 l.; and class third, at 3½ d., producing 324 l.; and producing from the total occupants 4,733 l., or (deducting arrears, &c.) as near as might be one-half of the whole.

328. They have to pay so much more in order to make up for so much less to the other occupiers?—Yes; owners, 9 d.; first-class occupiers, 1 s. 1½ d.; second-class occupiers, 7 d.; and third-class, 3½ d.

329. Would

329. Would the average of those three come out of the 9 d. again?—Those three produce 4,733 l. as near as possible to the owners' half; that is the principle of it.

330. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is that scale which you are reading adopted by your own particular parish, or is it a general one adopted by the Board of Supervision throughout the whole of Scotland, or does it vary in every parish?—It is not a general rule; the greater number of parishes have no classification; the classification is permitted by the Act, but it is not enjoined, and the greater number of parishes, namely, all the agricultural parishes do not need it, because the occupancy is nearly all of one character, and there, of course, the rates are uniform; the landlord pays so much in the pound, and the tenant pays that same rate; it is applicable chiefly and remarkably to a parish joining a large city, partly containing house property, and partly containing farms and cultivated grounds, and, in short, of a mixed character, consequently it is generally in those parishes that we find classification to prevail.

331. Chairman.] Is the parish you have spoken of a parish in Aberdeen?—It is a parish containing nearly half the city of Aberdeen, and five or six miles of farms outside it.

332. So that it is a large and important parish?—Yes.

333. Sir Massey Lopes.] What I understand you is that those scales may be altered by the heritors in each parish, provided that the scale is adopted by the Board of Supervision?—They can only be altered by the parochial board in each parish, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh; and I may mention that the Board of Supervision are very chary of making any change after the scale has once been fixed and agreed upon.

334. Mr. Rathbone.] Does not this classification exist in other large parishes, such as in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and those places?—Some of them have abandoned the classification altogether and made the tax uniform.

335. Chairman.] You say that this parish of Old Machar contains half of the city of Aberdeen, is there another large parish in Aberdeen?—Yes, the parish of St. Nicholas, a very large parish; it is not large in extent, but very densely peopled. The parish of St. Nicholas is entirely a burghal parish, and the classification there is somewhat different from that in Old Machar.

336. But they really have a classification?—Yes, they have a classification. They had it very similar to the classification I have referred to as existing in Old Machar; I believe it was the same for some years, but last year they have changed it, and got the concurrence of the Board of Supervision. As far as I recollect the movement, they wanted to make it entirely uniform, and to do away with the classification entirely; but the Board of Supervision would not sanction that, and it ended, I think, in this, that lands and fishings should be charged at half the rate of other heritages for occupancy; that is all the classification that they have now.

337. Mr. Rathbone.] Practically, shops were charged the same as dwelling houses?—Yes, they now are so in that parish.

338. Chairman.] In your parish, residences were taxed the highest, were they not?—Yes, for occupation.

339. Therefore, a small occupier of a house of 5 l. or 10 l. would pay the full rates, whereas manufacturing premises would only pay half the rates?—Yes; but then the manufacturer was charged fully upon his residential premises.

340. But as far as his house was used for the purpose of business, it would only be taxed one-half?—Yes.

341. And the farmer would only be taxed a quarter?—Yes; but then in the discussions that we had about it, in comparison, when we found, for instance, a farmer at 100 l. a year, we thought that he would be still high enough charged if put upon the same footing as a person occupying a dwelling house at 25 l.

342. As I understand, this only applies to the half rate which comes from the occupier?—Only to that half.

343. The owner both of house property and of landed property, and of manufacturing premises, pays his half equally?—Yes, at the full rent, or rather not exactly at the full rent; there are some deductions; they are all subject to a uniform deduction for rates; but this applies equally both to owners and occupiers' assessment.

344. Mr. Birley.] Did I rightly understand you to say that land and fisheries were charged at a reduced rate?—Yes, in St. Nicholas, for occupancy.

345. I want to know whether there is any distinction between this parish of St. Nicholas and the other parish first spoken of, which accounts for the difference of classification?—I think that the reason that was given for the change was this, that the older part of the city, the St. Nicholas part of the city, was getting very much deserted, in so far as regards residents within it; the merchants were carrying on their business there, and were coming out to the parish of Old Machar to live, and consequently the same ground for classification did not apply there, because St. Nicholas parish was left with too many business premises, and too few residential premises; and we were getting the assessment upon the residential premises, whereas in St. Nicholas they were only getting the lower rate upon the business premises.

346. Chairman.] The poor rates being paid one-half by the owner, and one-half by the occupier, can you state to the Committee what proportion each of them have in the administration of the rate; and first of all, how are the parochial boards composed?—There is a difference in the constitution of the parochial boards, between what is called the burghal, and what is called the landward; and the parishes that are partly within the borough and partly without, such as Old Machar, are treated as landward parishes; in the landward parishes the parochial board consists of all the owners of heritages of 20 l. annual rent, along with the provost and baillies of any Royal burgh in the parish, the kirk session of the parish, and a certain number of elected members. The kirk session is composed of the minister and the elders, who are the principal lay officers in the congregation in the established church. You observe that I said that the parochial board consists of heritors of 20 l. and upwards, the provost and baillies, if any, the kirk session and a certain number of elected members, those elected being not otherwise qualified, that is, they may either be tenants or they may be proprietors under 20 l. a year, and the number of elected members is fixed once for all by the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh, according to the population, and the circumstances of each parish. That is the parochial board in each landward parish, and the same principle, without any difference in it, is applied to parishes like Old Machar, which is partly within and partly without the borough. In a country parish the principle of constitution referred to operates remarkably well. You have a board of from five or six up to 15 or 20 generally, and there is a fair admixture in it of the representatives from each class. But in a parish such as Old Machar, and the Barony in Glasgow, and St. Cuthbert's in Edinburgh, and other parishes in the suburbs of large cities, into which parishes the cities have gradually extended themselves, those parishes being partly within the borough and partly without, the terms of the enactment in the statute constitute their boards on the same principle as in country parishes; that is to say, each proprietor, whether of house or land, of the value of 20*l.* a year and upwards, is a member of the board along with the kirk session, and the provost and baillies of the borough, if it is partly within the borough, those being ratepayers, and the elected members fixed by the Board of Supervision. There are four different constituent bodies in the parochial boards in those parishes; there are the 20*l.* proprietors, the provost, and baillies of the borough, the kirk session, and the elected members (their number being fixed by the Board of Supervision, and the mode of election also in the terms of the Act). In the parish of Old Machar the number of twenty pounders I should say, probably, was upwards of 1,500. Then with regard to the elected members, I do not think that the Board of Supervision ever sanctioned more than 30. The number in Old Machar is 20, so that the election of elected members comes to be a matter, generally, of very little interest, as they have to act along with 1,500, and I have seen occasions when hardly anybody came to the meeting to elect them. Then, where the kirk session numbers more than six, the kirk session send only six of their own number.

347. Then we come to the third class, namely, the burghal parishes; what is the state of things with regard to them?—In the purely burghal parishes the course is quite different; the whole ratepayers elect the board annually; the number of members of the board is fixed by the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh, and then the whole ratepayers annually elect that number from amongst their own body. In any of the cases of elections of members to serve on the board there is a graduated scale of voting laid down in the statute. In boroughs, of course, it is most important; we have hardly such a thing as a contest in Old Machar to be a member of the board, because it is too numerous otherwise, but in St. Nicholas it is only 15 that they elect, and these 15 constitute the whole board, excepting four menbers, elected by the magistrates of the burgh and four by the kirk session.

348. Can you state to us how many owners come to the parochial boards in the boroughs?—That depends entirely upon the electors; they may send them all occupiers if they choose. There is no ex officio representation of owners in the borough. The constitution of it in the 17th clause is in these terms: "And be it enacted, that in every burghal parish, or combination of parishes, there shall be a parochial board of managers of the poor, and the whole administration of the laws for the relief of the poor shall be under the direction and control of such parochial board," and so on; and the constitution of it is this: "And when in any burghal parish or combination in which it shall have been resolved as hereinafter provided to raise the funds requisite for the relief of the poor by assessment, the parochial board of such parish or combination shall be constituted and chosen as follows: that is to say, the persons assessed for the support of the poor within the parish or combination shall elect, in manner hereinafter mentioned, to be members of the parochial board, such number of managers not being more than 30, as the said Board of Supervision, having due regard to the population, and other circumstances, of every such parish or combination, may from time to time fix, and possessing such qualification by the ownership or occupancy of lands and heritages of a certain annual value, within the parish or combination as the said Board of Supervision, having due regard to the population, and other circumstances, of every such parish or combination may from time to time fix, such qualification being in no case fixed at a higher annual value than 50*l.*, to be ascertained in manner hereinafter provided in regard to the qualification of voters; and the magistrates of the burgh shall nominate four persons to be members of the parochial board, and the kirk session of each parish shall nominate not exceeding four members of such kirk session to be members of the parochial board."

349. I understand that, while in a parish that is partly in a borough and partly out, you have got the whole of the heritors and an enormously large board, in the boroughs themselves you have got a comparatively small and compact board, composed of perfectly different elements?—Yes.

350. The heritors not having any voice except as electors?—Quite so.

351. And they have no ex officio representation upon those boards?—No.

352. In your experience, which acts best?—I cannot say, but that in Old Machar they have acted pretty well. The board have generally not above three meetings in the year, and the Act gives full power to delegate their entire functions to committees, and they do so; they have a general purposes committee, and a division supply committee, for the supply of the poor, and they have a poorhouse committee, and so on; it is all regulated in that way, and the committees are left at full liberty during the year, coming up with a report of their proceedings at the end of the year, and that goes on every year. I must say, at the same time, that, in principle, I rather incline to prefer the burghal plan, viz., electing 15 or 20 as a board, leaving them to perform the entire duties during the twelve months.

353. As regards the division generally of the poor rate between the owners and the occupiers, are you aware upon what principle that has proceeded, and what are the advantages of dividing it between the two?—Where there is a classification, of course, it would not be workable to levy it all from one.

354. I am not speaking of levying it from the one or the other; but antecedent to that, what has been the idea in putting it partly upon the occupiers and partly upon the owners; has it been for the purposes of convenience or has it been with the view of taxing both?—I can only answer that by just stating that it is contained in the the old Scotch statutes, which are the foundation of the Scotch poor laws; those statutes contemplated that half of the entire sum should come from the land, and the other half from the inhabitants. What was the reason of the Legislature in those days for adopting that principle of course I cannot tell.

355. It came probably from the idea of taxing the land and taxing the inhabitants?—Yes, very probably.

356. We have got one class of rates that we may rapidly touch, and that is borough rates; are those levied from the owner or the occupier?—They are partly both; there is, first, under the charge of the Commissioners of Police of the borough, acting under a Local Act, the police assessment, which includes watching, lighting, water, and certain criminal expenditure; it is levied entirely on the occupier: then the sewer rate is also under the charge of the same Police Commissioners of the city, and is levied entirely on the owner. Then there is a nuisance removal or public health rate, and a municipal buildings rate, also under the charge of the Commissioners of Police, and both charged on the occupier only. Then there is, under the charge of the corporation of the borough (we call them the Lord Provost and magistrates, or the municipal council of the borough), the prisons assessment, which is equally on the owner and the occupier. In all those cases the city tax-gatherer levies each from the person himself; he does not levy the owner's rate from the occupier, or the occupier's from the owner; he has them all separately rated in his books.

357. Do I understand you that all the taxes which you were going to enumerate under the charge of the municipal council are charged half on the owner and half on the occupier, and collected separately from each?—No, they are not all uniform charges of half on each. I will mention each; the prisons assessment I said was equal on the owner and occupier; so are the valuation, registration of births, &c., registration of voters and militia depôt assessments, all equally on owner and occupier; the county and municipal buildings and court-house assessments, on the owner solely, and the rogue money on the occupier solely. The roads assessment is under the Borough-road Trustees, and is equally on the owner and occupier.

358. What is the rogue money?—It is spent in paying the procurator fiscal or public criminal prosecutor, and in the apprehending of criminals and the detection of crime; the rates I have just spoken to are all in the city of Aberdeen, and are all charged on the Lands Valuation Roll.

359. Whatever proportions are paid by the owner or occupier, these are collected separately from the owner and the occupier?—Yes, all separately collected.

360. Does not that involve additional labour?—No doubt it does, and a great many more entries in the books.

361. What advantage is there gained by it; there is no classification of rates?—No; there is no classification of rates.

362. Can you state any advantages derived from levying it in that way?—I am not aware of any, except that in most of the cases it has been of long standing, and of course there would be a disadvantage, and probably some inequities, from a change.

363. Mr. Rathbone.] Do you think that that induces both parties to take more interest in the matter, or otherwise?—That is another consideration, which is very often important, particularly in the administration of the Poor Law, that by making the charge directly upon the occupier it gives him an interest in the administration with the view of preventing and detecting imposition.

364. Chairman.] That being the division between the owner and the occupier of those rates, how is the body elected that administers them, namely, the town council?—The municipal council is elected by the same parties who elect the Members of Parliament for the boroughs; under the recent statute, the qualification for electing members of the city council is the same as the qualification for electing Members of Parliament for the borough, and of course it is household suffrage.

365. Being household suffrage, the owners have no representation on this council except as mere electors, not as heritors?—Only as electors. The members of the town council, whether owners or occupiers, are only elected; they are not there ex officio in any way.

366. Is the owners' influence so great that they are fairly represented in comparison with the amounts that they pay?—Of course it goes by number, and the number of occupiers is far greater than the number of owners. In the lower classes of houses in Aberdeen there are very often four or five or six or eight families, so that the number of householders is far greater than the number of owners.

367. In the city of Aberdeen you have this result, have you not, that the occupiers see that the owners are paying a certain portion of the rates direct, but the occupiers practically have the whole management in their hands through the elections?—In so far as regards the taxes under the charge of the town council.

368. Have you ever known instances where that has led to increased expenditure, or to any abuse of any kind?—I can hardly say that it has led to increased expenditure, but we had a very strong instance at Aberdeen at the last municipal election in October or November last, of the power of the lower class of voters. A scheme was proposed for the construction of a bridge across the river, not far from Aberdeen, and the lower classes supposed that it would be a great advantage to them to get it. There were two parties in the city; the higher and better classes were generally opposed to it, on account of the extravagance of the proposal; there were many things connected with it, such as patches of land that could only be got at a high figure, and a great many of the better classes were quite against it, or supposed to be so, including the then Lord Provost; but the Lord Provost required to be re-elected; he went out and had to stand for re-election upon the last occasion, and he and the party that were against, or supposed to be against, the bridge, who had to go through the ordeal of re-election, were entirely defeated. The household suffrage people put out the men that were against their views, and put in men that were entirely favourable to their views.

369. By household suffrage people, you mean the ratepayers?—Yes. None of those taxes that I have been enumerating now would go to such an expenditure as this bridge; it would come out of the common good of the city, that is to say, the general funds of the city.

370. Half of the expense would have been charged upon the landlords, as I understand?—The bridge would have come out of the general funds of the city; they have large property, feu duties, and other means; and one party, who were very much in favour of the bridge, endeavoured to show that it could be done without trenching heavily upon the fund, and the other party endeavoured to show that it would bring the fund into financial difficulties, and it was maintained that it would necessitate an assessment.

371. Mr. St. Aubyn.] It appears that the owner in Scotland is liable to be assessed; who do you consider the owner in the case of house property let on building leases; is it the one who receives the rack rents, or is it the proprietor of the soil?—In the terms of the Poor Law Act, there is an express provision with regard to land let on a building lease; in such a case the owner of the house or the lessee is to be held the proprietor.

372. And you act upon that?—Yes. In reference to the general county rates, it is much the same rule; the owner of the house is held to be the proprietor. We have very few instances in Scotland of building leases; generally the houses are erected upon land held in feu, that is in perpetuity. It may be for the payment of a pretty large feu duty or ground-rent, but yet the holding is in perpetuity, and so the question does not come very often into operation.

373. Sir Massey Lopes.] You say, do you not, that the Board of Supervision have adopted a graduated scale in rating between the different kinds of property?—Yes. You refer, I presume, to the classification that I was speaking of, in reference to the occupant's poor's assessment.

374. What was the object of that classification; was it an indirect way of taxing every man according to his ability?—That was the original principle and design of it, as an indirect way of taxing every man according to his ability.

375. Chairman.] That classification was not introduced by the Board of Supervision originally?—No, it was introduced by the Court of Session really in interpreting the old statutes more than a century ago. I cannot say that there really is any statute for it, but it came to be pretty generally used in mixed parishes, wherever an assessment was imposed; and in settling the assessment for the first time in the parish of Old Machar in 1835, that was the only way that I found of escaping from the difficulties, and impossibilities almost, attending the case, because when the classification was tried, the parties in trying how much they would have to pay began to see that it operated very fairly, and so it was ultimately carried and adopted, and when the Act of 1845 was passed, permission to classify was put into it. The parochial board may classify, but they can only do it by getting the sanction of the Board of Supervision to the mode of classification.

376. Did that originate with the Board of Supervision?—No.

377. Sir Massey Lopes.] Did not the Board of Supervision adopt that plan as a substitute for taxing means and substance?—Yes; but it was not proposed by them at all. The instance that I have in my mind shows that it was not proposed by them, because we had it in operation in Old Machar parish 10 years before the Board of Supervision themselves had any existence.

378. Chairman.] The Board of Supervision is a more recent body, is it not, than this principle of classification?—Yes.

379. Mr. Birley.] As I understand, the Court of Session adopted that definition of the mode of taxing, namely, according to their means and ability?—The Court of Session laid down the principle that assessing the rent of occupied premises was a far better course than a guess at means and substance; and then when the rents of occupied premises came to be adopted, as parish after parish was forced into having an assessment, they adopted the classification, and it gradually worked in.

380. Mr. Gregory.] Is your system of roads one that is general throughout Scotland?—Previous to the Aberdeenshire Roads Act of 1865, it was so; since then our system is regulated by the Act.

381. Have you any turnpikes in Scotland?—Yes, we have turnpike bars and turnpike gates; but in Aberdeenshire we applied to Parliament for the Act of 1865, referred to, and obtained it, abolishing turnpike bars; and the largest assessment that I have referred to to-day is a substitute for those tolls. Our system is not now the same as throughout Scotland; not many counties have yet got Acts for abolishing toll-bars, but there are a few; Morayshire and several others in our neighbourhood have got such.

382. How have you dealt with the debts?—We imposed a separate assessment to extinguish the debt. The way that we dealt with it was this: when we first had it ascertained, the debt amounted to 500,000 l. or 600,000 l., including the accumulation of interest; we had it extrajudicially valued at what it was really worth according to the revenues which the bars were producing, and then we had the value struck, and the value thus came only to about 45,000 l. under the statute, instead of 600,000 l., and then we assessed for the value so fixed, making that assessment run over 25 years so as to extinguish the debt.

Mr. TOM TAYLOR, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Taylor.
18 March 1870.

383. Chairman.] YOU are at the head of the Local Government Act Office, in London, are you not?—Yes, I am the Secretary of that office.

384. Will you state to the Committee the kind of areas over which your jurisdiction extends?—Their generic name is districts; they may be municipal boroughs; they may be towns under Local Improvement Acts; they may be parishes; they may be townships; they may be hamlets; or, finally, they may be places not having any division known to the law other than the boundaries fixed for the purposes of our Act.

385. Under what Act of Parliament do you exercise your functions?—Under the Local Government Act of 1858.

386. Could you state to the Committee the progress of legislation with regard to uniformity of local Acts for the kind of functions now exercised by local boards?—I may say generally that the earliest local Acts, I believe, for town government that have been passed in any quantity are the local Acts in the reign of George the Third. Up to the reign of George the Third local Acts for town improvement were exceptional. In the reign of George the Third a great many Acts were passed for that purpose; but the first set of Acts that were passed with the object of giving uniformity to town improvement legislation were the Consolidation Clauses Acts of 1847, particularly three, one called the Towns Police Clauses Act, the other called the Towns Improvement Clauses Act; and another, I may add, called the Commissioners Clauses Act.

387. Up to that time how had the improvements in towns been carried out financially?—By a number of different local Acts containing their own rating provisions, many of them differing much the one from the other. Those Acts made a great many exceptions from rating and a great many limitations of rating, and a great many special provisions; almost every town had its special rating provisions.

388. Are you aware of the rates levied under those improvement Acts ever having been collected and brought together prior to 1848, or even then?—Not even then. I think that the Local Taxation Returns Act was the first Act requiring those Returns to be brought together.

389. In looking back to the various statistical compilations which profess to state all the rates collected up to a given date, those rates levied by improvement commissioners under the local Acts have always been omitted, have they not?—Certainly, up to the time of the Local Taxation Returns Act.

390. What was the first year when those returns were sent?—1861.

391. The model Acts of which you have spoken, in 1847 first provided for a certain uniformity?—Yes. Then in 1848 came the Public Health Act, which was an Act to be applied by a central authority, that is to say, by the General Board of Health, which was founded in that year, and that continued for ten years. Then came the Local Government Act in 1858, which is an Act no longer to be applied by the central authority, but to be adopted by the localities.

392. Is this the distinction between the Public Health Act and the Local Government Act, that the former could be applied by the central authority, where it appeared necessary to provide for the better arrangement and for the better health of the inhabitants; but that the second Act, the Local Government Act, can only be adopted voluntarily?—It can only be adopted voluntarily.

393. You have no power to apply the Public Health Act anywhere?—No.

394. Can you state to the Committee the rating provisions in those Acts; first of all, are the rating provisions in both Acts similar?—Except in minor matters, and except in one important particular, the rating provisions are similar. The rating provisions in the Public Health Act of 1848 provided for the levying of general district rates, and special district rates; by special district rate was meant a rate levied for special permanent works, as distinct from general district rates, which was a rate for current expenses.

395. The one rate, then, on which you are prepared to give evidence to the Committee, amongst the numerous rates that are generally, is levied the general district rate?—That is the largest rate with which I am familiar.

18 March 1870.

396. And under the Public Health Act there was also a special district rate, was there not?—Yes; but as it was found in practice that this involved considerable expense, and a great deal of trouble to local boards in keeping two sets of books, and as in many instances the special district rate, which was really a rate levied as security for loans, was levied over the same area as the general district rate, the only distinction being that the one was mortgaged for loans while the other was applied to the payment of current expenses—it was conceived better when the Local Government Act passed in 1858 to do away with the special district rate, and to give instead the power to local boards of dividing their districts for rating purposes, so as to render it necessary for them to keep only one set of books; and now, except where the special district rate has been mortgaged as a security for loans, and therefore has to be kept up with a view to the extinction of those mortgages, the special district rate is no longer levied; the only rate now levied by local boards for general purposes is the general district rate.

397. Which general rate, I presume, is levied over that class of areas which you described in the beginning of your evidence?—Yes.

398. Will you state the general purposes to which the general district rate is applied?—The general district rate is applied, or rather may be applied, to all the purposes of the Act except water supply and private improvement purposes. The general district rate is applied to sewage, to road repair in town districts, or may be applied to road repair of every district where they do not choose to levy a highway rate. It may be applied to the purchase of property for street improvements, to scavenging and cleansing, to the provision of markets, and to police purposes, in so far as they are dealt with by local boards; to paving and lighting, and street keeping, or preventing certain classes of nuisances in the streets.

399. Mr. Gregory.] Does the provision of markets include the purchase of them?—Yes; the purchase of existing market rights, or the erection of new markets; in fact, generally speaking, to all purposes of town improvement.

400. Chairman.] Are they generally very much the same kind of purposes as the borough rate would be applied to in boroughs?—Yes; or as the older improvement rates were applied under the local Acts.

401. Mr. Gregory.] To the purchase of gas works?—Not to the erection of gas works; there is no provision in the Act for that purpose. In some local Acts there is; and sometimes, as local Acts are administered by local boards, they have power to purchase, as the inheritors of the rights of the local improvement board; local boards can contract for gas-lighting, but they cannot purchase gas works or erect them.

402. Chairman.] Those are the general purposes of the general district rate?—Yes.

403. Can you state to the Committee how far the road repair comes out of the general district rate?—I may say that a local board is, by virtue of its office, the surveyor of highways by the Act of 1848, and they have continued so in towns wherein the highway rate was levied, that is to say, towns or boroughs not under local Acts; they repair the roads, sometimes out of highway rates, sometimes out of the general district rate. The distinction between the repairing roads out of the general district rate or out of the highway rate, is an important distinction, because the general district rates are levied only upon one-fourth of the assessable value of certain classes of property. Agricultural lands, docks, railways, market gardens, tithe rentcharges, which are enumerated in the Local Government Act, are assessable on only one-fourth of their net annual value to the general district rates; consequently in classes of districts which included town portions and country portions, the question of the repair of roads becomes one of great interest as between the inhabitants of the town on the one hand, and the farmers living round about the town on the other, and in every case there was a struggle to throw the repair of the roads upon the general district rates, because the farmers by that means became discharged of three-fourths of their net annual value. In calculating the assessment they were assessed on one-fourth, instead of their whole annual value.

404. Was it optional with the local boards to pay the cost of the repair of the roads out of the general district rate, or to levy a separate highway rate?—There was great doubt as to the law upon the question.

405. Was there a provision passed in a later Act to clear that point up?—In the year 1858, a special provision was made to prevent the struggle which arose in the case of districts which comprehended a town and a country portion. The 37th section of that Act provides for the present rating for highway repairs: "And whereas doubts have arisen as to the rate out of which the repairs of highways is to be provided for in districts under the Public Health Act, 1848, be it enacted, that in such districts or in districts where this Act is adopted, and where no other mode of providing for the repair of highways is directed by any local Act; where the whole of the district is rated to public works of paving, water supply, and sewerage, or to works for such of these purposes as are provided for in the district" (or, in other words, where the whole of the district is under a general district rate) "the cost of repair of highways shall be defrayed out of the general district rate." That is the first case, where you levy your general district rate over the whole district, and repair the highways out of it also. Then comes the second, where parts of a district are not rated to the general district rates: "Where parts of a district are not rated for works of paving, water supply, and sewerage, or for such of these purposes as have been provided for by rate in the district, the cost of the repair of highways in the same parts shall be defrayed out of a highway rate to be separately assessed and levied in the same parts by the local board as surveyor of highways, and the cost of such repair in the residue of the district shall be defrayed out of the general district rate." You see that is the second case, where you choose to limit your general district rate to a portion of your district; in that case you repair the roads in that limited portion out of the general district rate; the roads that lie beyond that you repair out of the highway rate. Then the third case is, "Where no public works of paving, water supply, and sewerage are established in the district, the repair of highways in the district shall be provided for by a highway rate to be levied over the whole district trict by the local board as surveyors of highways."

406. Will you state to the Committee the theory of that?—The theory was this, as expressed in a note of my own compiling: "the question of highway repairs has given rise to more litigation and to more injustice in districts under the Public Health Act, 1848, than any other that has arisen in the working of that Act. The great point in dispute has been whether a local board have, or have not, the right to make a highway rate under the provisions of the 117th section, which vests in them all the powers, &c., of surveyors of highways, except in so far as the same are inconsistent with the Public Health Act. On this point, contradictory opinions have been given by successive law officers of the Crown, and decisions apparently contradictory have been pronounced by the courts of law. The question is of practical importance, because if local boards cannot make a highway rate, they must repair the highways out of general district rate. But general district rate is levied by the 88th section of the Public Health Act, on one-fourth only of the net annual value of arable, meadow, or pasture lands, woodlands, market gardens, nursery grounds, land covered with water, canals, towing paths, or railways. Hence, a great displacement of the burden of highway repair from land to house property. In some districts (as at Morpeth, where there are 40 miles of highway) this displacement is most serious, and it is the source of vexatious dispute in all districts, including a densely-inhabited or town area and a rural portion. The decisions on the subject of highway rate up to the last were consistent with each other, and appeared to lay down the law thus: In districts conterminous with areas over which, before the application of the Public Health Act, one highway rate was levied, a local board can levy a highway rate. In districts including areas over which, before the Public Health Act was applied, more than one highway rate was levied" (that would be the case of a district including two parishes or two townships), "the roads must be repaired out of general district rate; but, in a late case in which the Cardiff Local Board was a party against the South Wales Railway Company (and which is not yet authoritatively reported), Lord Campbell is said to have laid down, in general terms, that a local board cannot, under any circumstances, make a highway rate; this Act attempts to settle the law; two classes of districts are to be legislated for, town districts and semi-rural districts. In the former, it seems to have been considered that there is no injustice in repairing highways out of a general district rate, as there is no property but partakes in the benefits of the works for which these rates are levied, and no large amount of property liable to exemption from three-fourths of the rate as coming within the proviso to the 88th section; but in semi-rural districts, especially where agricultural occupiers and owners are in the majority, it is the frequent practice to limit the special district rate, which is that for town improvement, to the town, and yet to levy the general district rate, for highway repair among other purposes, over the whole district; so these rural occupiers pay on one-fourth only of the annual value of their premises. In this way they escape three-fourths of the burthen of highway repair without taking on themselves any part of the burthen of town improvement as a set-off; this enactment of the Act aims at correcting this injustice by providing that where a whole district is rated to works of town improvement, as paving, sewering, &c., a highway repair is to be paid for out of general district rate; but where the rate for town improvements is confined to the part of the district directly benefited by the improvements, or, in other words, when the rural portions of a semi-rural district are not burthened for town improvements, the repair of highways in such rural portions is to be defrayed out of highway rate to be levied on those portions; where no rate is levied for town works, highway rate is to be levied by the local board as surveyors over the whole district." It is a complicated state of things.

407. It comes to this, that if the rural portions escape paying the town improvements by the general district rate being limited to a certain part of the town, then you must levy a highway rate in order that that portion of the public improvement, namely, the highway by which the rural parish is benefited, shall be paid for by them on their full rateable value and not one-fourth?—Yes, that is the object of the law as it now stands.

408. Mr. Birley.] We were told that there was formerly a general district rate and a special district rate, but that special district rate is now discontinued; what is the difference between a special district rate and a general district rate levied over a part of a district?—There is really no difference, and that is the reason why special district rate is discontinued. The present Act gives power to local boards to levy a general district rate over part of their district. They can divide their district and make a separate rating for all or any of the purposes of the Act; it is practically the same thing, and for that reason we got rid of the term special district rate, because it involved two separate sets of books.

409. Chairman.] The substance has remained, but the name of the rate has been changed, is not that so?—Yes; the reason why the name was got rid of was that it was not wanted, and that it involved all the legal incidents of two rates, whilst really and truly it was only one rate.

410. The present system of rating, as regards those local boards, is this, is it not, that they can make any new sub areas they choose within their district for any purposes of the Act?—Yes, for separate rating for all or any of the purposes of the Act.

411. As far as you are aware, has that given rise to much heart-burnings and difficulties at those local boards?—I cannot say that I have heard of many heart-burnings or difficulties since this Act was passed; there were a great many before, but on the whole this seems to work a kind of rough justice; we have had comparatively few complaints.

412. If we look at your Local Taxation Returns, we find three columns; the first is the general district rate; the second is the special district rate, which you told us about, and the third is the highway rate?—I may say that that special district rate is kept up, because it is the security for certain loans, and therefore it is obliged to be kept up in name, although it is not levied, except in name.

413. You mean that it is only levied in name where loans have been contracted, for which the special district rate has been pledged?—Yes.

Mr. T. Taylor. 18 March 1870.

414. Would not a portion of the repair of the highways be under the column of general district rate, whenever those repairs were paid out of the general district rate?—Quite so.

415. And the highway rate is only entered separately, where it is levied separately?—Quite so.

416. If you were making a statement of the whole of the cost of the highway in the kingdom, you would have to take, would you not, that same portion, if ascertained, out of the general district rate?—Yes.

417. I mean that a portion of the general fund of the district is applied to highway repairs?—Quite so; I may say that that would be also the case under the old state of things, where towns were governed by Private Improvement Acts, because in no case where a Private Improvement Act was in force, was there a highway rate levied, so that the repairs of the suburban streets and so on, which were included in the Improvement Acts, were paid for out of the rates; under those Acts the cost of these repairs was not included in highway returns made to the Home Office. They were essentially highway repairs, yet they were not included technically under that name, and this answers to that case.

418. So that it would not be possible to bring together the total cost of the repair of the highways all over the kingdom, because a portion of the repair would come under the general district rates?—Yes; the only way that you could get at that would be by taking the returns of each town, and taking out that which is paid for under that particular head, it would be a laborious matter, but it would be possible; in fact, the full returns that are made to us by the towns do include that; every town publishes its accounts every year, so that by taking that out of the accounts you could pick it out, but it would be a labourious process.

419. There are about 674 local boards in the country generally, are there not?—Yes.

420. I believe you have nothing to do with the metropolis?—No; those are outside the metropolis.

421. The vestries and district boards of the metropolis are not under the Local Government Act Office?—No.

422. In fact they are not under anybody?—No; nothing in London is under anybody. It is a remarkable fact that those functions of superintendence that the Home Secretary exercises over all municipalities he does not exercise in London. The only functions he exercises in London are what seems to be properly municipal functions, as regards cabs and so on.

423. Mr. Fielden.] Where the local board of a district has formed any portion of the parish or township into a separate highway board district, the whole of the roads in that parish come within the control of the local board, do they not?—Yes, they may be brought under the Act if they do not put themselves entirely out, for every portion of a parish is included, for purposes of road repair, in the local board district, by the inhabitants, unless a public meeting determine otherwise. They could not have been included in the highway district before, but they can now.

424. Chairman.] You have stated it incidentally, but will you state fully to the Committee the mode in which the general district rate is levied?—A general district rate is levied upon occupiers in all cases, with certain specified exceptions.

425. You do not mean for private improvements?—No, I am speaking of the general district rate.

426. Will you state the exceptions?—The exceptions, if I may say so, are optional, that is to say, the owner, instead of the occupier, may be rated, at the option of the local board, in cases where the rateable value of the premises does not exceed the sum of 10 l., where the premises liable to assessment are let to weekly or monthly tenants, or where they are let in separate apartments, and where the rents are payable at shorter periods than quarterly.

427. On what species of property is the general district rate levied?—On all kinds of property liable to poor rate.

428. It is levied, is it not, on what is called the poor rate basis?—Yes; but there is a power of new valuation and assessment.

429. Is that power, to your knowledge, often exercised?—No; I should say but rarely, as far as I know.

430. Was that provision introduced into the Public Health Act for the first time, which enacts that certain kinds of property should only be rated at one-fourth, or was it taken from old private Improvement Acts?—As a general provision it was for the first time introduced into that Act, but similar provisions existed in a great many local Acts. There was hardly any local Act but had some kind of exemption.

431. The idea, I presume, was this, that there was a certain class of property that did not benefit so much by this expenditure as other classes?—Yes. I have always contended against that view; I have always taken a different view myself, but that was the idea, no doubt. Of course the notion which determined those exemptions was, that those rates were for the benefit of property. I have always held that those rates were for the benefit of populations, and that everything that tended to amass populations in large bodies ought to be rated. For example, a manufactory brings together a great number of people, and brings together a class of people that render this class of rates necessary, yet the manufactory is not benefited by the sewage rate or water rate so much as the inhabitants.

432. But the manufactory would be rated in full, would it not?—Yes, it would be rated in full, as a matter of fact.

433. Even if it were lying in an outlying part amongst market gardens?—Yes, it is rated, or the building is rated, to its annual assessable value; it is the same as it is for the Poor Laws.

434. Mr. Birley.] I do not quite understand your statement, that you think all property should be rated alike, seeing that the assessment is not upon the property, but upon the occupier; for instance, you would not rate a farmer for the lighting up of the village or for the sewering of the village, to the full extent of his holding?—I do not know whether the occupier or the owner is to be rated, but I do not see why the property which brings together the village and creates the necessity for the rates of the village should not be rated for the needs of the village. I look upon those rates as for the benefit of the village, and not for the benefit of the houses in the village.

435. Mr. Acland.] Would your answer not be qualified a good deal by the size of the district; supposing some of the agricultural land to be five miles miles off the centre, that would make a great difference, would it not, compared with land close to the town?—If the labourers who worked that agricultural land lived in the village it seems to me that the farm ought to be rated, but supposing that the property did not contribute to the needs for which those rates were levied, then clearly that property, on my principle, ought to escape.

436. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Has every corporate town a local board of health committee?—Every corporate town that has adopted our Act has; the greater number of boroughs have done so.

437. Chairman.] I find that after the highway rate, that there is another rate called the private improvement rate, which is also levied by local boards; can you state what that private improvement rate is?—That is a rate imposed for improvements that conduce to the benefit of a particular set of premises, as for instance, the plant for the water supply to a private house; that is to say, the pipe and the tap and all that brings the water from the main to the house, or the pipes that communicate from the house with the sewers or the watercloset arrangements of the house.

438. Have you a private water supply rate extra, or does that apply to private water supply also?—No, the water rate is for current cost of water supply, but the private improvement rate would be levied for the plant—the tap, and the connecting pipe.

439. How is the private improvement rate levied?—The private improvement rate is levied also upon the occupier; but he may deduct three-fourths of it from his rent.

440. Could you put your hand upon the clause under which that is done?—It is clause 90 of the Public Health Act of 1848: "And be it enacted that whenever the Local Board of Health have incurred or become liable to any expenses, which by this Act are, or by the said Local Board shall be, declared to be private improvement expenses" (I may say that certain things are declared to be private improvement matters by the Act), "the said Local Board may, if they shall think fit, make and levy upon the occupier of the premises, in respect of which the expenses shall have been incurred except in the cases hereinafter provided in addition to all other rates, a rate or rates to be called private improvement rates, of such amount as will be sufficient to discharge such expenses, together with interest thereon, at a rate not exceeding 5 l. in the hundred, in such period not exceeding 30 years, as the said Local Board shall in each case determine;" that is to say, they may repay that rate within a maximum of 30 years. Then there is a proviso, "That whenever any premises, in respect of which any private improvement rate is made, become unoccupied before the expiration of the period for which the rate was made, or before the same is fully paid off, such rate shall become a charge upon, and be paid by, the owner of the premises, so long as the same continue to be unoccupied." Then the next clause 91 goes on to say, "That if the occupier, by whom any private improvement rate is paid, holds the premises in respect of which the rate is made at a rent not less than the rack rent" (that is in all rack rental premises), "he shall be entitled to deduct three-fourths of the amount paid by him on account of such rate from the rent payable by him to his landlord, and if he hold at a rent less than the rack rent he shall be entitled to deduct from the rent so payable by him such proportion of three-fourths of the rate as his rent bears to the rack rent; and if the landlord, from whose rent any deduction is made under the provision last aforesaid, is himself liable to the payment of rent for the premises" (that is where he holds under a superior landlord), "in respect of which the deduction is made and hold the same for a term of which less than 20 years is unexpired but not otherwise, he may deduct from the rent so payable by him such proportion of the sum deducted from the rent payable to him as the rent payable by him bears to the rent payable to him." It reads very complicated, but it is not really very complicated; it is intelligible enough.

441. Could you state the theory?—The theory of it is that the rate is levied for the improvement of special premises, and therefore ought to be paid in a large proportion by the owner of the premises, as the occupier has only a limited benefit out of it; and although a great many successive occupiers may have a current benefit out of it, represented by the one-fourth, yet the owner is the person who should pay the bulk, represented by the three-fourths.

442. This is a curious provision, that the owner is to pay if the premises are unoccupied; to your knowledge, is not that one of the only cases in legislation where rates are paid on unoccupied occupation?—In all general district rates where the owner can be called upon to pay, that is, in rates upon premises of small value, if the owner chooses to compound, he may compound for unoccupied as well as occupied premises; that is to say, he may make a general composition, but then a lower rate is charged, and he pays as composition upon one-half of the value.

443. In this case the owner has no option and no allowance, and if the premises are unoccupied he must pay the rate notwithstanding?—Yes, he must pay the rate.

444. Mr. W. H. Smith.] Does it not appear that this is an expenditure incurred by the local board in order to make the premises more valuable and capable of being occupied?—Yes.

445. It is an advance, by the local board, of capital in the interest of the owner, in order to make the premises tenantable?—Yes, they may, if they like, levy the same charge in the shape of what is called private improvement charges, and call upon the owner to pay it off at once.

446. Chairman.] Will you state what is meant by private improvement charge?—Private improvement charge is in respect of the same class of improvement as the private improvement rate may be levied for; and it is at the option of the local board to levy the cost of those improvements in the shape of a private improvement rate on a private improvement charge. If they levy it in the shape of a private improvement charge they can go to the owner at once and recover summarily from the owner.

447. Will you read the clause about the private improvement charge?—There is no separate clause; it is in different clauses. After declaring what special improvements may be charged for in this way, it says that they shall be private improvement charges and may be recovered summarily; for instance, there is the cost of the erection of a watercloset and of an ashpit after notice to the owner. That is declared to be a matter which may be paid for as private improvement expenses. Then there is the cost of cleansing cleansing, altering, or amending drains, cesspools, ashpits, or privies; the filling up or cleansing or arching over of ponds, pools, ditches, and sewers; and then there is the cost of paving and repairing private streets. All those matters are matters, the cost of which may be recovered summarily from the owner as private improvement charges, if the local board do not choose to charge for them by private improvement rates.

448. That is to say, they may be charged in one sum?—Yes.

449. Those private improvement rates have not been levied to any large amount, have they?—Yes, I think, to a considerable amount, although, perhaps, not to a large amount in comparison with other rates.

450. Are they 150,000*l.* over the whole of the United Kingdom?—No, the private improvement rates are not above 39,000*l.*, according to our last return. It may be 50,000*l.*, including omissions, but not more.

451. So that it is not a large amount?—No, compared with the rest, it is not a large amount.

452. This would probably be included in your other receipts?—Yes.

453. Probably you would not be able to analyse them without going through the whole 674 boards?—No.

454. Have you considered at all the question of how far a proportion of the general district rate might be put upon the owner?—The theory, I fancy, of the general district rate is, that it is charged for works, and the general rule for heavy and costly works is, that they are paid for out of borrowed money. The usual plan is to borrow upon mortgage the general district rates, that is to say, to borrow the sum required to pay the first cost of the heavy local works, like sewers or waterworks, or so on; then the repayment of that is distributed over a certain time, the maximum in ordinary cases being 30 years; but where it exceeds the assessable value of the premises chargeable, it may be extended to 50 years. It is supposed that the value of those works is defrayed during this term, and that the portion which is paid by the occupier each year does not more than represent the benefit which he derives from the improvement; so that, in point of fact, the value of those improvements is discharged during the term that the loan runs, and that the occupier does get a benefit each year which is represented by the rate which he pays, and there is nothing really left for the owner to pay.

455. Then the owner gets back his property at the expiration of the term, the occupier having paid in the meanwhile for the improvements?—Yes, but I mean to say, that those improvements are general improvements; they improve all properties certainly, but not in the sense in which the private improvement expenditure improves a particular property.

456. Take the case of a new street being built in a town; that would be done out of the general district rate, would it not?—It might.

457. And take the case of that street taking five years to complete, and an occupier who has got a five years' lease; he would pay his instalments for the works that were going on for five years, and he would get no benefit out of the street at all at the time when it was completed, because he might be turned out of his holding at the end of the five years?—Yes, such a case might easily exist, no doubt.

458. And, no doubt, exist to a very considerable extent?—Except that there are very few cases of people holding town property in that way. It is true it might be the fag end of a lease.

459. I mean that no public improvement could be made but what a number of people would be touched probably in that way?—Very probably.

460. May you state it in this way, that there are improvements which improve the value of the property, and there are other works that are undertaken which rather represent some burden that must be borne?—Yes; quite so.

461. And that burden would be borne by the occupier exclusively according to this system?—Yes.

462. Would you see any objection to levying the rates for what you may call the more permanent parts of the purposes to which the general district rate is applied, partly from the owner?—I should expect if you did that, they would get it back from the occupier in some shape or other.

463. At the expiration of the leases, or in some increased rent, do you mean?—Yes. The owner always has it in his power to throw it upon the occupier in the shape of increased rent.

464. Would not competition check that?—You can form as good a judgment as I can upon that point; it is a matter upon which every one can form his own opinion.

465. Sir James Lawrence.] With regard to the case of a house where the lease is terminating, and has five years to run, where the improvement rate is paid by the occupier during that five years, during the progress of the improvement you admit that in that case the occupier would pay the whole rate without having any advantage from the improvement?—Yes.

466. In a case where there was no lease, but an ordinary tenancy at will, for example, would not the same thing prevail?—He pays only his portion; he would pay it some time or other. Supposing a yearly tenancy, the tenant would be paying his proportion each year, but the benefit would be only inchoate, it would not inure to him if the work was not finished.

467. The benefit, in fact, would revert to his successor?—To the last man who came into the property when the improvement was completed.

468. Sir Massey Lopes.] If those improvements are spread over either 30 or 50 years, and the tenant gets during that time so much greater convenience or comfort from them, do you consider it any great hardship that the occupier should pay his proportion of the capital and the interest during the progress of that work?—No, I do not myself think so.

469. Do you consider that it would be any benefit to the occupier if the owner, instead of the occupier, paid the rates for those improvements?—I have already said that I think he would contrive to get it out of the occupier, and that ultimately the occupier would pay it.

470. So that there would really be no benefit to the occupier by such a change?—No.

471. Chairman.] If, during the existence of the lease, some new public work were to be undertaken, and that work were to be paid for, partly by the owner and partly by the occupier, would not it be better for the occupier than if the occupier had to pay the whole during his lease?—Certainly it would seem to be so on the first blush; but it is not very easy to answer the question question as to the incidence of the benefit, really and truly.

472. Will you tell the Committee about the water rates which are levied by the district board?—They have power to levy a water rate for the actual supply on particular premises as a private company does; but, besides that, where they provide water, there is a very serious matter, the large outlay involved in first bringing the water into the town, in the first cost of the works; those are generally constructed out of the general district rates, money borrowed on the security, and then what is paid in the shape of water rate is the current expense of the water supply; the first cost of the water supply being paid out of the general district rates.

473. Who is it that pays it, the owner or the occupier?—It is thrown on the occupier.

474. Do I understand you to say that the great works for bringing water to a town would be paid out of the general district rate?—Yes, it would be paid out of the general district rate; that is to say, out of loan contracted on the security of the general district rate.

475. That which is most distinctly a permanent improvement, and which will last for generations, is still paid for by the occupiers at the time?—I suppose even with waterworks, the expenses of repairs, and all things considered, the theory has been that those works do not really endure for more than a certain time.

476. I see that the water supply would fall under three heads; partly it would be paid from the general district rate, partly from the public water supply rate, and partly from the private water supply rate?—Yes.

477. Having stated what is paid out of the general district rate, will you state what is paid from the public water supply rate, and from the private water supply rate?—Out of the public water supply rate you would provide for such purposes as the flushing of sewers, public sources of water supply, such as troughs or cisterns, and any sources which were accessible to the public without payment; or if you provide baths and washhouses you might charge a proportion of them on the public water rate. If there had been already in the town any sources of public supply you are allowed to provide other sources of supply in lieu of the existing ones, and all those you would pay for out of the public water rate; drinking fountains and water supplied without charge to individuals, and also hydrants for the extinction of fires, and so on; all those public purposes would be charged out of the public water rate; what is charged for in the private water rate is the supply to dwelling houses, or to shops, and manufactories.

478. Has the water been supplied in a very large number of local boards out of the general district rate?—Yes, and the practice is increasing; certainly the tendency has been very much for local boards to get into their own hands the works of water supply, and in a great many cases to buy up existing water companies.

479. In a district where the water is supplied by the general district rate, do the inhabitants of the town get their water gratis, except so far as they contribute to the general district rate, or do they pay for the water separately?—They pay their water rate, which water rate is lighter than the water rate generally levied by a company, because the first cost has been paid out of the general district rate.

480. When you say that they pay their water rate, would that figure amongst the other receipts?—Yes, it is entered of course under a separate head, but it goes into the hands of the local board.

481. The works are paid for out of the general district rate, but everyone must pay afterwards for the supply, according to the amount that he uses, the same as to any private company?—Yes, the mode prescribed in the Public Health Act, was by a rate charged according to the rental of the houses; but that, in many cases, it has been contended, was an unfair mode of charging, and did not represent the real rate of consumption; and in consequence, power has been given to make what are called water charges by agreement, instead of water rates.

482. To sum up this part of the case, the rates about which you have given information to the Committee, are the general district rate, the highway rate, the private improvement rate, the private water supply rate, and the public water supply rate?—Yes.

483. Do you know of any other rates connected with your department, which would be of sufficient importance to state to the Committee?—I think not. In some cases the local boards are burial boards, and then they levy a burial rate on the same principle as they levy the general district rate, but that is probably not of sufficient importance for the Committee to go into, and there also may be local boards that carry out the Baths and Washhouses Act, in which case they might include the charges of that Act in their general district rate, but they would not levy a separate rate for that purpose.

484. Will you mention to the Committee what is the constitution of a local board?—It is elected by a scale of rating with plural voting. The 20th section of the Public Health Act of 1848 says—"At every election the ratepayers in respect of property in the district or part of a district for which the election is held, and the owners of such property, shall be entitled to vote according to the scale following; that is to say, if the property in respect of which the person is entitled to vote be rated upon a rateable value of less than 50 l. he shall have one vote, if such rateable value amount to 50 l. and be less than 100 l. he shall have two votes, if it amount to 100 l. and be less than 150 l. he shall have three votes, if it amount to 150 l. and be less than 200 l. he shall have four votes, if it amount to 200 l. and be less than 250 l. he shall have five votes, and if it amount to or exceed 250 l. he shall have six votes." And the owners vote on the same scale; but an owner who is also bonâ fide occupier "has votes in both capacities, so that he may have 12 votes; a man who occupies his own property up to a value of or above 250 l. has 12 votes. Then of course it may happen that properties are divided. For instance, there may be more than one vote for property held in joint ownership to the amount of 50 l. If there is a joint ownership in property to the amount of 50 l. two votes might be given, because the property would be presumed to be held in equal proportions, and each ratepayer would have one vote. In point of fact, if there were six people interested in one property below the value of 50 l. there would be six votes in respect of that property. Small property held by many owners gives a great many votes.

485. Is there any limit to the sub-division?—No, not in that way. If there were 20 people interested interested in property below 50 l., and they could only prove that they were interested in it, each would have a vote, so that there would be 20 votes in respect of that property; and that is because the lowest limit is anything below 50 l., so that 1 l. gives a vote.

486. Mr. Rathbone.] But if the property is over 50 l. you must have 50 l. for each single vote?—Yes. £. 100 only gives two, so that two people might have it; that is to say, each might have one, whereas below 50 l. you can get any number.

487. Chairman.] Will you state the qualification of those who are elected to the local boards?—They may be qualified either as owners or as ratepayers. If they are in a district below a population of 20,000 they must be qualified as ratepayers on 15 l. value; and above that population on 30 l. value.

488. In a small place, where the population is less, the qualification is lower?—Yes, the qualification is lower in the case of ratepayers, and so with owners; they must have in the smaller class of places, i.e., in places of above 20,000 inhabitants, 500 l. property; and in the larger class 1,000 l.

489. There is no certain number of owners elected to those boards, is there?—No, there is no certain proportion of owners and ratepayers.

490. The qualification for an owner is higher than the qualification for an occupier?—That is so; the property qualification is naturally higher.

491. But 1,000 l. you may take to represent say 50 l. a-year or 40 l. a-year?—Yes; according to the class of property, house property, or anything else.

492. Therefore an owner under 40 l. might be excluded whilst the qualification for an occupier was only 20 l.?—Yes. I will give the exact qualification: "No person shall be qualified to be a member of such local board unless he is at the time of his election, and so long as he shall continue in office by virtue of such election, resident within the district for which, or for part of which he is elected, or within seven miles thereof, and is seised or possessed of real or personal estate or both, to the value of not less than 500 l. in districts containing less than 20,000 inhabitants, or to the value of not less than 1,000 l. in districts containing 20,000 or more inhabitants, or rated to the relief of the poor of such district or of some parish within the same, upon an annual value of not less than 15 l. in districts containing less than 20,000 inhabitants, or on an annual value of not less than 30 l. in districts containing 20,000 or more inhabitants."

493. So that in their qualification the two are intended to be on a par?—I suppose that was the notion.

494. But a non-resident owner would not be able to be elected?—He must be resident in the place or within seven miles of it, but his property need not be in the district. If he is elected on the ratepaying qualification, his property must be in the district; but if he is elected on the property qualification, the property need not be in the district, provided he himself is resident there.

495. Are there in any local Acts, with which you have become acquainted, any provision for the direct election of owners as distinguished from occupiers?—As far as I know, the first Act which ever placed the owner on the same footing as the ratepayer, both with regard to voting at elections and with regard to being elected, was this Act of 1858. We, for the first time, recognised a distinct right in owners as distinct from occupiers; they have a right, for instance, in all memorials to the Secretary of State upon which appeals are founded. The owner figures in all the memorials which convey the consent of districts to incorporation in local boards, and in all petitions for Provisional Orders, and everything of that kind, the owner's right is recognised by the side of the ratepayer's.

496. And on equal terms generally?—Generally on equal terms.

497. Sir Massey Lopes.] You have stated to the Committee that the poor rate is the basis of this district rating; are the different objects for which this district rate is levied placed upon the paper which is given to each of those ratepayers and the poundage also?—There is an estimate of the rate published.

498. Is that estimate of the rate published by the local board?—Yes, it is published by the local board, and it corresponds with what is called the title of the poor rate; the rate is not legal without it, and that is put upon the church-doors.

499. Has each ratepayer any means of knowing the poundage which he has to pay for the different objects?—He would have the means by going to look at that estimate.

500. That is a general estimate in the lump?—But at so much in the pound; there is a column which states that.

501. Does the paper which demands the rate specify the different purposes and objects of the rate, and the poundage for each of those purposes?—There would be only one heading, one amount, I presume, in the demand note it would demand for general district rate; if there were separate rates or a highway rate then they would be put in, but the general district rate would comprehend a number of different purposes.

502. How are those accounts of the local boards audited?—They are audited in boroughs by the borough auditors, in the same way as the borough accounts, which I believe is a very deficient audit indeed; I believe that there is nothing which requires improvement more than the auditing of borough accounts; in districts which are not corporate they are audited by the district Poor Law auditor, who is an independent officer, and, I believe, as far as I know, that is the only efficient audit.

503. Do you know that he does that?—I know that practically, by the number of surcharges that are made, and the number of appeals from surcharges that come up to us.

504. Are those accounts ever published?—They are published in the local papers: they are bound to publish them, and they are bound to make a return to the Home Office. You will find that every year the accounts of boroughs are published in the local papers.

505. In a lump sum, but not with any particulars?—Yes, a regular budget, in fact.

506. Are those accounts sent up to you as the head of that department?—Yes, the copies of them are sent up to us.

507. Chairman.] Is this not the fact, that in your annual lists of the local boards there are a number that make no returns?—Yes, that make no returns under the Local Taxation Returns Act.

508. Is it a fact that there are nearly one-half who have made no returns in past years?—A great great many have neglected it, and it is very difficult to compel them, but we are gradually getting them to make the returns more carefully. By the 76th section of the Local Government Act it is enacted, "Every local board shall make an annual report, in such form and in such time as the Secretary of State may from time to time direct, of all works executed by them during the preceding year, and of all sums received and disbursements made, under and for the purposes of this Act, and publish the same in some newspaper circulating in the district, and shall send a copy to the Secretary of State."

509. Are you of opinion that that is regularly done?—We know that it is neglected in certain cases, but we know also that it is done in a great many; I may mention that in the last return that I published, which is based upon those returns, out of 674 local boards 254 were defaulters.

510. Through what office do the returns come?—They are returned to the Home Office; the Home Office has now determined to put the law in force against those defaulters, and probably if two or three conspicuous boards are made to pay the penalty, we shall have much greater regularity in their sending them up.

511. What is the penalty?—I think it is 20 l. under the Local Returns Act; but then the penalty comes out of the rates, I suppose, and that is a hard thing; I scarcely know how that is practically, but I should be afraid so. As I tell you, no instance has happened of our proceeding for those penalties; but there is a difficulty in punishing the local board, unless you specially provide that the penalty shall not fall upon the rates.

512. Mr. W. H. Smith.] Would it not be possible for the auditor to disallow that item?—I should think he might do so; as yet I do not know of a case, because I am not aware that the penalty has been proceeded for.

513. Sir Massey Lopes.] Does not the owner under a certain amount pay the poor rate in most of those boroughs where the local boards are constituted?—Yes, where the Small Tenement Rating Act is in force.

514. But it is now compulsory in all large towns, is it not?—That is the case under the Poor Rate Allowance and Collection Act of last Session.

515. Does it hold good with regard to this district rate too; does it fall upon the owner necessarily?—No, it is at the option of the local board, even in houses below 10 l. value; but I imagine that, as a matter of fact, they generally exercise that option, and charge the owner of houses under 10 l.

516. Do you think that the owner pays the district rate as well as the poor rates?—I have no accurate information on that point, but I judge that that is so, from the letters that I receive.

517. Mr. W. H. Smith.] You stated that there is a power of subdivision under the district rate, for separate rating; is that exercised to any considerable extent?—I think it is; I think it is often resorted to.

518. So that localities being part of a large district, separately interested in a particular work, are now rated separately?—Yes, in some; I can only judge of what goes on by my correspondence; I am frequently asked about the exercise of that power, and have to point it out to local boards.

519. You expressed a strong opinion, did you not, as to the justice of the present principle of charging the occupier with the rate for improvements under the district rate?—I do not know whether you would call it a strong opinion; on the whole, I do not see that it is unjust to charge the occupier.

520. On the whole, are you of opinion that the occupier's interest is equal to the charge which is imposed upon him?—Yes, as far as I can judge.

521. Of course there must be occasional hardship, but on the whole you think that it works favourably?—Yes, on the whole; I have not been made to feel the injustice of it, as a general principle.

522. Are you aware that it is usual in many leases for the lessee to covenant to pay all the rates and taxes, excepting the property tax?—Yes.

523. So that even if the rate were to be divided between the owner and the occupier such a covenant might override that arrangement?—Yes; there is a special provision for those cases in the Public Health Act, section 97: "Provided also, and be it enacted that nothing in this Act shall alter, interfere with, or affect any lease, contract, or agreement which shall have been made or entered into between landlord and tenant before this Act is applied to the district in which the premises are situate, in respect of which the lease, contract, or agreement was made."

524. Then am I to understand that if any contract is made since the Act has been applied to a district, the application of the Act would override the contract?—I apprehend that it would; I apprehend that you could not make a contract in violation of the Act.

525. Then is it your opinion that it is not open then to an owner to make a contract with an occupier under a lease, by which any portion of the rates chargeable upon the owner under that Act shall be defrayed by the occupier?—That is my impression; the fact has not specially been brought to my notice, and I should not like to be bound absolutely to that answer. Perhaps you will just allow me to withhold my answer upon that point, because it is one that I have not had immediately under my consideration, and I am not quite clear upon the point.

526. The private improvement charge is the only rate which is really imposed upon the owner at the present time, is it not?—Yes, I think so.

527. With regard to the constitution of local boards, are you of opinion that the system works well?—Like everything else that works locally, that depends upon the men into whose hands it falls. With a good chairman and a good clerk it works very well; with a good clerk or with a good chairman it works tolerably well; but with a bad chairman and a bad clerk I do not think it works well at all.

528. Does the system tend to give you a good chairman and a good clerk, and does it on the whole work well?—As well as any local system that I am aware of.

529. Is there any complaint against the operation of Sturges Bourne's Act?—No; on the contrary, I believe that that is the best provision in the Act; I think plural voting is the safeguard of the Act; and, whatever deficiencies there may be in working it, if you had not plural voting there would be very many more. Great difficulty is found with regard to the working of the Act from the collision between the small ratepayers and the large ratepayers. The anxiety of the small ratepayers and owners is to escape all outlay; money being a very serious thing to them, they are apt to disregard all considerations for one, namely, the pressure of rates.

530. Really, is it not in the interest of the small ratepayer that there is this private improvement charge, which means an advance on the part of the local board of capital necessary to make the premises tenantable?—Yes.

531. Colonel Brise.] I think I understood you to say that under the Assessed Rates Act of last year, it was compulsory on the owner to pay the rates under a certain assessment; can you tell me how far the Assessed Rates Act has been put in operation?—That I have no means of knowing. The Poor Law inspectors would be the only people to tell you that.

532. Chairman.] That Act did not apply to your department?—No.

533. Colonel Brise.] You have stated that if the rates were put upon the owner he would get it back in the increase of rent; would not the effect of that be that the owner would have to pay increased taxation on that amount; he would pay increased income tax and house tax, and other taxes, in all probability, upon the increased rent, and if the rent should be taken as the annual value in the rate book, would not he also pay increased rates?—No doubt it would tend to that, and that would have to be considered.

534. Mr. Fielden.] With regard to this general district rate, can the local board, without the consent of the owner, levy the rate upon him under 10 l. rental?—The local board can do so; it is at their option.

535. And without his consent relieve the occupier?—Yes; they can, at their option.

536. Sir James Lawrence.] Do I rightly understand from you that the local boards have generally the power of determining as to incidents of taxation, whether the owner shall pay it or the occupier?—Only in the case of property below 10 l.

537. With regard to the proportion of owners to occupiers upon the local board, have you any means of knowing usually what the proportion usually is?—No, it is quite uncertain and irregular. I have no reason to suppose that there it is anything like a fixed proportion.

538. I gather from you that you are of opinion that no matter upon whom the rates might be placed, the owner would manage to transfer them to the tenant by increased rent?—I think that the rates will always be made to fall sooner or later upon the occupier.

539. Mr. Seely.] You state that a special rate can be levied on a part of a district; have the people in that part of the district any voice in the matter, or is it entirely at the discretion of the general local board?—Entirely at the discretion of the local board.

540. The local board can divide a district and put a special rate on part of that district without the people in that part having anything to say whatever in the matter?—Yes.

541. Chairman.] Is there any appeal to the local government office against it?—There is no appeal against the incidence of a special district rate. There is an appeal against private improvement charges.

542. Mr. Seely.] Supposing the people of any part of a district wished to levy a rate upon themselves, have they any power of doing it?—Not except through the local board; that is to say, no legal rate can be levied except through the local board.

543. You say that the local board can levy a charge upon a particular house, is there any limit to that charge?—No limit absolutely imposed by the Act.

544. Therefore they could levy a very large amount, could they not?—Yes, they could absorb the value of the house. Such a case is conceivable.

545. Mr. Gregory.] The basis of your assessment is the same as the poor rate, is it not?—Yes.

546. Is that the case with respect to minerals and mines?—There is no distinction; all classes of property that are assessible to the poor rate are assessible to our rate.

547. You are probably aware that mines are not assessible to the poor rate?—Yes, and the local board would be under the same condition in levying their rate.

548. Are you aware that under some special local Acts mines are rateable now?—I think I have heard of cases of mines having been made rateable.

549. With respect to the one-fourth of the general district rate on agricultural lands, as I understand you, where the roads are repaired out of the general district rate, you only levy one-fourth of that rate upon the agricultural district?—Upon the agricultural land.

550. Where the roads are not repaired out of the general district rate, there you levy the highway rate upon the agricultural land?—Yes.

551. Therefore that one-fourth is some rough estimate of their contribution to the general district rate in respect of the highways?—I should rather put it in this way, that the payment of one-fourth only is a representation of the set off which the farmers are entitled to in consideration of their paying towards the town improvement. Where farmers pay the general district rate a large portion of that general district rate is absorbed by the improvement of the town, and therefore it is considered fair that they should be exempt from the cost of road repair on three-quarters of their assessment value in consideration of their paying a proportion of the expenses of the town improvement.

552. But they only pay one-fourth of the expenses of the town improvement, including in that the repair of the highways?—Yes, that is so; but then the whole is thrown into one sum, and they pay one-fourth only. If they pay nothing for town improvements they pay on their full value to the highway rates, because they are exempt from the rest of the rates.

553. You take this one-fourth on the general district, as a sort of equivalent, do you not, for what would be the highway rate under other circumstances?—It was not so fixed.

554. I mean that as the equity of it?—Yes, that is the sort of rough justice of it.

555. Did I rightly understand you to express an opinion that rating was for the benefit of population and not of the property?—That has always seemed to me to be the sound theory of it.

556. Are you aware how manufactories are rated under the Poor Law and under your assessment?—Yes.

557. They are rated, are they not, by the engines engines and plant upon them?—I believe so; I do not know, as a matter of fact, what the principle is.

558. They are rated, are they not, on the footing of what a solvent tenant would give for them, including the fixtures of those premises?—Yes.

559. You are probably aware that there are some large trading premises that are not manufacturing premises, which are rated upon the bare value of the tenements?—Yes.

560. Is that a correct principle, in your estimation?—I cannot see that it is.

561. You have been asked as to the powers of the board to make a street for instance, and to throw the expenses of it upon the occupiers within a limited period, say five years; would the board under the Act have the power to undertake such a work as that?—They have power to construct new streets by consent.

562. But not taking lands compulsorily?—By consent of three-fourths of their number, and with the sanction of the Secretary of State.

563. That I think must be with the assent of the owners, must it not?—No, not a new street; if they are taking a private street, and turning it into a highway, they must have the consent of the owners.

564. But can they take land compulsorily?—They can buy land compulsorily for the purpose of constructing a new street, with those consents; or of unpaving existing streets without them.

565. The parties that would be liable to this rate would be the parties that would undertake its construction, would they not?—It would be the local board that would do it; the local board are the representatives of those who pay the rates.

566. And they have borrowing power under the Act by which they might pay for it?—Yes.

567. Then, I suppose the contingency is, that they would be assessing themselves for the rate necessary for raising the money by borrowing?—In all cases of such work, as far as I know, they do it by borrowing.

568. Have you never known an instance of its being done by a rate?—No; the borrowing extends over 30 years.

569. Chairman.] Can they borrow without your sanction?—No.

570. Mr. Gregory.] In any instance that you know of permanent work, it has been constructed with borrowed money?—Yes, that is so.

571. Mr. Birley.] You say that in the case of private improvements, the expense might either be levied upon the occupier as rates or recovered summarily of the owner in one sum?—Yes.

572. Is it not at the option of the board, whatever the cost may be, and have they not the power to compel immediate payment?—Yes, they have that power, subject to appeal to the Secretary of State.

573. Is there any general Act of Parliament that lays down the principle of assessment for local improvements to show what property may be assessed; or does it depend, practically, upon the poor law assessment, with such variations as have been introduced by special Acts?—The assessment generally is governed by the poor law statutes; there is no special Assessment Act for the purpose of those statutes.

574. But under the poor law assessment it varies, as in the instance of one-fourth for market gardens and for farm land, and as in the case of unoccupied premises being liable?—Of course, this Act contains special rules with regard to rating; special rules which govern the rating under that Act are contained in the Act itself; but, except in so far as this Act varies the principles of poor law assessment, they may be said generally to govern the rating.

575. You are now referring to the Public Health Act of 1848?—Yes, the Act of 1848 contains most of the rules as to rating, but they are varied by the Act of 1858 in certain particulars.

576. Mr. St. Aubyn.] The answer that you gave to the first question of the honourable Member for Sussex relating to mines, referred, I presume, to coal mines?—Coal mines; and I believe possibly there may be some local cases of iron mines or other mineral mines.

577. You do not wish the Committee to understand that mineral mines other than coal mines are rated?—No; our Act rates all property liable to the poor rate, therefore that class of questions to which your query relates arises under the poor rate, and not under our Act, which is governed by the poor rate.

578. You were asked a question with regard to the working of local boards under the Local Government Act; have you ever heard of local boards coming into collision with assessment committees with regard to valuation?—I have occasionally heard of it, but it has not been prominent; it is not a subject that I have had much correspondence upon; I do remember some cases of questions arising, but it is some time ago, and I have certainly not had many, and not any recently.

579. Have none of them been of any importance?—No, none of any importance; at least not of sufficient importance to impress themselves upon my mind.

580. It has not been a common subject of grievance?—No, certainly not.

581. You stated in answer to a question from the Right Honourable Chairman that if the occupier were relieved to the extent of one-half from those rates the owner would find some means to recover it; that, of course, could be only at the expiration of the existing lease?—I suppose that if any such alteration were made in the law it would provide for existing agreements and leases, and so on.

582. Otherwise at the end of the lease, the owner having the power of which you speak, the two would find themselves relatively in the same position as they were before the occupier was relieved of half his burden?—Yes.

583. Mr. Corrance.] Have not almost all your observations related to one class of rating under the improvement Act?—The bulk of them related to the general district rate.

584. Your evidence relates, does it not, to a number of classes included under what is called the Improvement Act of 1858?—My evidence relates almost entirely to that Act, and the Act of 1848, of course. My experience extends over the whole period of the working of those Acts. I have been engaged in their administration since 1850, and during the whole of that time, therefore, I have been conversant with both Acts.

18 March 1870.

585. Do the powers extend to the country generally?—Not the powers of those Acts.

586. How is the limit of their operation defined?—Those Acts only come into force, the Act of 1848 when it is applied, and the Act of 1858 when it is adopted.

587. What is the utmost limit of the powers under the Act; does it apply to towns, or to the country generally?—Any class of places; as I before mentioned, the divisions known to law are boroughs, towns, parishes, townships, and hamlets; but there may be also districts created, not having known defined boundaries, except for the purposes of this Act.

588. Then it is generally applicable throughout the whole country?—It may be, but it is meant for the necessities of a certain population. I may say that in no case of a population under 3,000 can it be put in force without the sanction of the Secretary of State. That was found necessary in order to prevent a great number of small places adopting it, with a view to escape from the operation of the Highway Act.

589. You have stated to the Committee that it is put in effect partly by the farmers and residents in the country, and partly, in some cases, by the rural authorities; how are the boundaries defined?—Simply by the action of the local board dividing its district under the power of the 89th section.

590. What have they powers to include; how much country?—There is no limit; as I said it is a matter of discretion

591. In fact any amount of country and town might be accumulated and amalgamated under this Act?—I should mention that the creation of a district for the first time is done by a petition to the Secretary of State, signed by one-tenth of the owners and ratepayers, in number or value, living within the area, of which they appoint and prescribe a boundary. They petition the Secretary of State to settle that boundary, and then he sends down an inspector, who examines into the propriety of that boundary, and who has it in his power to make a modification of it, and the Secretary of State finally settles the boundary, so that there is an appeal to him; the parties who are dissatisfied with the boundary always do appeal against the boundary proposed. There is very often a very great difference of opinion as to the boundary, and that difference of opinion is settled by the inspector and the Secretary of State. I should also say that the boundary so settled is merely settled for the purpose of coming to a vote upon the adoption of the Act. The Act is not brought in force in that boundary, but the boundary has created the place within which the vote may be taken for or against the adoption of the Act.

592. Mr. Ayrton.] Will you refer to the Act of Parliament which you are describing?—It is the Local Government Act of 1858.

593. Mr. Corrance.] After that vote has been taken and a boundary created, will you tell us what are the powers and in whom are they vested?—The local board is then elected within the district which has adopted the powers of this Act.

594. And does that body apportion its rate severally between the different classes under it?—It has its power of dividing the district.

595. You have mentioned an apportionment of one-fourth and three-fourths?—That is not an apportionment; I have mentioned certain classes of property which are assessable on one-fourth of their annual value under the Act.

596. Not subject to the discretion of the local board?—No; the only discretion which the local board exercises is in the division of their district for rating purposes. They may divide their district for separate assessments for all or any purposes of the Act.

597. You say that there is a considerable difference as to the application of the Act, so that it leaves it discretionary upon these local boards as to who shall pay a certain proportion of the rate if they have not adopted the Highway Act?—Yes, but they would construct the district so as to include both town and country.

598. Therefore it is after all at the discretion of the local board how those burdens shall be borne?—They have considerable power, no doubt. For instance, a local board in which farmers have the preponderance would levy the rates with one leaning, and a local board in which townspeople have the preponderance would levy the rates with another leaning, and there is frequently considerable collision between those classes of interests.

599. Do you think usually that some fair adjustment of the question is arrived at by the local boards, and are you satisfied with the application of those rates by the local boards?—I fancy that a rough kind of justice is arrived at, the great tendency being always to levy the smallest number of rates possible, and the pressure being always against heavy rating. In some cases the local boards have levied heavy rates, but the pressure is always the other way, and constituents look sharp after their local boards; besides one-third of the local board retire every year, so that there is good opportunity for bringing pressure to bear upon the local board by election.

600. Would you consider that some different classification of those rates is necessary, in order that they should be justly assessed?—I am not aware of any great change that you could make in the present arrangement with a view to ensure more justice.

601. Would you levy the highway rate, as it is now, partly upon one class and partly upon another?—The purpose for which this was introduced was to get something like justice.

602. Do you allow that your principle can only be partially applied?—As you have districts consisting partly of town and partly of country, I do not see how you can escape from it.

603. You have told us that in some cases below 10*l.* the owners can be rated; does that come under the General Compounding Act of Sir William Clay, or is it under the powers of the Act itself?—Under the Local Government Act itself.

604. Independently altogether of any composition?—Yes, the composition Acts relate to the poor rate.

605. You have told us that you consider that the benefits derived from those rates are general, for the most part, and apply to the occupier generally throughout; would that lead to the conclusion that the owner should be rated or the occupier?—I have already said that I think, with regard to rates for purposes that are defrayed by payments over a term of years, you cannot rate any one but the occupier; that, do what you will, the occupier will pay them in the long run, run, and during the time that his lease is running the burden will fall upon him.

606. Mr. Acland.] Do you mean the run of his lease?—I mean that however you distribute the rates, nominally they will always fall upon the occupier.

607. What is the measure of time meant by the long run?—I meant that they would come, in the end, upon the occupier.

608. What measure of time is that?—I mean that whatever arrangement you adopt, sooner or later, the payment will come to the occupier. You cannot adopt any arrangement with regard to the payment of rates by which you can lift it off the shoulders of the occupier. If you charge it upon the owner, he will make the occupier pay it.

609. Mr. Corrance.] I think you told us that a manufacturer, employing a great number of hands, is still only rated in proportion to his tenement and fixed machinery?—Yes, that is so; he is rated in the same manner as to the poor rate.

610. And yet you think that the burthen will fall upon the occupier?—Yes.

611. If a manufacturer discharged his hands during a slack time, and threw them back upon the rates, upon whom would that burden fall?—If he continues to occupy the manufactory he still pays the rates.

612. He still pays the rates on the manufactory; but on whom would the main portion of the burden fall in such a case as that, where the rate is assessed upon the owner?—It is not assessed upon the owner; as far as I know it is assessed upon the occupier.

613. I was contemplating the possibility of their shifting this burden upon the owner, and I want a distinct answer to this: if a manufacturer discharges his hands, and the burden of maintenance falls on the owners of property, on what class of owners would it generally fall?—I do not understand your question.

614. Would it not fall upon the owners of houses and other borough property in the town?—Yes, I presume that the class of those who own manufactories, and so on, is the same class generally as those who own houses and town property.

615. But if it fell upon the occupiers, they being the occupiers of houses, this rate would fall upon them partially?—Yes.

616. Would not it virtually come to this, that the rate would be a rate in aid of wages?—You are taking the case of people who have ceased to earn wages, and are thrown upon the rates.

617. You do not consider it in such a case as an actual rate in aid of wages?—No, as I have just said, you are taking the case of people who are thrown out of work.

618. If a manufacturer is able to throw his hands out of work, and throw them upon the rates, those rates not falling, except a small portion, upon himself, is not that absolutely throwing a part of his wages upon those rates?—It seems to me that this question relates to the poor rate; I am speaking of town improvement rates, and you are asking a question which seems to me, as far as I understand it, to bear upon the question of poor rates. My experience is limited to local government rates.

619. Then you would not consider that this especial class of rates would have any such effect as I have indicated?—I do not see how it would be so.

620. You spoke of the election of a board and of the qualifications; do you consider that allowing a plurality of votes is a proper mode in which the board should be elected?—As far as I have had experience I certainly think that the plurality of votes is a wholesome provision, more so the more I have seen of the working of this Act.

621. Do you think that that is the only way in which an owner could exercise the proper amount of control over the rates?—I think, generally speaking, it is the way in which property exercises a wholesome influence, because it affects not merely owners but also ratepayers; they have a number of votes as well as owners, so that the tendency is to keep down questionable expenditure.

622. Would it not be more simple to have a composite body, partly of owners, and partly of occupiers, in relative proportions?—The question is choosing a board; and you now do get a body of owners and occupiers. I scarcely understand whether the question refers to the electors or the elected.

623. With regard to those who are elected upon the board under separate qualifications, do you consider that the exercise of that power as regards plurality of votes is a better mode of securing the power in the hands of the owners, than by having a board composed under separate qualifications, and a distinct number of each?—That is to say, a certain number of ratepayers elected, and a certain number of owners elected; I presume this is a rough way of getting at that. I should think it would be very difficult to determine in any case how many owners you would have, and how many ratepayers; I do not know upon what principle you could settle that; I do not see any way of settling it.

624. I think in one of your answers you stated that the operation of the board mainly depended upon the excellence of the chairman and clerk, and that you considered the composition of the board to be a secondary consideration?—If you could get all the members good ones, that would be the best board; of course it would be pre-eminently a good board, if you could get a good chairman and a good clerk, and all the members good ones, and in proportion as you get good members the board is good; but what I meant by referring to the chairman and the clerk, was that they were the two leading elements for testing the merits of a board as far as I know.

625 Mr. Acland.] Have not those 674 local bodies, to whom you have referred, grown spontaneously, or the greater part of them?—Yes.

626. Do you think that the time is approaching when it would be desirable to have a division of the whole country into districts, or do you think it better to leave the country to go on shaping itself voluntarily in this way, according to the units that it may make of itself?—I think that the whole question of local divisions is becoming so complicated that sooner or later it will be necessary to overhaul the country with reference to it. The towns are already constituted, and the boroughs are constituted for other purposes, and those, I presume, must remain as they are; but certainly, with regard to the class of districts which are neither boroughs nor towns, I think that overhauling will become necessary.

627. Could you give us a table showing under certain heads how many of those districts are purely urban and how many are rural, and how many are semi-rural?—That could be determined very closely by going over the list of them. You will see in the list which is published by Knight, in the local board almanack as it is called, he puts to each board its addition, as borough, town, or parish, or township. Almost all cases where the districts are parishes, townships or hamlets are semi-rural.

628. Would there be any difficulty in your office in sending us in a classified arrangement by which we could arrive at some conclusion as to how far country districts are shaping themselves into units under this local government Act?—I could give the Committee such a return.

629. A large number will, I presume, include a considerable country as well as town area?—A considerable number.

630. Would you say over 100?—Yes, a good many more.

631. Are some of them to the extent of several square miles?—Some are large; for instance, where the Act has been adopted by a parish, that parish very often includes a considerable area of agricultural land.

632. In the improvements of such a district some improvements are in the nature of improvements of the ordinary comfort of the inhabitants of the town, and some are in the nature of improvement of the health of the district, and some tend also to increase the agricultural value of the land, do they not, in case of drainage for instance?—Yes; but the drainage which is carried out under our Act rarely increases the value of land materially; it is generally round a town, and it would be very narrow in its operation. It is rarely that there is any substantial improvement caused in the agricultural value of land.

633. In fact the subject of lowering the water table over a large district around a town has hardly come in under your Act?—Of course to a town the lowering of the water table is a matter of great importance as affecting the health of the town. In cases where that has been done upon such a scale as to materially affect the height of the water table, it may have benefited the land round about the town, but that would not be any great area of agricultural land.

634. Is not it the fact that in some towns in England, take Oxford for instance, the health of the whole town, and therefore also presumably the value of the property of the town is greatly affected by the state of the surrounding district for some miles?—There are cases conceivable in which the lowering of the water table by town drainage might affect an area of some extent around a town, but of course that would depend entirely upon the conformation of the country. It would be very difficult to give a general answer to that question.

635. What do you mean by lowering the water table by town drainage?—I mean by the sewage operations that are carried out.

636. Is it not the fact that there are towns in England in which the health of the people is sensibly affected by the damp and the ill-drained condition of the surrounding country for some miles?—No doubt that is so.

637. Is not that a very important subject to be dealt with by local governments?—Yes, if you could reduce the damp of the town areas as distinct from their sewering; that is to say, if you could drain to get rid of the surface water and dry the site of the town as well as sewer the town, that would most materially improve its health. All sewering does indirectly do that.

638. Is it not the fact that the per-centage or proportion of consumption and other diseases is distinctly traceable to the condition of large areas of country?—No doubt drying the subsoil is one of the most important sanitary operations that you could engage in.

639. Is there not great difficulty in carrying out any large plans of that kind, as long as the mode of rating agricultural land and town land has no reference to those considerations of the different interests which the agricultural owners and the inhabitants of towns have, and is not some change of the law required to meet all those circumstances?—I should think that there is very great difficulty and danger of collision as between the agricultural and the town interests in those matters.

640. And that is the case, notwithstanding the existing law, which has provided for the apportionment between the inhabitants of towns and the owners and occupiers of agricultural land around a town, so that they should pay fairly in respect of the benefit which they respectively get?—I do not think that the law aims at that at all; it does not affect it.

641. Is there any provision by which the respective benefits derived by each class can be fairly apportioned between them?—Not in the law as it stands.

642. Do you attach great importance to the control over the mortgaging power of the ratepayers over their own property?—Yes.

643. And where is that control at present?—In the Secretary of State.

644. Is that control sufficient?—I think so; at least I think that it would be sufficient if he had the power of looking after it. It is quite sufficient in the first instance for the purpose of securing that the mortgage shall be for a proper object, and so on, and that the arrangements are fair, but with regard to the subsequent application of the money, there is considerable want of power; there is no inspecting power; there is no power to see that the money is properly applied.

645. You have already said that in your opinion, on the whole, the present constitution of the local boards works tolerably well; do you think that there is sufficient provision under the existing law for the owners of property taking a wide and large view of their own interests, in expending their money upon structural improvements, tending either to the health of the town, or to the value of the property around the town?—It seems to me that this is a question of general education; it depends upon the wisdom of the owners.

646. Does the present state of the law give the owners a sufficient interest and responsibility for the expenditure to make it worth their while to take a long-sighted view of improvements?—The direct pressure of rates upon the owner is not all; but ultimately, I fancy, the owner is so very largely interested in the general prosperity of the place, that he is quite as much interested as any occupier can be in the general question of rating and of local administration.

647. The way that he feels himself affected now is by the improvement of the value of his rent, is it not?—Yes, it is, indirectly; I do not know how far you could directly provide for that.

648. Supposing the suggestion of the honourable Member for East Suffolk were adopted, that the owners were directly represented on the board of freeholders; persons possessing a property qualification, and that they had one-half, or one-third, or two-thirds, as the case might be, of the votes on the board, is it not probable that they would more directly feel the pressure of the rates upon themselves, and look further ahead in making arrangements for the benefit of those places?—I am not sure whether the honourable Member means that the incidence of the rates is to remain as it is at present.

649. I am supposing, of course, that half the rate, which seems a fair proportion of the rates, falls directly upon the persons who receive the rents?—Possibly; if they had to pay the rate directly, they would be more practically sensible of the pressure and anxious to interfere in its administration, and more anxious for representation. The man who pays the rate will always be more keenly sensible of the amount of it than the man who does not pay it directly that is to say, even though he pays it indirectly.

650. The present arrangement under the Local Government Act does not bring home to the man who receives the rack-rent of houses, the gradual rise and fall of rates from year to year?—No, it does not in his character of owner; but, generally speaking, so far as he is resident in the place, he is also an occupier.

651. He may not be a nobleman or a great landed proprietor, he may have a couple of thousand a year in the town?—Then he does not feel it.

652. Except that his grandson may feel it 30 or 40 years hence?—Yes, he only feels it indirectly.

653. You are aware that upon the continent, in France particularly, there is in every parish a person called the maire, and in every department there is a person called the préfet; do you think that our English habits would make it altogether impossible that anything like personal responsibility should be fixed upon any one individual for taking the initiative in our towns, or is it better to leave it to a board as represented by their chairman?—I think it is better to leave it with the board.

654. You think that the initiative is sufficiently provided by your local boards and by the spontaneous action of public opinion?—I think that that is the only thing that you can rely upon.

655. Do you find that the initiative is sufficiently readily taken by local bodies?—I think you must keep as a last resort the power to put the screw upon local authorities if they absolutely refuse to do their duty; you must keep that power somewhere; I think such a power must be reserved to put pressure upon supine local authorities in the last resort.

656. How is that pressure now put by the present law?—By the Secretary of State.

657. What is that power?—The power of instituting an inquiry upon complaint of local default, and if the complaint is found to be proved, and the default has been committed, there is power to make an order upon the local authorities, limiting a certain time for the performance of the duty; and if they do not perform the duty within a certain time, the Secretary of State may appoint a person to do it at their expense.

658. Am I right in saying that, upon the whole, the present system of trusting localities to look after their own health, works very much better than an attempt to act by the central authority solely?—Certainly; I think the central authority has the utmost difficulty in acting in this country even in extreme cases.

659. Under the Local Government Act do you think that the local initiative is acting much better?—I think, on the whole, it is, because we always found under the Public Health Act that when you attempted to interfere in defiance of local opinion, you created such ill-will that the friction was enough almost, if not quite, to neutralise your efforts.

660. Should you be disposed to draw a distinction between structural works and other works, as to the charges which ought to be placed upon the owners and occupiers, I mean work for the general benefit of a town, such as main sewers, main roads, and main bridges?—Of course, in all cases, except where you distribute that charge as it is now, you distribute that charge by rule; you borrow first, and you distribute the payment over a number of years.

661. I am supposing the suggestion upon which this Committee is founded, that owners and occupiers are to be each charged separately from year to year with the amount of pressure from the fair rise and fall of the rates; would it not in that case be desirable to draw a distinction, and say that certain permanent structural charges should fall upon the owners, and that the current expenses for repairs and salaries, and so on, should fall generally on both owner and occupier?—If that were possible, it would be very desirable.

662. Mr. Ayrton.] Have you directed your attention seriously to the incidence of rates, and the principles upon which they should be levied?—Only in so far as regards certain questions connected with the matter.

663. I mean as applicable to the rates with which you are more particularly conversant; have you considered the subject at all?—Certainly, I have considered it.

664. Do you recognise an inherent distinction between land used as a manufactory for the production of food, and house property, which is unproductive of itself, and is merely used for the occupation of a tenant with regard to rates under this Act?—I have always considered that what should determine liability to rates was the tendency to create population; that all property which tends to create population, and to amass population in a body, should be made liable to the payment of those rates.

665. A house has a tendency to create population as much as anything else, has it not?—I referred to manufactures; I have never heard any doubt raised as to the liability of house property; the class of property with regard to which I have always heard the claim to exemption urged is property that employs labour, and that is not used for habitation. I have commonly heard it put that manufacturers should not pay so much, because manufacturers were not benefited by the sewerage or by the water supply, and so on. In the same way with farmers; I have heard heard it said, "Why should farmers pay; their property is not benefited by sewers?" and so on. My answer to that has always been, "If your property causes aggregates of labourers to be brought together, requiring those rates to be levied, which it does, then your property should pay; here you have got a manufactory which employs 500 men; those 500 men and their families are the very people that help to swell that class which renders necessary the imposition of those rates.

666. Then the occupation of land in that respect would only be rateable as measured by its production as compared with the manufactory and the number of hands that it employs?—Yes, by employment of fewer hands.

667. Is not that rather a defective measure of rating to introduce, because persons who live in houses and create no employment would be exempt from taxation if that were the measure of taxation?—They enjoy all the benefits of the town convenience, and, therefore, they ought to pay their proportion to it.

668. In taxing a farm, as compared with taxing a house in a town, the only thing to be taxed seems to be the farmhouse?—That is one view of it; I look upon it that you should tax property with reference to the amount of labour that it calls into existence; if a farmer employs a dozen labourers, and those labourers lodge in a small town near it, which they do very often, then those labourers are the very class that call into existence this kind of rates, and create the necessity for them.

669. If you tax upon that principle a manufactory employing 1,000 people, you would tax the manufactory, would you not, for the 1,000 houses that are occupied by the workmen in the manufactory?—Indirectly; I do not mean to say that you should do it absolutely, but that would be one reason why the manufacturer should pay a considerable proportion of the rates.

670. You perceive that there is a very inherent distinction between land when it is used merely as a machinery for producing food, and houses which measure the general income and the general wants of the family occupying the house?—I doubt if the general income and the general wants of the people should be the real measure of town taxation.

671. Have you entered into the subject much?—I have not, except in reference to the question of exemptions from rates, and the liability to rates; that has been the point from which it has principally suggested itself to me practically.

672. You have not gone seriously into the question of upon whom the rates should fall?—Not into the general question, nor into all the incidents of the case. I have not made a special study of it, except, as I say, with reference to my special subject.

673. Mr. Rathbone.] Did I rightly understand you to say that the local boards have power to divide their district into separate areas of taxation to meet local peculiarities, and that since they have that power it has worked very well, and has removed the causes of disputes that were previously so frequent?—I believe it has worked on the whole fairly.

674. Chairman.] There are rates for lighting and watching which are not under local boards; those naturally have not come under your notice?—No; when the Act is applied to a district in which the watching and lighting rate has been levied under Watching and Lighting Acts, those Acts are superseded, and the matter is provided for by the rates under our Act.

675. Can you state to the Committee under what authority those bodies are?—Under no central authority; they are purely local.

676. Their accounts are not audited in any way, I believe?—Not in any way, so far as I know.

677. By whom are improvement commissioners appointed?—Improvement commissioners were very often self-elected; that is to say, the body was named in the original Act, and that body in the old Acts, in almost all cases, elected to vacancies in its own body, and their accounts were never audited.

678. The rates which are now levied by improvement commissioners are not audited at all, are they?—As a general rule they are not. In very recent Acts there may be a provision for auditing; but it is quite a new notion.

679. You have got, besides the general district rate with regard to which you have been giving evidence, the lighting and watching rate which is levied separately?—Yes, by a body with the title of overseers of watching and lighting.

680. And those two classes of rates are under no Government office at all?—No.

681. Could you suggest to the Committee who would be able to give evidence as to the way in which they are levied; there is no public department to whom they are amenable?—No; there is no public functionary under whose control they are.

682. What is the definition of "owner" in the Local Government Act and in the Public Health Act?—There is a separate definition given of "owner" for the purposes of election, and of "owner" for other purposes.

683. I mean for voting purposes?—"The word 'owner' shall mean the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent." He is the person into whose hands the rack-rent comes; that is, for ordinary purposes. Then for election there is another definition.

684. Mr. Fielden.] Can local boards act under several Acts?—They act under the Public Health Act, the Local Government Act, and some Amendment Acts.

685. Are not the provisions of these Acts found to clash somewhat?—No, not of these Acts.

686. From the experience that you have, do not you feel that it would benefit the public if you could consolidate those Acts?—Certainly, they ought to be consolidated; but I mean that practically there is no collision.

687. Mr. Corrance.] You have stated, have you not, to the Committee that the rates levied under Improvement Acts have to a certain extent not been included in any general returns?—No; the rates under the Improvement Acts were not included under any general returns till the Act of 1861; in fact, there was no such thing up to that time, but since the Act of 1861 they have been returned.

688. Do you consider that the whole of those things things which are included under the Improvement Acts of 1848 and 1858 are mainly special and local rather than general?—They are entirely local, having relation to the wants of the districts, and all those local wants together make up the general.

689. But they are special to the locality?—Yes.

18 March 1870.

Mr. Frederick Brooksbank Garnett, called in; and Examined.

690. Chairman.] You are Assistant Chief Inspector of the Inland Revenue?—Yes.

691. Are you conversant with the law as regards the levying of the income-tax?—Yes.

692. Will you state to the Committee the mode in which the income-tax is levied from the owner of real property under the Income-tax Acts?—Through the occupier in all cases; the occupier is assessed.

693. And has not the occupier a right to deduct it from the rent?—Yes, on the next payment of rent.

694. Is there any clause by which the occupier and the owner are prohibited from contracting that it shall not be so deducted?—Yes, there is.

695. Will you read the clause?—It is the 73rd section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35: "Provided always, and be it enacted, that no contract, covenant, or agreement between landlord and tenant, or any other person, touching the payment of taxes and assessments to be charged on their respective premises, shall be deemed or construed to extend to the duties charged thereon under this Act, nor to be binding contrary to the intent and meaning of this Act, but that all such duties shall be charged upon and paid by the respective occupiers, subject to such deductions and repayments as are by this Act authorised and allowed, and all such deductions and repayments shall be made and allowed accordingly, notwithstanding such contracts, covenants, and agreements."

696. Could a contract be made that the occupier should not have the power to deduct from the owner?—It might be made; but it would be invalid in law.

697. If the occupier were to contract that he would not deduct the income tax from the owner, he would, nevertheless, be able to deduct it, because it would be an illegal contract?—Yes.

698. As far as you know, have there come to the knowledge of the Inland Revenue instances of contracts made in contravention of this provision?—Yes, such contracts have been made; but whenever they have come to the knowledge of the Inland Revenue, they have been held to be invalid under the Act. There is a penalty for refusing to allow the deduction, under clause 103 of the same Act: "And be it enacted, that if any person shall refuse to allow any deduction authorised to be made by this Act out of any payment of annual interest of money lent, or other debt bearing annual interest, whether the same be secured by mortgage or otherwise, he shall forfeit for every such offence treble the value of such principal money or debt; and if any person shall refuse to allow any deduction authorised to be made by this Act out of any rent or other annual payment mentioned in the 9th and 10th Rules of No. IV., Schedule (A.), or out of any annuity or annual payment mentioned in Schedules (C.) or (E.), or in the next preceding clause, save such annual interest as aforesaid, every such person shall forfeit the sum of 50 l.; and all contracts, covenants, and agreements made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid, in full, without allowing such deduction as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

Mr. F. B. Garnett.

699. Does that cover rent?—Yes; that would apply to real property; it does not apply to the deduction from rent merely, but also from any charge upon the property including mortgages.

700. Do you consider that generally speaking the law is effectual in reference to allowing tenants, as a general rule, to make this deduction from the landlord?—Yes, we think so.

701. As far as regards the tenant, the occupier, is not the person from whom he deducts the income tax his immediate landlord?—The immediate lessor.

702. How does the immediate lessor proceed; can he go on deducting?—He can go on deducting. If there should be any out-going in the way of rent-charge, or any charge in the way of mortgage interest, he can deduct the tax upon the proportion that he has to pay by way of out-going from the annual value.

703. Would the ground landlord be reached?—Yes, in the same way, upon payment of the ground rent; the proportion of the tax upon the ground rent would be deducted.

704. So that the interest is followed from the occupier through all those who are interested in the property, up to the ground landlord?—Quite so.

705. And each pays in proportion to the rent or profit that he receives out of the estate?—Yes, that is the case.

706. Mr. Ayrton.] If a person owns a house which he has let for 100 l. a year, and an income tax of 1 s. in the pound is put upon it, and he then lets it for 105 l., he has entirely defeated all the provisions which you have been reading to us, has he not?—No; I do not see that he has.

707. If he owns a house of 100 l. a year, and an income tax of 1 s. in the pound is put upon it, and thereupon he raises the rent to 105 l., he has entirely defeated all the provisions which you have read to us, minus the 5 s. on the 5 l.?—No; the property would be liable to assessment upon the annual value whatever it is.

708. He would then receive 105 l., would he not?—Yes; but he would be subject to assessment on 105 l. if the rent were raised to that amount.

709. But he would have received from his tenant 105 l.?—Yes.

710. And his tenant will deduct five guineas for income tax?—Yes.

711. He would therefore receive 100 l. less 5 s.; whereas, if he put on 5 l. 6 s., he would rebate nothing, and all the provisions which you have read to us would be completely nullified, would they not?—The tenant would deduct the income tax upon the rent which he pays to the owner, whatever that rent is. If the value exceeds the rent, then the tenant would have to bear the proportion upon the difference.

712. You have read the clause which says that there shall be no contract not to deduct the income tax; I ask you if the landlord be in receipt of 100 l. a year, and income tax of 1 s. in the pound be put upon that, and the landlord then raises the rent to 105 l. 6 s., all those provisions would be defeated, would they not, because the landlord would continue to receive 100 l. a year as he did before, and the tenant would pay the whole of the income tax?—The tenant would be assessed, and would have power to deduct it from the rent.

713. He would pay as much net rent as he payed before, and he would pay the whole of the income tax, would he not?—Yes.

714. And that would be perfectly legal?—Yes.

715. Therefore that clause really applies only to the landlord, in so far as he cannot change the contract between himself and the tenant; is not that so?—But the tenant would bear the tax upon the extra proportion that was put upon the original rent, but he would still have the power of deducting the income tax from the landlord.

716. Do you not see that the effect of that clause is merely to keep the income tax upon the landlord when he cannot change the measure of the rent between himself and the tenant?—The tax would still be borne by the landlord.

717. Cannot he always recoup himself by raising the rent, if the contract between him and the tenant is not so permanent as to prevent him doing so?—In the income tax assessment, if the rent increases the tax follows the increased rent.

718. Mr. Walter.] Supposing there has been an income tax of 5 l. assessed upon a house of 100 l. a year, the landlord will recoup himself by raising the rent to 105 l., but does not that assume that the landlord has the power of doing so?—Yes.

719. Mr. Ayrton] The whole thing depends upon the power of the landlord to alter the contract by raising the rent?—But that would be a new letting.

720. Sir Massey Lopes.] Of course the tenant would have the option of saying whether he would take the house again at the increased rent or not?—Yes.

721. So that it is optional with him either to terminate his tenancy or to go on with it?—Yes.

722. Mr. Ayrton.] Do you not see that the clause assumes that he can make that contract, because it prohibits him from doing so. I am assuming that the contract can be made, and if the contract can be made in one shape, cannot it equally be made in the other, and the Act be reduced to a nullity?—I do not see it in that light.

723. Sir Massey Lopes.] How can you provide against that. Of course the house must be at a fixed rent, and you could never alter that during the lease; would not that be so?—Yes.

724. Mr. W. H. Smith.] Has there not been a very considerable increase in the value of property since the income tax was imposed?—A very large increase.

725. Has there not been a growth in the value of property greatly exceeding the amount realised by the property tax and income tax?—Yes, I believe so.

726. It is impossible, is it not, for you to tell whether that growth is due to competition, or decrease in the value of money, or to the fact that the tax now paid by the occupier, and recovered from the owner, is really in its turn recovered by the owner from the occupier?—Precisely so.

727. But the fact is clear that there has been a very large increase in the rental of the country?—Yes, a very large increase.

728. Colonel Brise.] The income tax is not always taken upon the rent, is it?—No, not necessarily upon the rent; the assessment is upon the annual value, and that may be beyond the rent.

729. Mr. Fielden.] Do you think that the effect of putting on a tax is to increase the value of property?—No.

730. Mr. Gregory.] Is it not the principle of those clauses that you have read to us to distribute this tax amongst all parties having an interest in the property?—Yes.

731. So that whoever may be the incumbrancer, whether the mortgagee, or the owner of the equity of redemption, the principle is to apportion the tax, as it were, between them, and to make them liable each for their contributions?—Yes.

732. That I presume you consider a just and proper principle?—Yes, it being a tax upon income.

733. Are you aware of that principle being applied to any other tax upon the income of landed property?—No.

734. With respect to all the other boards, local or otherwise, whatever may be the incumbrances upon the property, is it not the case that the owner of the equity of redemption has to bear them?—Yes, I believe so.

735. Therefore a property may be encumbered to the extent of three-fourths of its value, and the owner of the one-fourth has to bear the whole of the tax?—Yes.

736. Mr. Corrance.] When this income tax is levied, as you say, upon the occupier, is there any rebate made for what are called landlord's rates and taxes?—A deduction is allowed for certain rates and taxes, not all; there are certain specified deductions allowed by the Act.

737. Is not it the principle of the law that no tax shall be imposed upon a tax?—There is a deduction allowed for taxes.

738. For what are called landlord's rates and taxes?—Yes.

739. It being levied upon the occupier, would there be any allowance made for landlord's rates and taxes which would be so far upon the entire annual value?—The assessment would not be upon the entire annual value; an allowance is made for landlord's rates and taxes.

740. If any new rate is imposed upon the occupier, would the landlord's deduction for income tax be reduced in that respect?—No, there would be no deduction in that respect.

741. Would the landlord pay the same property tax?—Yes.

742. And yet, I suppose, you will admit that the rate ultimately falls upon the owner?—Yes; the deductions which are allowed under the Income Tax Acts are parochial rates and taxes on tithe rent charges, land tax, and drainage rates, &c.

743. Sir Massey Lopes.] Has there been any valuation since the year 1867?—1867 was the last assessment; there will be a new assessment this year.

744. Could you give us the relative proportion of the valuations, as between lands and houses?—I will supply a Return.

745. Chairman.] As regards the clause for preventing preventing contracts, would it have this effect, that if a contract had been entered into that the tenant was to bear all the rates and taxes, and such contract were legal, however the income tax might rise in amount, it would be paid by the tenant?—As a matter of agreement between the landlord and the tenant it might be so.

746. As a matter of fact, supposing there were not that clause in the law, then the tenant could contract with his landlord to pay all the Queen's taxes, in the same way as he contracts now to pay all the rates?—Yes, if there were not that clause.

747. And if there were an increase in the income tax during his tenancy, that increase would fall upon the tenant?—If the contract so provided.

748. The presence of the contract is useless, whenever there is a new letting, as a protection to the tenant, is it not, because then the landlord might ask so much more rent?—Yes.

749. But in existing contracts the fluctuations are now borne by the owner, as the tenant is prohibited from contracting that he will bear the fluctuations, and as those fluctuations cannot be estimated beforehand, the fluctuations are borne by the owner, are they not?—The fluctuations would be borne by the tenant in respect of a long lease, or a letting beyond seven years, because when a new assessment is made the Commissioners are not bound by the actual rent, but they may take the present value, and therefore an increased assessment may be made upon the property beyond the former assessment, and the increased assessment in that case would fall upon the tenant, being his beneficial occupation.

750. If he were assessed at 700 l. a year, while he was paying a rent of 500 l. a year, the 200 l. a year would be considered to be his beneficial interest, and he would not be able to deduct the rates upon that 200 l. from the rent?—No; he would only be able to deduct on 500 l. a year.

751. He deducts so much in the pound, does he not, from the rent?—Yes, from the rent that he pays.

752. Not the gross sum which is charged?—No, not the gross sum which is charged, but so much in the pound on the rent which he pays.

753. Supposing that there were an income tax of 1 s. in the pound, and he were paying a rent of 600 l. a year, if he were assessed at 600 l. a year, he would deduct the whole of that from the landlord, would he not?—Yes, he would.

754. If he were assessed at 650 l., he would himself have to pay 1 s. in the pound on 50 l.?—Yes.

755. How would it be if he were assessed only at 500 l.; then would he deduct from the owner the income tax of 1 s. in the pound upon the 500 l.?—That would be an illegal assessment; he would be charged below his value.

756. I presume that that occasionally occurs?—Yes, it does happen: sometimes from ignorance or from false returns which are sometimes made.

757. In that case the owner would get the advantage of it?—Yes; I apprehend that he would.

758. The owner only allows that which is paid by the tenant?—He might require proof of what the tenant had paid, and he might refuse to allow more than he had paid.

759. Has the question ever been considered at the Inland Revenue, of collecting this tax from the owner?—I believe it has been considered.

760. But it has been considered safer, I presume, as no change has been made, to deduct it from the occupier, and to pass through all the interests by the system of deductions?—Yes, the premises are liable; any effects on the premises are liable for the tax.

761. What is the case with respect to unoccupied houses as regards income tax?—They are discharged from assessment; no income tax is paid in respect of unoccupied houses.

762. Mr. Birley.] Is not the owner bound to mention in his general return any discrepancy between the rent he may have received and the rent he has been assessed upon, that is to say, if he has received 600 l., and has only paid upon 500 l., would he not be bound in his general return to assess himself with the difference?—Strictly speaking, he would.

763. Take the case of a shopkeeper, who pays 100 l. a year rent, but whom you assess, under Schedule A., at 150 l., as having a beneficial interest of 50 l. would he not be entitled to deduct from his profits that 50 l. which he is assessed upon above what he is able to charge against his landlord; that is, if he returns the full amount of his profits, and he is making a profit in all of 300 l. a year?—A person in business is entitled to deduct a portion of the annual value of his premises from his assessment under Schedule D.

764. He would be entitled to deduct, would he not, what he had paid beyond that?—He would be able to deduct, if he resided in the house, a proportion not exceeding two-thirds.

765. I mean, that he is not expected to pay upon more than his actual income?—No.

766. That is to say, his place of business is simply to him a place of business yielding him a return of profits which he honestly returns, and he is assessed at 150 l., being 50 l. above the rent, and, therefore, 50 l., more than he can recover from his landlord, would he not be entitled to take that as a reduction from his profits?—Yes; he would be entitled to deduct the whole of the rent assessed in respect of his business premises.

767. Do you mean the whole of his rent after getting the property tax from his landlord?—The rent as assessed would be deducted as a trade outgoing.

768. But then he would deduct not merely his rent, but his extra assessment?—Yes.

769. So that in one case the owner would be bound to return the excess, and in the other, the occupier would be entitled to deduct the excess?—Yes.

Mr. Henry Arthur Hunt, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H. A. Hunt. 18 March 1870.

770. Chairman.] You are a Surveyor, and you have had considerable experience in surveying and valuing property, have you not?—Yes.

771. Chiefly in the metropolis, or all over the country?—Chiefly in the metropolis, but sometimes in the country as umpire, in contested cases of compensations.

772. We should be glad to hear from you some evidence upon the way in which house and land property is affected by high or low rating. Are there any cases in London where you could have a fair opportunity of judging whether there is a difference made in the rents, obtainable from houses, by their being in high rated or low rated districts?—The assessment of the rates does not affect the letable value of property, and the saleable value of property.

773. Could you cite instances were part of a street or part of a square is situate in two parishes or unions, the one being high rated and the other low?—Lowndes-square is an instance of that; the east side of Lowndes-square is in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, and the west side is in the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea. The rates in St. George, Hanover-square, are comparatively low; in St. Luke's, Chelsea, they are higher, and cæteris paribus, a house on the west side would not realise the same rent as a house on the east side, for that reason; so also in another boundary of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, in Pimlico, a place known as Tachbrook-street, which is divided between the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, and the parish of St. John, Westminster; one side of that street is of a higher rental value than the other side, by reason of the difference between the rates in one parish and the rates in the other.

774. On whom would you hold that the rates fall in those cases, upon the occupier or owner?—The rates fall upon the owners of the property, according to my view.

775. The occupier pays the same sum in rent and rates together in both cases?—Yes.

776. But in the one case he pays more rent and less rates, and in the other more rates, and therefore less rent?—Yes, that is so.

777. And the difference therefore comes entirely from the owner of the property?—Yes; you must draw a distinction in this way, there may be, so to speak, two owners of the property, that is to say, the freeholder may be the owner of the ground rent, having granted a lease for 99 years, or some long term in the property to A. B. who has built a house upon it, which he lets at a certain rental. The ground rent has been fixed, having regard to the locality, and the burdens which the house erected upon the land would have to bear; the building owner is the person who however pays the local taxation, because the rates are assessed upon the owner or occupier of the property, according to the rack rental value of the house, which of course includes the interest upon the capital invested in bricks and mortar, and the value of the land upon which the building stands; with that explanation taxation falls upon the owner of the property.

778. If those ground rents were granted many years ago, the taxation would fall, would it not, entirely upon the owner of the house?—Yes; upon the beneficial owner of the lease.

779. Take the case of land that is not covered yet with houses, and suppose a man to have a plot of land with regard to which negotiations are pending for building purposes, would the builder take into account the amount of rates which would be paid upon the house which he put up, or would the owner have to take so much less for his land?—The owner would have to let his land at a less price if the rates were high, than if he had to let his land under similar circumstances where the rates were low; a man cannot afford to give so much for the land when the burdens are great in the parish as he can where they are light.

780. So that a builder would offer a smaller sum as ground rent if the rates were high?—Undoubtedly.

781. Beyond the value of agricultural land, the ground rent represents, does it not, the advantage that one locality has over another in situation?—Yes, certainly; that is to say, the situation of the property determines the value of it for building purposes.

782. In the same way, if a locality is heavily burdened by rates, that would come out of the ground rent in the first instance?—Yes; the ground rent would be diminished in consequence.

783. And therefore, where the ground rents are high, nearly all the rates in the first instance would come out of the ground rent?—A man intending to take land for building purposes would make his calculations as to how much capital he should invest in building the house, what rent he would probably receive for that house after it shall have been built, having regard to the rates which he would have to pay, or the tenant would have to pay, in respect of that house, and he would find from that calculation how much he could afford to give for the land, so as to recoup himself a fair interest upon his capital and pay the ground rent, subject, as the case would be, to rates high or low; it must be varied accordingly.

784. If, then, the rates are so high, he would give less rent?—Yes.

785. And therefore the rates would come out of the ground rent, so long as the ground rent could bear it?—That would be an element.

786. Will you state what proportion the ground rent bears in the best portions of the metropolis to what you would call the building rent?—The proportions vary in different localities, and I will endeavour to illustrate it in this way: if you take a plot of land in Belgrave-square, say 30 feet frontage, and 70 feet deep, and build a house upon it, and assume that the house, when built, will let for 800 l. a year, and that the building erected upon that piece of land would cost 7,000*l.* to erect, for the sake of illustration, the difference between the fair interest upon the outlay of 7,000 l. and the rent you might obtain for the house when built, represents the value of the ground for that house in Belgrave-square. But if you build a house of the same dimensions, costing ing the same money, in another neighbourhood not so good, say Russell-square, for instance, then that house costing the same money, 7,000 l., might not let for 600 l. a year; consequently the proportion of the ground rent to the rack value, or the proportion of the value in the ground, compared with the value of the house and the ground together, is greater in Belgrave-square by 200 l. a year than it is in Russell-square, by reason of the locality.

787. This is your position, that a house which would cost 7,000 l. to build might let in Belgrave-square for 800 l. a year, and the same house built in Russell-square, costing 7,000 l. also, will let at 600 l. a year?—Yes, but these figures must only be considered as illustrations.

788. In that case the proportion of the ground rent in Belgrave-square would be 200 l. greater than it is in the other situation?—Yes, quite so.

789. And supposing that in Russell-square the ground-rent were 200 l. a year, then that would be one-third of the cost, whereas that ground rent would be one-half in the case of Belgrave-square?—No; take Belgrave-square at 800 l. a year; take 7,000 l. as the capital to be expended upon the house, and take if you will, 7 per cent. upon that expenditure as a return for your money, that is 490 l. a year out of the 800 l., leaving 310 l. a year, which represents the ground rent. Then, on the other hand, if you take the same interest of the capital in Russell-square or Bedford-square, that would be 490 l. out of an assumed value of 600 l., the ground rent would be 110 l. That is the distinction between different localities in this metropolis. If you go into the east of London, houses let for so small a sum comparatively, that the proper return for the expenditure of capital in such a locality, forms so large a proportion of the rack rent as to leave a very small ground rent.

790. Would you consider that in poor neighbourhood the ground rent might very likely be not more than one-sixth?—Not more than one-sixth certainly, and sometimes less.

791. When you are called upon to advise upon questions of advancing money, what would you consider a safe ground rent, and for how many years?—That would depend very much upon the class of property; I should be unwilling to advance any money at all upon property in the east end of London, because it is particularly badly used, and very much neglected, and unless I got very high interest for my advance, I do not think I should be disposed to advance money upon it at all.

792. I want you to illustrate the value of the ground rent by this process if you can?—The value of the ground rent, that is to say, the number of years' purchase that it would realise in the market must of course depend upon the proportions of the rack value arising out of the houses, and of the ground rent from it; if you have a ground rent of 400 l. a year upon a house, which yields in rental 800 l. a year, that is a large proportion of the value of the house, consequently such a ground rent is not so well secured as if the rack value were five or six times the ground rent, because five or six times the amount of the ground rent leaves a wide margin for a great fluctuation in the value of the property, so as to bring it down to anything approaching to the amount of the ground rent itself, whereas if the ground rent be half the proportion of the value, it is possible under various alterations of circumstances and of situation, that the rack value of the house may come down to the level of the ground rent itself.

793. To come to the point of rating, so far as it touches the ground rent, where you have this large margin, as you would have in your assumed instance of Belgrave-square of 310 l. out of a rental of 800 l., if the rates were suddenly to rise very much there, in a new case of new lettings and owners, do you think that those rates would come out of that ground rent; I mean, of course, cæteris paribus, the demand remaining the same?—It would not come out of the owner of the ground rent as long as the lease lasted; but if that house fell into hand, and the owner, that is to say, the single owner, the freeholder, had that house to let, of course he must let it subject to the rates and taxes then chargeable upon property of that character; he must either take the old rent and let the lessee pay the increased rates and taxes, or he must reduce the rent of the house by reason of the increased amount of taxation; and it comes to this, what will the house bear in the shape of rent, the lessee paying the rates and taxes, if the rates and taxes are so high that a tenant cannot be found to take the house and pay the rates and taxes, and yet pay the old rent; it follows that the landlord must reduce the rent of his house by reason of the taxation that is put upon the house, and that falls upon him; and therefore what I desire to express is, that the taxation, in point of fact, falls upon the owner of the house, where the house is in the actual possession of the freeholder himself; that where the house is upon an unexpired building term, or even an unexpired term of any kind, any increase of taxation for the term of the lease falls upon the beneficial owner of the house, and not upon the freeholder, unless he happens to be also the beneficial owner.

794. You say that taxation would fall upon the freeholder; and in the case of those houses that we have been discussing, where there is a margin of 200 l., and where there is a wide margin, and the ground rent represents a large proportion, it might bear the taxation?—No; that depends upon whether my imaginary house in Belgrave-square will realise 800 l. a year, if you raise the rates of that parish to 10 s. in the pound; but if you cannot get a tenant to pay 10 s. in the pound and 800 l. a year also, then you must take it off the rent.

795. Taking that extreme case, 10 s. in the pound would represent 400 l. a year?—Yes.

796. And the assumed ground rent being only 300 l., if this 400 l. of rates were put on, the ground rent would be entirely exhausted, and the rest would accordingly have to fall upon the beneficial owner of the house, or upon the occupier?—Yes; but you see that that would not touch the holder of the ground rent.

797. I am assuming a good letting?—Then the ground rent is merged in the general rack rent of the premises.

798. Now go to the other case in the east end, where you state that the ground rent might not be more than one-sixth, and take a house worth 60 l. a year for the sake of argument; 10 l. will then represent the ground rent; and supposing that that the rates rise in that place by 5 s. in the pound, that is one-fourth, and that one-fourth upon the 60 l. would be 15 l.; of course that could not be borne by the ground rent, because the ground rent is only 10 l.?—Quite so.

799. Does not it therefore come to this, that in proportion as the ground rent is smaller, the owner is likely to bear less of taxation?—He does not bear any during the existence of the lease, as I have already endeavoured to explain.

800. You and I are assuming different cases; my question assumes cases where there is a fresh letting?—Then the proportion of the ground rent to the rack rent has nothing to do with it, because it is merged into the rack value of the property.

801. But though it is merged, a portion represents the ground rent, and a portion represents the building rent?—If I understand your proposition it is this, that a house which lets at 60 l. a year, stands upon ground which is represented in value by 10 l. a year; but if you impose a rate upon it equivalent to 5 s. in the pound, you are in point of fact deducting 15 l. from the gross value, and so you are depriving the house of the value of the land, and 50 per cent. above it.

802. We will take the case of a plot of ground in the east end, which is not covered with houses, and where the ground rent would be worth 10 l. a year; a builder says, I can get 60 l. rent, and no more for a house built upon it; how far then would the question of rates enter into the consideration; might not the rates stop the building altogether?—The man calculated in this way: to build a house that will realise me 60 l. a year will cost 600 l., and I must get 8 per cent. upon that (or some other interest which he puts down as a fair interest upon his money); and I have to calculate upon interest and loss of rental, and a variety of other contingencies, and I must get 60 l. a year for it, otherwise I shall not be able to make a successful speculation, particularly as I know that the rates in this parish are 5 s. in the pound; therefore I cannot afford to give you more than a certain ground rent, otherwise, I cannot build this house and get a fair return for my money. So that every man who has to build a house calculates beforehand, and he begins first of all, by the probable rent that he shall be able to get for the house. I will illustrate that: there is a plot of land in Parliament-street now vacant, very near the Whitehall Club; that ground has been recently let by the Government for 99 years, at 425 l. a year ground rent. To build a house upon that, will cost 6,000 l., and the house when it is finished will let out in offices at a gross rental of 1,000 l. a year; but the person so letting out the house in chambers takes upon himself the rates and taxes. Therefore you have to take 20 per cent. off the gross rent of those outgoings, which brings it down to 800 l.; consequently, the man who spends his 6,000 l., gets 6¼ per cent. for his money, but because he has 800 l. net rental, and he has 425 l. a year to pay, and the difference is represented by 6¼ per cent. upon his outlay; and that is the way I have no doubt the valuer in that particular case assessed the value of that land, by ascertaining what the house would let for, and what the rates and taxes would be upon it, leaving the residue as the value of the ground.

803. In that case, the value of the gound is diminished by the rates and taxes?—Yes, certainly.

804. And that comes entirely out of the pocket of the owner?—Quite so; if there had been no rates and taxes, and the man could have got 1,000 l. a year out of this property, he would, of course, have got 200 l. a year more rent than he would get now; but the ground landlord would say, as there are no rates and taxes, instead of 425 l. a year ground rent, I must have 625 l., because the value of the house is due to the site, and the site is mine, and therefore, all but a fair interest upon your outlay, and a fair allowance for the deductions which your outlay will entail upon you, is mine, the ground landlord's; therefore we will assume that the Government have parted with this land at 425 l. a year, upon the assumption that the rates and taxes in that parish are 4 s. in the pound altogether; if they should go up to 6 s. in the pound, that additional 2 s. will be borne by the man who is going to build the house.

805. Mr. Ayrton.] Unless he can get a higher rent for his house?—Yes, certainly, unless he can get a higher rent for his house; but on the other hand, if, by the combination of parishes, that is to say, the amalgamation of St. George, Hanover-square, with the two parishes of St. Margaret and St. John, the high rates which now prevail in St. Margaret's and St, John's be reduced, then the building owner will get the advantage of it.

806. Chairman.] As regards competition, what I assume is, that all causes of competition will remain in full force and modify whatever rise and fall there may be; but when you say that the taxes will either increase or decrease the rent, you assume that competition remains stationary?—I do not understand what you mean by competition.

807. The competition of people for houses; what I mean is this, that if there are two houses being built at different periods, and the competition for houses becomes' greater, of course you will be able to recoup yourself for the taxes?—No doubt.

808. But even if the taxes have been increased, it would, if competition had increased, be possible for you to get so much more rent notwithstanding?—Quite so; but there is a limit which puts a stop to competition; for instance, if you tax the house in Parliament-street at 10 s. in the pound, you must take it out of the pocket of the building owner, unless he can find tenants to take his chambers who are willing to pay the very high rent which the 10 s. in the pound imposes upon him; there is a limit; you might raise the taxes throughout London, as I have known them raised in parishes in the country, to 18 s. in the pound at one time, and you might by that entirely destroy a man's property; he could not get a tenant; therefore he must pay it himself, and get what rental he could.

809. Mr. Ayrton.] Would not it depend in fact upon whether the charge was put upon a single house or whether it was imposed upon all property?—Take an office, or take the house in Parliament-street, of which I have been speaking. To meet any increased rate of taxation, instead of paying 200 l. for a floor, you must ask a man to pay 300 l. for a floor; the man says, I cannot afford that, instead of living in your house in Parliament-street I must go into College-street, reet, where I can get the same accommodation t a less rate.

810. Chairman.] But so far as a man is bound o live in a certain place, so far the owner will ave a great advantage in being able to screw up ne occupier?—Yes, if he is obliged to live in a ertain place; but those are very rare occurences.

811. Supposing that they must live within a ertain area; take a dock labourer for instance; e must live within a certain area in order to be t his work in the morning?—A great change as come over that, because the trains bring hose labourers from the country at an early our in the morning. That which prevailed a ew years ago in the heart of London is somehat changed now, and will be changed more as people get more accustomed to going by those heap trains.

812. To go back upon one point which you ouched before, in the East-end of London where he ground-rents are low, and where therefore no very great portion of the rates can be thrown upon the ground-rent, would not the high rating have the tendency of checking building?—Yes, certainly it would; because a man can only reasonably expect to get a certain rent in such a situation. The cost of building remains the same, and therefore if the rating is very high it must come out of the interest upon the capital that he is investing in building the house; it must be in diminution of the profit.

813. Then it would come out of the increased rent paid by the occupier if the owner were able to screw him up higher?—Certainly, if he could; that is to say, if the occupiers of the houses had the means and the will to pay increased rents.

814. But he might have got that increased rental all the same if the occupier were willing to pay it without the taxes having been imposed?—That depends upon a variety of incidental circumstances.

815. In your general experience, have the rents in London fallen with the increase of rates?—I have not had sufficient experience in the letting of houses; it is not my business to let houses. If I had the letting of houses like a house-agent I should be able to answer you that question with accuracy, but I am not able to do that.

816. But as regards the valuation of property, is it not the fact, that the value of house property has increased generally?—According to my experience, property in the western parts of the metropolis has increased very much in value; property in the City of London has of late years increased immensely. It is rather at low water at present, by reason of the panic which prevailed in 1866; before that, the prices were fabulous; but in all business premises in the city, as well as in the west end of London, rents are very high indeed. In the neighbourhood of Russell-square and that district, rents fell a few years ago to a very low ebb, but they are now gaining ground again. I think about the neighbourhood of Islington, although my experience has not been great, and my opinion is not worth much, property has rather diminished in value.

817. I am looking at it, at present, simply from the point of view of the great increase there has been in the rates, and I am anxious to know whether that increase of rates has had the effect of diminishing the rents?—I am not able to give you any correct answer to that question, for the reasons which I have already stated.

818. If there had been a diminution of rents in consequence of the increase of rates, then it would look as if the rates had come out of the pocket of the owner?—Unquestionably.

819. If it had been the other way, if rents had risen while rates had also risen, then one could not trace whether it had been paid by the owner or the occupier?—Yes, you can trace this, that notwithstanding the increased rates, the value of the property in a particular locality has also so increased as to bear that additional burden, and but for that burden would have increased to a greater extent.

820. May not there be instances that in many cases the occupiers have practically to pay more rent than they paid before, and more rates than they paid before?—As a rule you may say that is so in the parts I have mentioned.

821. Have you considered, looking at the value of property and the position of ground rents, how far it would be fair to put the rates upon the owner instead of upon the occupier?—I must now go back again to what I started upon; take the two owners, which owner is it that you mean? Do you mean the owner of the fee or the building owner?

822. We will take the owner of the fee first?—The owner of the fee has made a contract with a man to let him have a lease for 99 years of a certain piece of ground, for a certain rent, for better or for worse, for high rates or for low rates, and therefore it is impossible, I think, to touch him.

823. Are the leases falling in now, many of them?—That is impossible to say; they are so various. Some of the Marquis of Westminster's estate, Belgravia, I suppose has 60 years yet to run; in Grosvenor-place some of the leases fell in the other day, and Lord Westminster pulled the houses down and let the ground upon building leases for 99 years, upon which fine palaces have been erected. The Marquis of Westminster has parted with all his interest in that property for a yearly payment of so much a year for each house for 99 years, and you cannot reach Lord Westminster as regards his ground rent upon each of those houses, because he will say I made a contract with my lessee to pay all rates and taxes, and other impositions, parochial, Parliamentary, or otherwise; and so also with the house in Parliament-street to which I have referred.

824. You assume this, that on the whole the ground rents are nearly all covered by contracts, under which the tenant pays all the rates?—Yes, and not only that, I will not confine it simply to ground rents; I will take the case, which is not at all infrequent in this metropolis, of leases granted for 21 years. You grant a lease for 21 years at 60 l. a year, the lessee covenanting to keep the house in repair, and to pay all rates and taxes of every description except landlords' property tax.

825. Mr. Ayrton.] The only way consistently with your views of contract, by which the owners may be made to bear the burthen, would be to increase, or to preserve, the income tax at a high figure, and apply the fruits of it in reduction of the burthens which now press upon the community by means of local taxation?—That is a question of political economy upon which I cannot venture to give an opinion.

826. I mean if you stand upon the letter of the law, the letter of the law would bring us to that conclusion, would it not, if policy were to suggest the expediency of making one class of the community bear the burthens rather than another?—Yes; but that is a question for a political economist and not for a surveyor.

827. Chairman.] What would be the effect upon the owner of the fee, in the case of granting a new lease for 99 years, if you were to prohibit a contract as regards rates as you have done with regard to the landlords' property tax; supposing you were to put the rates upon that footing, namely, that the landlord cannot covenant with his tenant that he should pay his rates, then, would not the increase of rates from that time be on the owner of the fee and of the ground rents in the same way as the property tax is now?—If you prohibit a man from making a contract with his tenant upon any terms that he thought fit, other than the terms prescribed by the Act of Parliament, of course you can do it.

828. But does not the Act prescribe that, as regards the property tax?—Yes, it does; bu take the case of the sewer rate; that is a tax upo property of every description; I recollect per fectly well, when the sewers' rate and rates o that particular kind were assessed as the land lord's property tax now is, and it was though that the landlord was going to pay it; and so th landlord did pay it when there was an existin unexpired term of a lease, and the tenant di not covenant to pay it; but the moment the leas was out, the landlord said, "I do not car about it being a landlord's rate; you must pa it;" and the tenant does pay it. I deal with thos things in practice.

829. Mr. Ayrton.] You think that the tenan always covenants to pay sewers' rates and a rates?—Yes, now it is so.

830. Chairman.] Nevertheless, as far as re gards the property tax, the effect of legislatio has been this, that the ground landlords ar reached by that tax, and they are not reached b the rates?—Quite so.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS HUGHES EARLE and Mr. GEORGE ARTHUR WEBB, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

831. Chairman (to Mr. Earle).] You are the Clerk of the Peace of the County of Hampshire?—Yes.

832. And Mr. Webb is your chief clerk, is he not?—Yes.

833. Can you state the purposes to which the county rate is applied, exclusive of police?—The county rate is first applied in the payment of expenses of prosecutions at sessions and assizes, and summary convictions before the justices. It is applied in the payment of the expenses of the county prison, in the conveyance of prisoners by the constabulary to the county prison, in the payment of the expenses of criminal and pauper lunatics confined in county lunatic asylums chargeable on the county, the payment to reformatories, the expenses of inquests, the maintenance of county bridges and roadways adjoining the county bridges, the maintenance of militia stores, the maintenance of the county hall, and other county buildings not connected with the prison or police, the payment of the salaries of public officers belonging to the county, and the necessary office expenses, such as printing and advertising, law costs, and the expenses connected with the preparation of the voters' lists, and the various registers of the county, the payment of interest on the county debt, and the repayment of the principal by instalments. Those, I think, are all the items that occur to me as those to which the county rate is applicable.

834. There are also, are there not, the expenses of the inspectors of weights and measures?—Yes; but that is a small sum, consisting of payments out of pocket, which are charged to the county; but the county receive from the inspectors the fees paid by the parties whose weights are inspected, and which as nearly as possible balance the payments out of pocket; in fact, more than balance.

835. As regards the police rate, is that levied with the county rate in Hampshire?—It is levied at the same time as the county rate, but it is a separate item of rate.

836. Can you state to the Committee what separate items of rate there are besides; do you divide your rate into two, the county rate and the police rate, or are there other items?—The ordinary rates are the county rate and the police rate. There has been the last few years an extraordinary rate, the cattle plague rate, but there is no other rate.

837. You do not levy the lunatic asylum rate separately?—We have no lunatic asylum rate.

838. Is there a county shirehall rate?—We have no such rate.

839. Can you state how it is that you have no lunatic asylum rate?—Yes; the ordinary annual expenses in respect of the lunatic asylum which fall upon the county are very small. Irrespective of the debt which was first incurred in building the asylum, the only annual expenses are the maintenance of those lunatics who are properly chargeable upon the county, and they are very few in number, being criminals and paupers who have no parish to which they belong. The only large payment made by the county in respect of the lunatic asylum is for interest and instalment of principal on the debt borrowed when the asylum was built. When the asylum was built, 63,000 l. was borrowed, and that has been gradually discharged, and now there is 27,000 l. owing. The amount paid last year on that was about 3,000 l.

840. Do I understand that the lunatic asylum is almost self-supporting, except as far as the cost of building is concerned, as far as the county is concerned?—Yes, that is so.

841. Sir James Lawrence.] Does not all the repairs of the lunatic asylum come out of the county rate?—No, practically they have not been charged on the county rate. The lunatic asylum has been self-supporting, and certain small repairs have been done out of the funds of the asylum.

842. If they are out of the rate contributed by the parishes, then you are charging the parishes with the maintenance of the asylum, with reference to the affairs of the asylum?—Yes.

843. Chairman.] Are the Committee to understand that the amount which you recover from unions, and from private persons who may be lodged in the asylum, and who pay all the receipts of the lunatic asylum, together, cover the annual cost, cost, except so far as you have to pay for criminal lunatics and pauper lunatics?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

844. (To Mr. Webb.) Are we to understand also that you divide all the incidental expenses, such as small repairs, over the cost per head, which you charge in respect of lunatics in the asylum?—There is a separate building fund to which the contributions are paid by boroughs, not contributors to the county rate; and the amount paid into that building fund is sufficient to meet the ordinary repairs of the asylum.

845. Will you state a little more fully the position of the boroughs, with reference to your county lunatic asylums?—There are the borough of Southampton, the borough of Portsmouth, the city of Winchester, and the borough of Andover in the county that do not contribute to the county rate, and lunatics who are confined in the asylum, who are chargeable to those boroughs, are chargeable at a different rate to what the boroughs situate in the county contributing to the county rate are, the difference being applied as a building rate in pursuance of the Act.

846. Have you ever heard any complaint from the boroughs as regards that difference?—None.

847. Could you state to the Committee how much per head the difference is?—It is 3 s. per head; the ordinary charge being 8 s. 9 d. to the unions, parishes, and boroughs contributing to the county rate; the charge to out counties and non-contributing unions, parishes, and boroughs varying from 10 s. 9 d. to 11 s. 9 d.

848. Why is one 10 s. 9 d. and the other 11 s. 9 d.?—I believe the difference is with regard to the out counties; there were some chargeable to Barnet, Barnstaple, Lincoln, &c. I think there is some difference made in the charge for those outside of the county.

849. Can you state any reason for that difference?—No, I cannot.

850. Is it an old custom?—It has been for some years.

851. How long have you been connected with the county?—Eighteen years; but then I should mention that the clerk of the peace and the clerk of the peace's office has nothing to do with the asylum; the clerk of the asylum and the clerk to the visitors in the county of Hampshire is another person.

852. Can you state this for the information of the Committee; assume the case of a union which is partly in and partly out of one of those boroughs, that you have mentioned, what would you charge to a lunatic coming from that union?—The New Winchester Union is an exact example of that. In the New Winchester Union there are certain parishes situate within the county wholly, and certain parishes situate partly within the county and partly within the city of Winchester, and there there will be an average struck according to the proportion to which the parish contributed to the county or the city rate, as the case may be. If small, an allowance would be made, and if a large, a larger allowance would be made, and in some cases it would approach the maximum charge.

853. As a matter of fact, besides the cost per head which you charge generally to those parishes which contribute to the county rate, and besides the cost per head that you charge to those that are in boroughs, there is another rate which you charge when a parish is partly within and partly without a borough, and you do that upon an average?—Yes, upon an average.

854. And that average differs, of course, from the other two?—Yes.

855. Mr. Pell.] Who strikes the average?—The visitors sanction its being done at the asylum; it is a matter of calculation as to the different quotas at which those parishes are assessed, and then it is arranged with the visitors and the parties who are chargeable with the maintenance of the lunatics.

856. Chairman.] As regards the building fund; has the building fund any other sources of receipt except this difference, which is paid by the parishes; and, if so, what?—Not ordinarily.

857. But extraordinarily?—If an alteration exceeding the amount limited by the Act of Parliament for repairs and alterations were required, then an order of sessions would be necessary, and would be granted for expending a certain sum of money.

858. And that sum of money would come out of what?—Out of the county rate; but then in Hampshire a sum of money which was so expended has been repaid; it was merely advanced by way of loan.

859. You mean that it has been repaid out of the building fund subsequently?—Yes.

860. Do you happen to know what proportion the lunatics sent by those boroughs which you have enumerated bear to the total number of lunatics from other boroughs?—There is only one general total, and they are not kept separate, so that I could not tell that at this moment; but it is a very small proportion now, because there has been a removal of a large number of lunatics from both the boroughs of Southampton and Portsmouth within the last two years, as the number of lunatics chargeable to boroughs not contributing to the county rate at this moment is rather small.

861. Sir Massey Lopes.] Are you aware that the Home Secretary lately refused to ratify this arrangement taking place between the county lunatic asylums and the boroughs?—I am not aware, as regards Hampshire, that that has been so. In 1869, when the Lunatic Asylum Report was presented to the Session, it was stated as a fact that there had been a large number of lunatics chargeable to the boroughs of Portsmouth and Southampton discharged, and that further discharges would be necessary in the course of the ensuing year; and, in fact, now there are very few indeed in the asylum, and they are gradually diminishing altogether.

862. Then you will be no longer able to depend upon that sum which you have been receiving from those lunatics for the maintenance of your building fund?—No.

863. I understand that up to this time, or rather up to last year, the arrangement for all the lunatic asylums in the counties was, that they might take in lunatics from the different boroughs and charge them a fixed amount, and that that amount was something like 3 s. beyond what you charged for the county lunatics?—Yes.

864. And that the amount which you received, over and above that which was chargeable for county lunatics, went to your building fund?—Yes.

865. And if the Commissioners insisted upon your increasing the lunatic asylum or not, that amount was made up from what you received over and above from those borough lunatics?—Yes,

Yes, that is so; and the expenses to which I referred just now, of the important alterations, have been paid out of this fund, there having been, since the lunatic asylum was originally built, very large additions made to it.

866. So that that building fund will now cease?—Yes, or very nearly so.

867. And that expenditure will now come upon the county rate?—Yes.

868. Therefore there will be an increased expenditure upon the county rate?—Yes, that will be so.

869. Chairman.] How much, on an average, have you had per year upon that building fund?—It is only given in the general statement as a lump sum, including maintenance, but the estimate for this year is about 800*l.* for the building fund.

870. Sir Massey Lopes.] Then that amount will be an additional expenditure upon the county rate?—Yes, or nearly all.

871. Do you happen to know whether the Home Secretary has refused to ratify all those arrangements with the boroughs now?—Not in Hampshire, certainly. It has not been before the Home Secretary, so far as regards Hampshire.

872. You mentioned Southampton, did you not?—Yes; but then that is a town and county of itself.

873. But still you have, up to this time, been taking in pauper lunatics, and you can do so no longer?—By contract with them we can, I believe. It is the county that have discontinued it, in consequence of requiring the room for county purposes. It is not that the town and county of Southampton, or that the borough of Portsmouth, have taken away their lunatics, but they have been requested to do so by the county, because the wards have been required for strictly county lunatics.

874. But the Lunacy Commissioners have compelled the county to do so, have they not; that is to say, they have insisted upon there being more room in the lunatic asylum for the county paupers, and therefore there would not be sufficient room for the borough lunatics?—No, that is not so. I believe the Visiting Justices have done it of their own accord, as they found it necessary, and as they found the wants of the asylum increasing for county purposes strictly, then they gave notice. In fact, for several years past it has been constantly mentioned to the court that this want of room was arising, and they proposed to deal with it in that way rather than by enlarging the asylum.

875. Mr. Hunt.] Is not this the case, that in your county when the asylum was first built, provision was made for a larger number of patients than the county at that time had within it?—Yes.

876. And that they were able to make contracts with boroughs, and in some cases with other jurisdictions outside the county for the reception of a certain number of pauper lunatics?—Yes.

877. And in the difference between the charge made to the unions within the county, and to outsiders, was in fact in the nature of a rent for the use of the building?—Yes.

878. And therefore there would be that repairing fund, which you call the building fund?—Yes.

879. But as the wants of the county increased they were not able to take in the outside patients to the same extent?—There is no contract with outside counties; those are exceptional cases.

880. I mean this, that the county were not bound to provide it?—No, it was by a special agreement with them.

881. Then as the wants of the county increased, they were not able to receive so many from the boroughs, or from outside the county?—No, and they were gradually diminished.

882. If they had not originally provided more room than they themselves wanted, they would have had to raise an additional sum, in order to have added to their lunatic asylum?—Yes, that would be so.

883. According to law, the repair of the lunatic asylum falls upon the county rate, does it not?—Yes.

884. It is more in the nature of an accident, so to say, that this building fund has enabled them to repair the building without coming upon the county rate; it is owing to the arrangement having been made that they originally provided more room than they themselves wanted?—Yes.

885. Sir James Lawrence.] Practically, the whole of the repairs of the asylum have been paid by the boroughs, and no charge has been thrown upon the county rate?—Yes, that is so; and in addition to that, on one occasion a sum of money was paid over from the asylum to the county rate in liquidation of the debt.

886. Mr. Hunt.] A fairer way of putting it is this, is it not, that the county let a part of their buildings to the boroughs?—Yes, that is so.

887. And the rent of the part of the buildings that they did not want, was put into the repairing fund?—Yes.

888. Sir James Lawrence.] The whole of the repairs of the asylum were paid by the boroughs, so that no portion of the repairs had to be charged upon the county?—Yes, that is so; but then those boroughs that paid this additional rate had borne no portion of the cost of erecting the asylum.

889. Mr. Birley.] What arrangements are the boroughs now making for the reception of pauper lunatic patients?—The lunatics for the borough of Portsmouth and the borough of Southampton, which are the two principal ones in the county, are now, I believe, scattered; they are really getting them into different asylums where they can make contracts and agreements for their reception. At present there is no asylum for either of them, either jointly or separately.

890. Where will the Winchester and Andover pauper lunatic patients go to?—They will be dependent upon arrangement with some other asylum.

891. Mr. Backhouse (to Mr. Earle).] I think you say that 63,000*l.* was borrowed to build this lunatic asylum, and that there is a debt of 27,000*l.* still due; has no part of the balance, 36,000*l.*, been paid out of the county rate?—The debt has been paid off out of the county rate. It is paid every year by certain instalments, and charged to the county rate.

892. Not as a separate lunatic asylum rate?—No, certainly not.

893. Mr. Corrance (to Mr. Webb).] The charge is under the 9th of Geo. 4, c. 40, and this is a special rate under that Act, is it not, or is it repealed?—The lunatic asylum was built under the 8th & 9th Victoria, c. 126, which repealed 9 Geo. 4, c. 40.

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

894. But the charge by the special rate had been previously made under the 9th of Geo. 4, c. 40?—No; the charge of 63,000 l. was created under the 8th & 9th Victoria c. 126, which repealed the 9th Geo. 4, c. 40.

895. Scarcely so, because the specialised rate was made by the 9th of Geo. 4, c. 40, and the same power is contained in the other Act, or has it been since consolidated with the county rate under an Act of Parliament?—This was raised by a loan, and it was borrowed from a public office.

896. Does the county under this Act now raise the lunatic asylum rate as a special rate, or does it raise it as an integral part of the county rate?—For the purposes of repayment of the loan it is an integral part of the county rate.

897. It falls, does it not, upon a different basis assessment from the poor rate?—Yes.

898. And it is not always uniform?—No, it is not always uniform.

899. (To Mr. Earle.) In fact, there may be very wide discrepancies between its incidence and that of the poor rate as to the property that it falls upon in the one case and the other?—Yes; they are independent.

900. (To Mr. Webb.) Has not a revision of the county rate taken place about once in every 10 years?—Oftener in Hampshire.

901. How often in Hampshire do you revise it?—The basis was entirely revised in 1863, and it was again revised in 1866–67.

902. Subsequent to the late Valuation Act?—Yes, subsequent to the late Valuation Act.

903. (To Mr. Earle.) Do you know any reason why this lunatic asylum rate, devoted as it is to paupers, for these special purposes, should be raised upon a different basis of classification from the poor rate generally?—We have never had an asylum rate.

904. (To Mr. Webb.) In answer to a former question, you stated that it has now, in practice, in many counties in Englamd, fallen upon a different basis of property from the poor rate itself?—The county rate is upon a different basis in some cases; but I did not state that in many counties it fell upon a different basis of property from the poor rate.

905. Do you know, from your own practice in your own county, whether there is any reason why this rate for these special purposes, connected with paupers and certain classes, should be raised upon any other basis whatever, or separately, from the poor rate itself?—There is this to be said, that the Act of Parliament which required the county justices to build this asylum imposed upon the county rate the repayment of this debt, and, therefore, it must be upon the county rate basis until that debt is discharged, or until otherwise provided by the Legislature.

906. Mr. Walter.] Can you state what difference there is in the assessment between the county rate and the poor rate in Hampshire; for instance, what would a rate of a farthing in the pound on the county rate produce, and what would a rate of a farthing in the pound on the poor rate assessment basis produce?—A rate at a farthing in the pound for county purposes would produce 1,596 l. 8 s. on the present basis.

907. And what would the poor rate be?—I cannot give the exact figures, but it would be less than that sum, although not very greatly under it at this moment, because in 1867, when the county rate basis was revised, the amount of the assessment list was accepted by the county rate committee in a large number of instances, so that the discrepancy now is not very great.

908. Chairman (to Mr. Earle).] Do you know whether the number of lunatics have very much increased in your county?—Yes, I believe there is a great increase.

909. (To Mr. Webb.] Can you state in an interval of 10 years what the increase has been?—In 1869 there was an increase of 10, as compared with the number at the corresponding period of last year.

910. What is your aggregate number?—619.

911. Do you happen to have any figures for back years, taking a good interval back, or would you remember, from having been there 18 years, what increase there has been in the last 18 years?—I may say that in the asylum in 1853, the number remaining on the 25th of December was 230; in 1864, 574, and in 1868, 619; and I may say that, whereas when the asylum was first built, containing 420, or thereabouts, it was much too large for the purposes of the county, now although it can contain 625, it is not too large for the purposes of the county.

912. How many does the lunatic asylum contain?—630 in 1870.

913–14. Do you trace any increase of pauper lunatics chargeable to the rates to the effect of the Union Chargeability Act?—There has been a considerable increase on that account.

915. Were those numbers that you have given county patients only, or were they the total in the asylum?—That was the total in the asylum.

916. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is it on account of the great increase of the county lunatics that the visitors have been obliged to dispense with taking in borough lunatics?—Yes.

917. Chairman.] (To Mr. Earle.) Can you tell us roughly the amount which you spend annually upon your pauper and criminal lunatics chargeable to the county?—It was about 400 l. last year.

918. You stated before, did you not, what the amount was which you pay annually towards the discharge of the debt and the interest?—Yes; last year we paid towards the discharge of the debt on the lunatic asylum 3,100 l., leaving due 27,300 l.

919. Will you state to the Committee what is the average amount of your county rate; how much is it in the pound?—This last year the county rate was 2 d.

920. How much did that raise?—A halfpenny rate would raise 3,192 l., and a twopenny rate would raise 12,770 l.

921. Is that exclusive of police rate?—Yes.

922. How much is your police rate?—The police rate last year was 3 d. in the pound.

923. That would be how much?—That would be about 18,380 l.

924. Of that 12,000 l. county rate, about 4,000 l. would go to the purposes of the lunatic asylum, would it not?—We paid off 3,100 l.

925. And 400 l. it cost you for pauper and criminal lunatics chargeable to the county?—Yes.

926. So that 3,500 l. was due to the lunatic asylum?—Yes, and more than that, there was the interest. (Mr. Webb.) As to the actual figures, the amount that Mr. Earle has just mentioned is the repayment of principal only, and there is an amount payable for interest on account of the lunatic asylum debt in addition, which was 989 l. last year, and that would make up another 1,000 l.

927. (To Mr. Webb.) You get 4,400 l. altogether gether for the purposes of the lunatic asylum?—Yes.

928. Or more than one-third of the county rate?—About one-third; and for this reason, that last year there was an exceptional 1,000 l. paid off; the proportion due was 2,100 l., but there was 1,000 l. specially applied towards the repayment of the county debt.

929. (To Mr. Earle.) How much do you spend upon your county bridges?—Last year we spent 646 l.

930. Is that the average amount?—I should think that that is quite the maximum amount. In the accounts of the year before it was 461 l.; in the year before it was a much larger sum, being 1,100 l.; there was a rebuilding of two bridges in that year.

931. As regards another purpose, namely, militia storehouses, what can you state to the Committee upon that?—The militia stores exclusive of payments by boroughs cost us last year 191 l., and in 1868 our expenses for militia were about 118 l. (Mr. Webb.) The Committee can have the exact figures of the cost. In the way Mr. Earle is proposing to do it; he was not aware quite that some boroughs paid two years in one; and those figures are not quite to be relied upon. (Mr. Earle.) The boroughs pay by irregular payments, but the actual expense to the county in that year happened to be a mere nothing.

932. Can you state the general amount; what do the boroughs pay towards it, and on what principle?—The boroughs pay by a sum fixed by arbitration.

933. (To Mr. Webb.) Upon what basis?—It was in this way, that after the passing of the Militia Law Amendment Act, the Secretary of State for War appointed an arbitrator under the Act, and he required to be furnished with the amounts of the valuation of the county property, and the amounts of the valuation of the properties in the boroughs not contributing to the county rates; and upon that he fixed the quota that the boroughs were to pay, varying from 1 l. up to 10 l.

934. But the whole amount, as far as regards your county, is insignificant?—Quite insignificant.

935. It is not an important element at all in your county expenditure?—No.

936. Colonel Brise.] How many militia regiments are there in the county?—Three.

937 Sir Massey Lopes.] Is the sum for the militia a statutory payment?—Yes.

938. That is the same with lunatics also, is it not?—Yes.

939. The ratepayers have no option whatever with regard either to the payment towards lunatics, or the militia?—None.

940. (To Mr. Earle.) And they have no control over it?—As to the militia the words of the statute are, that the counties are to provide fuel, and such other necessary things as are requisite for the maintenance of buildings and store.

941. Do the Government pay any contribution at all towards lunatics?—None.

942. It is all paid by the ratepayers, is it not; it is compulsory upon them, and they have no choice?—Yes, they have no choice.

943. Mr. Corrance.] In your county, how are the bridges repaired; is it always by order of the Quarter Sessions?—By order of the Committee of Public Works.

944. Are they not sometimes repaired by order of the justices for sums under 20 l.?—Never, that I am aware of It is done by the public works committee, never by order of the sessions at petty sessions, or by individual justices. All public buildings are repaired and the expense upon public buildings is under the control of a committee appointed for that purpose.

945. Are you aware that two justices can give an order for any sum under 20 l.?—Yes, that is so; but for many years the practice of giving orders by the justices in divisions has been discontinued, we having a public works committee in the county who take the charge.

946. Are you aware that the former practice of the justices when the expenses came to more than 20 l. was to give successive orders, the first being for 20 l. and the next for 20 l. more, and so on?—I am not aware of any instance of that kind having occurred in Hampshire.

947. Where you have a highway district, what arrangement is made with the county about county bridges; do they fall under the same arrangements as ordinary petty sessions?—We have entered into contracts in several cases to keep the roadways adjoining the bridges in repair.

948. Have you a surveyor?—Yes, we have a county surveyor.

949. What do you pay him a year?—£ 230 a year.

950. Do you know how many bridges he surveys?—A great number; nearly 120, I should think.

951. Chairman.] Is that 230 l. included in the column for county bridges?—No, it is included under public officers.

952. Mr. Corrance.] You say that you do this under contract; is there any reason why those county bridges should be paid for out of the county rate, or in any separate form if the districts themselves were consolidated?—It is by Act of Parliament; there is no other reason for it. In fact, it is impossible to make a new county bridge. The reason why it is a county bridge, is because it has been so from time immemorial, or for a very long period of years.

953. You find yourselves sometimes under difficulties, do you not, from that reason?—Sometimes the question arises whether the bridge is a county bridge.

954. Do you consider it is better, on the whole, that the whole thing should be done under one authority, that is to say, that the rate should be levied under one authority, and the county bridges, and the part of the road belonging to the bridges, should come under one common authority with the road itself?—Yes, I should think so.

955. Chairman.] As regards the county prisons, what is the cost of the prison to the county?—The gross cost of the prison for the last year was 7,874 l.

956. Will you explain what you mean by the gross cost, and then what was the net cost?—I say the gross cost, because there are certain payments in aid made from various sources which relieve the ratepayers; for instance, there is an allowance made by the Treasury for the maintenance of prisoners which, last year, was 1,496 l. The boroughs who send their prisoners to the county prison paid last year 870 l. The Admiralty and the War Office, who confine their prisoners in the county prison paid for maintenance 1,027 l.

957. That was besides the 1,496 l.?—Yes, quite

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

quite independent of that. The payment for the maintenance of individual prisoners, and the earnings of the prisoners, including small rents of cottages and things of that sort, amounted to 734 l., so that that left a net expense upon the ratepayers of 3,746 l.

958. Mr. Walter.] Is it the Winchester Gaol that you are speaking of?—Yes, the Hants County Gaol at Winchester.

959. Chairman.] Can you state to the Committee the arrangement under which the Government contributes to the maintenance of the prisoners?—I believe that it is entirely arbitrary, and that the Government pay what they please.

960. Chairman (to Mr. Webb).] Have you anything to add to that as regards prisons?—No, that is so; they pay a fixed sum without reference to the cost of the prisoners for the particular year.

961. Mr. Walter.] Does the sum that you have stated include salaries?—Yes, it includes the salaries of officers and all establishment charges.

962. Chairman (to Mr. Erle).] Can you state the law under which the Government contribute towards the maintenance of those prisoners?—I believe that there is an Act passed yearly, by which a certain sum is set apart for the payment of the expenses of prosecutions in counties, and for the maintenance of prisoners.

963. (To Mr. Webb). You have been connected with the county business for 18 years, can you state what amount per head, from year to year, has been paid by the Government for maintenance?—Previously to the opening of the new prison, in the year 1850, the amount had varied, and it was then charged to the net cost per head per prisoner; but subsequent to 1851, I believe there has been a fixed rate of 4*s.* per week paid by the Government for prisoners convicted either at the assizes or the sessions, or under the Criminal Justices or Juvenile Offenders Act, and a sum of 8*s.* per week for penal servitude convicts detained in prison over the time fixed by Government.

964. Is that the scale under which they pay at present?—Yes; that is the scale under which they pay at present.

965. Therefore, it is only arbitrary in the sense that there is no one who has laid down those figures except the Government, but it is a fixed scale?—It is a fixed scale.

966. What would you say is the cost of a prisoner per week, does the 8*s.* a week cover it?—No; the gross cost of prisoners per head per week last year was 9*s.* 4 d.

967. Then I presume that 8*s.* is fixed upon the basis of being nearly the cost, and the 4*s.* is a contribution of one-half?—I should say that the 8*s.* we rarely receive, because penal servitude convicts are not detained in prison as a rule beyond the time fixed by Government; so that by far the larger proportion that we receive from the Treasury for the maintenance of prisoners is at the rate of 4*s.* per week.

968. Which is a little less than half their cost?—Yes, it is a little less than one-half the gross cost, being near about the net cost; the net cost last year being 4*s.* 3*d.* per head per week.

969. Supposing that the Government were to reduce the 4*s.* to 3*s.*, what redress would you have, or would there be any redress for the ratepayers in the county?—Not under Act of Parliament at present, I believe.

970. Do you know whether they pay the 4*s.* under Act of Parliament, or whether the amount is a vague and an arbitrary one?—I believe there is an Act of Parliament, the 2nd & 3rd of Victoria, relating to the maintenance of prisoners, but I have always understood from the Treasury that it is out of their Parliamentary grant for the purposes of maintenance that we receive it, and that it is optional, so to speak, with the Treasury whether they pay it; it only rests upon the Vote and the Appropriation Act.

971. Mr. Walter.] On what grounds is there a a difference of 100 per cent. between the payment for a convict and the payment for an ordinary prisoner?—Previously to that arrangement being made by the Treasury, with regard to the 8*s.* per week, as a rule the penal servitude convicts had only been allowed to remain in the county prisons a very short time subsequent to conviction; but it was deemed advisable to have them detained in some instances longer, and then the Treasury consented to this increased allowance. I believe that some representation was made, at the instance of the Visiting Justices, to the Treasury as to the cost of prisoners, and they consented to make this additional allowance in those cases.

972. Sir James Lawrence.] When you used the term "net cost," do you mean the cost after deducting the prisoners' earnings?—Yes; the net cost to the ratepayers, after deducting the amount received for maintenance and for prisoners' earnings.

973. Mr. Pell.] Has the county an alternative in being able to reject those penal servitude men?—No; because they are committed to the custody of the gaoler by the judges of Assize, and until the Secretary of State orders their removal, they must remain in the prison.

974. Can you account for the apparent generosity on the part of the Government to the extent of 100 per cent., paying 8*s.* for the one class of prisoners, and only 4*s.* for the other?—The rule, previous to that alteration being made, had been for the penal servitude convicts only to be detained in prison a very short time after conviction; and it was in consequence of their remaining a longer time, and not being removed to the convict prison, that the Government gave this increased allowance.

975. Then if it was a bad bargain to pay 4*s.*, you continued the bad bargain with respect to the one class of prisoners; but in the case of this latter class the Government consented to pay 8*s.* instead of 4*s.*?—The Government, if I may say so, are bound to provide the convict prisons; and it was in consequence of the county prison being required for the purposes of the confinement of convicts strictly. Previous to that time they had been called transports, and it was on that alteration and on the Penal Servitude Bill passing that this alteration was made, because penal servitude convicts then were detained in the county prison, which was the house of correction for the county longer than they had usually been when transportation was in force.

976. Chairman.] It was when the change of system took place, and the county was left to bear its burden as regards its own functions, as a house of correction for the county; but the prisoners condemned to penal servitude were then paid for by the Government for the whole of their cost?—Sometime subsequent to that; it had continued for some little time before a remonstrance was made.

977. Mr. Walter.] In fact, the extra 4 s. which the Government pay for convicts may be considered as what they pay for the accommodation which they receive from the county?—Quite so.

978. Chairman.] Four shillings would be considered as a receipt in aid, and 8 s. was supposed to represent more or less the whole cost of the prisoner?—Yes.

979. Sir Massey Lopes.] Taking into consideration all the payments that you receive from the Government for the maintenance of prisoners, is there not even then a considerable loss to your county?—Yes.

980. We have been hitherto speaking of maintenance as distinct from building, and you gave us 7,874 l. as the annual cost; is that for maintenance only, or does it include also building expenses, and the repairs of the gaol and so on?—That was the whole actual expense chargeable to the county rate in connection with the prison for last year only.

981. Did that include building and repairs?—Yes; but then the repairs and improvements chargeable last year happened to be only 429 l.

982. Did that include the pensions for the officers?—Yes.

983. (To Mr. Earle.) Does it include any payment made for the prosecution of prisoners?—No.

984. Chairman (to Mr. Webb).] What do the Admiralty and the War Office pay you?—£. 1,027 the Admiralty and War Office paid us last year.

985. On what scale do they pay you that?—These departments pay 1 s. a day for each prisoner; by those departments there is a loss to the county, certainly.

986. Is that sum fixed by an arrangement, or are you obliged to receive their prisoners?—The gaolor is bound to receive them if he has accommodation for them in the prison, and the amount is settled by arrangement with the two departments.

987. Has the loss been voluntarily undertaken by the county, or could it not help itself?—It could not help itself.

988. Mr. W. H. Smith.] Is it imposed by Act of Parliament?—The duty of receiving prisoners is imposed upon the gaolor by Act of Parliament.

989. Chairman.] If there were not room in the prison, what would be done then?—The prisoners would be refused, as has sometimes been the case; when the gaol has been full of county prisoners, the naval and military prisoners have been obliged to be refused.

990. Therefore the county prisoners have the preference, so to speak, and they are let in first, and the Admiralty and War Office prisoners are only accommodated if there is room?—Yes.

991. Mr. Birley.] Upon what rule or regulation is this scale of payment made by the Government, either for the convicts or for the other prisoners; is there a schedule and table, or an Act of Parliament?—No, it is the amount that the Treasury inform the county they will be allowed.

992. Then it is entirely in the hands of the Treasury?—Entirely in the hands of the Government.

993. As regards the Secretary of State for War, or the Admiralty, I think you state that it is a matter of arrangement?—It is a matter of arrangement with the county, only that the Government fix their own sum. On an application being made to those departments some few years since, at the request of the sessions, they gave the present amount that is allowed, which now the county consider they are considerable losers by.

994. Mr. Walter.] Can you state the proportion of Government military and naval prisoners to the whole number of prisoners in the county gaol?—

995. Can you state whether, in determining the amount of accommodation required in the county gaol, the county either take into consideration, or were bound to take into consideration, the probable demands which would be made upon them for accommodation by the military and naval departments of the Government?—That, no doubt, was taken into consideration in the building of the new prison; but the number of naval and military offenders that had, previously to the building, been confined, was very small as compared with those of later years. In consequence of the establishment of the camp at Aldershot the encampment at Broundown and the forts in the Isle of Wight, there had been a very much larger proportion of military prisoners confined in the prison since the building of the new gaol than there had been previously.

996. And penal servitude convicts, I believe, did not exist at that time?—There were a certain number of prisoners sentenced to transportation who had to be provided for for a time, but then they were detained so short a time after a conviction that it was not necessary to make any special provision for them.

997. Sir Massey Lopes.] Supposing that the accommodation in your gaol was not either sufficient or suitable, could not the Home Secretary compel the magistrates to enlarge or improve it?—Yes; under the New Prisons Act.

998. Have the ratepayers, as represented by the magistrates, any power whatever to prevent the Home Secretary from carrying out that?—None.

999. He could issue his mandamus, could he not?—The effect would be felt in this way: that the Government contribution towards the maintenance of the prisoners would be withheld.

1000. Mr. Pell.] You have stated, have you not, that if your gaol was full, and naval or military prisoners were sent there, the gaoler would refuse to receive them?—Yes, if it was full.

1001. We will suppose such a case as this, that the gaol was filled with Government prisoners; if a county prisoner were presented under those circumstances, what would you do with him?—In practice it would not be allowed to be so full, because they would take into consideration at the time that the application was made for the admission of naval or military prisoners the probable number of cells that would be required for a time for county purposes.

1002. Do you always keep a certain number of cells for county purposes?—Yes. Of course there might be in the ensuing month a large number of discharges, and that would be taken into consideration.

1003. So that you are never, in reality, full?—We have been full; every cell.

1004. Mr. Hunt.] Is it under the authority of an

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

an Act of Parliament that your county are obliged to take in Admiralty and War Office prisoners?—Under the Mutiny and Marine Force Annual Acts I believe it would be found that we must take them in at a charge about which we have no option. The Act provides that the governor must receive them, or he is liable to a penalty for not receiving them.

1005 But does the Act say the terms upon which they are to be received?—No.

1006. You first said that it was a matter of arrangement, and you afterwards said that the Government department fix the terms, as I understood you?—Some four years since it was felt that the allowance that the Admiralty and the War Office were making for the naval and military prisoners was very inadequate indeed, and a representation was made from the quarter sessions to those departments, and a fresh sum was awarded; that is all the arrangement that exists.

1007. Under the Mutiny Act, is the governor of the gaol bound to take them in on any terms that the Admiralty or War Office may fix?—I cannot remember exactly the wording of the Mutiny Act. The words would be found in the Act as to what the duty of the governor is; that he is bound to receive them under a penalty; that is generally what it is.

1008. Can you tell me what power the county authorities have to obtain the actual cost of the prisoners from those departments?—Sixpence per day was the sum originally fixed by the Mutiny Act for certain prisoners. I think some alteration has been made since this Mutiny Act which I have here, which is an old one, 1852.

1009. Chairman.] But you could not explain how it is that the two departments do not give you the same sum, the amount being 1*s.* a day from the one department and less from the other?—I find that I made a mistake as to this; both departments now pay the same.

1010. Mr. Acland.] When you said just now that it was a matter of arrangement, did you mean that it was a free contract on both sides, or did you mean merely that the justices had the power of representing if they were not satisfied, and that the Government had the power of giving an answer, yes or no, as they pleased. Which did you mean?—What you put in the second part of your question is what I endeavoured to express.

1011. If the justices were quite satisfied with the arrangement without making a representation, and a larger sum was given to them, it is in fact not a matter of arrangement, but it is a matter of Government settlement, against which the magistrates have the power of making a representation?—Yes, that is my impression of the arrangement.

1012. Mr. Pell.] Did you not also tell us that the effect was that there was a loss to the county?—Yes, certainly, there is a loss to the county.

1013. Chairman (to Mr. Earle).] As regards the prosecution of prisoners, can you state what the total cost of the following item is: Cost of assizes and quarter sessions under the Criminal Justice Act, and under the Juvenile Offenders Act, for the year 1867?—I can give you for the whole year the cost of the sessions; it is 1,360 l. for the sessions for the year ending 1866–7; for the assizes, 1,250 l., and under the Criminal Justice Act summary convictions, 400 l.

1014. Then are the Committee to understand that the cost of prosecutions may be divided under three heads, the cost of assizes, the cost of quarter sessions, and the summary convictions?—Yes.

1015. Is there a small item under the head of juvenile offenders?—Yes, which might be included in summary convictions, and that would add about 50 l.

1016. And does the total of those prosecutions amount to about 3,000 l.?—Yes.

1017. What do you get back?—In that year we received from the Treasury 3,300 l., but that is not in respect of those particular prosecutions; the payments by the Treasury were in respect of prosecutions the year before; the payments from the Treasury are irregular; the Treasury officers go through the accounts after they have been sent up, and then probably one or two interviews will take place between the clerk of the peace, or some one from his office, and the Treasury officers as to certain disallowances, and after a lapse of time the payment is made, but the payment is made at irregular times.

1018. Do you get back the whole?—In theory we are entitled to the whole; of course if we charge what we are not allowed to charge, the Treasury disallow it.

1019. Sir Massey Lopes.] What is the difference between the practice and the theory; you have told us that during last year there has been an expenditure of 3,100 l. in your county?—That was in the year which the Chairman referred to, 1867.

1020. (To Mr. Webb.) What amount did you receive from the Government in respect of that sum?—Out of the 3,100 l. there would be 30 l. disallowed as the cost of cases dismissed by the justices, under the recent Act of Parliament, the 29th & 30th of Victoria, giving the justices power to award costs in cases dismissed by them; that 30 l. will have to be taken out, the Treasury declining to pay any portion of it.

1021. Are there any further items disallowed? The disallowances on the 3,000 l would probably be about 100 l., so far as Hampshire is concerned.

1022. Then, so far as the amount falling upon the county is concerned, the difference would be about 100 l.?—About 100 l. on that account; it would amount to about 50 l. on each return, which might be taken at 1,500 l.

1023. In a series of years, has there been generally a serious loss to the county, or merely a trifling loss?—At first there was a serious loss to the county, but by the county conforming, as far as it could, to the Treasury regulations, that loss has been diminished.

1024. Then, are we to understand the matter may be stated thus, that if the county authorities are not careful the disallowances may be large?—Yes.

1025. But if the county affairs are well administered, then the disallowances are small?—Comparatively small; but there still are certain arbitrary rules, if I may say so, laid down by that department, that is to say, by the auditors of the criminal law accounts, with reference to the number of cases that shall be taken, and with reference to allowances which the county finds itself unable to comply with.

1026. Mr. Birley.] Are you also able to give us the cost of prosecutions at each assizes, and at each quarter sessions, and what allowance would be received from the Government, and the difference?—Yes, I could very soon prepare such a return a return; I could from the books, but not from the abstract.

1027. But you are not in the habit of so keeping the accounts?—No; not under these distinct heads.

1028. Chairman.] If I understand right, in the annual statement of accounts that you send to the Home Office, you state the amount disbursed under four columns, keeping separate all expenses of prosecutions at assizes, at quarter sessions, and under the Summary Convictions Act?—Yes.

1029. But in your receipts from the Treasury they are all lumped together in one column?—Yes.

1030. And therefore I apprehend it would not appear whether the repayments from the Treasury are in respect of the same year or not; they are simply entered as receipts from the Treasury?—The receipts being during that year but not necessarily in respect of that year, and in practice, not so. (Mr. Earle.) The county authorities have no control with regard to allowances at the assizes; it depends upon the clerk of assize with whom the county have no connection whatever; it is the clerk of assize that allows costs at the assizes.

1031. Chairman.] If the clerk of assize makes a mistake the county pays for it?—Yes.

1032. Is it considered a grievance to you if the clerk of assize allows more than the Treasury regulations the county has to pay for it?—It is considered a grievance, because we have no means of redress at all, as we have no authority whatever over the clerk of assize. As a rule the clerks of the justices prefer taking their cases to the assizes, because larger costs are allowed.

1033. Mr. Rathbone (to Mr. Webb).] I think I understood from two of your answers with respect to the building of prisons, and with respect to allowances, that the power of giving those allowances by the Government, enabled them both to enforce a very effective compliance with their demands, and obedience to the rules that they lay down?—Yes, under the New Prisons Act unquestionably it is so with regard to prisons.

1034. Is there much difficulty in getting the rules that they lay down carried out after a time?—There is no difficulty in Hampshire; in fact, the rules that are embodied in the New Prisons Act, I may say, were nearly all in force in Hampshire previous to the passing of that Act.

1035. You stated, did you not, that at first there were considerable discrepancies between the costs of prosecutions and the allowances, but that since they have learnt to obey the rules of the Government; the discrepancy has been very small?—The schedule of disallowances now is very small as compared with what it was originally.

1036. The system works harmoniously and easily now, does it?—It works more easily, but I cannot quite accept the other word.

1037. Sir Massey Lopes (to Mr. Earle).] I understand you to say that there are always disallowances, sometimes more and sometimes less?—Yes, always.

1038. And you stated, did you not, that prosecutors prefer taking their cases to the sessions rather than to the assizes, because the county are more liberal in their payments?—No, it is the other way; prosecutors appear to much prefer going to the assizes, because they get larger payments than they do from the county in respect of their briefs; the scale of charges for witnesses is the same.

1039. I also understood you to say that there was a loss of 3,046 l. to the county upon the maintenance of prisoners and prosecutions, and matters connected with the gaol?—The net charge on the county was 3,746 l. last year.

1040. Then that falls entirely upon the county?—Yes; that is, after deducting all payments in aid.

1041. So that that is the net loss to the county every year?—The net charge on the county.

1042. To which the Government pay no contribution whatever?—Precisely so; that is, after deducting the Government contribution.

1043. And that is statutory?—Yes, that is, by Act of Parliament.

1044. And they have no power to relieve themselves in any way from that charge?—No, they have not.

1045. Mr. Pell.] You have said that about 100 l. is disallowed by the Treasury with reference to prosecutions separately from those dismissed cases, and, I think, the Chairman suggested that that might be diminished by care on the part of the county; in what direction should they be careful, and how could that 100 l. a year be diminished?—Only a part of it could be saved by the county, because a very considerable portion of it is due to the want of care on the part of the clerk of assize.

1046. Would any care materially reduce this charge of 100 l. a year in your county?—No; it is impossible to avoid making small mistakes, of course, where there is such a number of prisoners, and a number of small mistakes will soon run up into 100 l.

1047. What proportion of this 100 l. loss is due to the action of the clerk of assize?—I could not quite answer that question, but my belief is that there are more disallowances in respect of assize cases than in respect of sessions cases; at any rate, there are more than amount to 50 l.

1048. Mr. Hunt (to Mr. Webb).] What I understand is this, that formerly the county officers used to allow a larger cost than the Treasury would repay?—Yes.

1049. But in course of time they learned exactly what the Treasury would allow, and then the county officers refused to allow more to prosecutors and witnesses than the county could get recouped from the Treasury?—It is not generally with reference to witnesses; the main disallowances are on the briefs, counsels' fees, and prosecutors' costs.

1050. The county officers now know exactly what the Treasury will allow for prosecutors' costs and witnesses, and they keep the allowance which they pay in the first instance, down to that amount?—No, because it is quite an arbitrary rule of the auditors of the criminal law accounts as to the disallowances.

1051. I am merely taking the case of the quarter sessions with regard to the county officers; they keep down the amount, do they not, to what they think will be repaid by the Treasury?—As far as they can; but the justices in petty sessions, or the justices acting at the sessions, may commit a prisoner for trial on four cases, the Treasury rule is only to allow three, and, consequently, that one case entirely falls upon the county, the county officers not having any any option in the matter, and they frequently, also, allow a smaller sum for counsels' fees or briefs than the taxing officer of the court has allowed.

22 March 1870.

1052. That is with regard to the sessions; but with regard to the assizes the county has no control whatever over the clerk of assize?—None.

1053. And he is the person who fixes the allowance at the assizes?—Yes.

1054. So that if the clerk of assize, who is not controlled by the county in any way, allows more than the Treasury will repay, the county has to be at the loss?—Yes.

1056. Do you find that the Treasury, generally speaking, are willing to consider your application favourably?—Yes, they consider the application.

1057. Will they remit you that which you ask?—Sometimes; but not any very great portion generally; the amount restored is generally very small.

1058. Not equal to that which you demand?—No.

1059. Is that principally on account of disallowances with regard to the sessions or the assize?—The principal restorations are on sessions cases.

1060. With regard to the assizes, in your answer to the honourable Member just now, you say that the county have no discretion at all, and are obliged to abide by what the clerk of assize fixes, upon that particular point are the Government less willing to consider your application than on the other?—They are less ready to restore the disallowances. It will frequently happen in this way: that we are not able to give them so much information concerning the assize case as we are with respect to sessions cases, so that we have an advantage undoubtedly in the sessions cases.

1061. And that constitutes a grievance which is undoubted?—Yes, it is a grievance.

1062. Have you ever considered the remedy for that?—Yes; that there should be certain fixed rules laid down as to the amounts which the Treasury would allow.

1063. Have you ever suggested that to the Treasury?—Not beyond the examiners of accounts; not direct to the Treasury.

1064. Have you had an expression of opinion from the Treasury upon that point?—No.

1065. Mr. Corrance (to Mr. Earle).] You have spoken of a certain theory upon which they act; is that your theory or is it accepted by the Government; I mean the theory that the whole of those charges ought to be recoverable by the county?—Yes, assuming that they are properly and legally made out.

1066. Chairman.] Did you say that that was your theory?—What I think I said was, that in theory the Government are supposed to repay the county all the charges that are made upon them at the assizes and sessions, on the assumption that the charges are correct and proper.

1067. Mr. Corrance.] Who is that supposed by; by you, or by the Treasury?—It is supposed by the county.

1068. You would act under such a supposition for the county?—Certainly, if I had made out a proper list of cost, I should expect to be paid every farthing.

1069. But you do not find that it is so in practice?—No, not quite.

1070. Mr. Hunt.] Will you explain what you mean by "proper" costs?—Such charges as are allowed according to the table of costs.

1071. Might it not be the case under certain circumstances that the scale might be improperly low?—Then we are bound by it.

1072. I mean you would not be doing justice sometimes, if you were to act strictly according to that scale?—We are bound by the scale; we have no discretion.

1073. I understand that if you exceeded the scale you would not get repayment; but is it not the case sometimes that you would not be doing justice if you were not to give more than that scale allowed?—Possibly; no doubt in a great number of cases there is very great hardship inflicted upon witnesses, who are obliged to hang about several days at the assizes and sessions, and who get a very small payment in respect of their loss of time.

1074. Is it not the case sometimes that, as regards prosecutions, a prisoner is not likely to be prosecuted to conviction, unless a plan of the premises concerned is produced in court?—Yes, that is so.

1075. In that case, although it is necessary for the ends of justice that a plan should be made, does not the Treasury sometimes refuse to allow the expense of that plan?—Yes, that is so.

1076. Is not that a case where it would be improper for you to abide by the scale of the Treasury?—We have no discretion.

1077. It would be improper not to allow the cost of a plan for the prosecution in such a case?—I think it would.

1078. But yet, in those cases, the Treasury might refuse to repay the cost?—Yes, they would. For in the recent case of murder in Hampshire, at Alton, a surveyor was employed to make a plan, and they would not allow the costs.

1079. And yet without that plan perhaps a conviction might not have been obtained?—Yes, that is so. When I say that they would not allow the costs, they would not allow the proper costs that the surveyor charged.

1080. Is it not the case sometimes that where a brief is a very heavy one, and it is only fair to the prosecuting attorney to allow more than the Treasury scale, and although the fees upon the brief are of greater amount than the Treasury scale, the Treasury would not repay it?—Yes, that is so. It is quite impossible that the Treasury can judge as well as the officer that is sitting in court, and knows how much trouble has been taken.

1081. Chairman.] What is the amount for the coroners?—There are seven coroners in the county, and their aggregate salaries amount to 606 l.

1082. I see in one of the years that the costs of the coroners, and the incidental expenses connected with them, were about 1,000 l.; is that correct?—I think that is about correct. Last year the expenses of inquests would be about 1,000 l., including the salaries.

1083. What is the population of the county?—In 1861 it was 320,000, including boroughs, contributing to the county rate.

1084. Sir

1084. Sir Massy Lopez.] Does the whole of that payment for inquests, which you say amounted to 1,000 l. last year, fall upon the rates?—Yes.

1085. Is any portion of it paid by the Government at all?—No.

1086. Mr. Pell.] You stated that there were seven coroners; who appoints those coroners?—The freeholders appoint the county coroners.

1087. Has the Duchy of Lancaster a coroner there?—No.

1088. (To Mr. Webb.) Are they always appointed by the freeholders?—There are three county coroners appointed, one appointed by the Governor of the Isle of Wight, and the other three are appointed by the lords of manors.

1089. Do you think that this arrangement with regard to the appointment and the multiplicity of coroners, increases in any way the expenses of the ratepayers with regard to inquests?—I think not in this county, because that was taken into consideration when the salaries were fixed, and the districts over which the coroners acted by arrangement.

1090. Do the districts over which those coroners act lie together, or are they separated and scattered about the county?—The district of each, with the exception of one, is pretty much in his own neighbourhood; for instance, there is a coroner for the Isle of Wight, and he acts entirely for the Isle of Wight; one coroner acts pretty much in the eastern part of the county; and the three coroners appointed by the lords of manors act exclusively within those manors, and the districts of the other two county coroners are rather extended.

1091. Who pays the coroners that are appointed by those three lords of manors?—The county.

1092. Chairman (to Mr. Earle).] What is the general staff of the county, that is to say, what further payments have you for what you call "office" expenses?—The officers of the county, not including the police officers or the prison officers, are the clerk of the peace, the county treasurer, the county surveyor, and two minor officers, whom you can hardly call officers, the keepers of the county hall and of the judge's lodgings.

1093. And the inspectors of weights?—The inspectors of weights are under the police.

1094. Have you got any particular column in your accounts for them?—Yes.

1095. Will you state the amount of the cost of officers?—The cost of the clerk of the peace, the county treasurer, and the county surveyor, is 830 l., and including the hall-keeper, 850 l.

1096. From your previous evidence, can you put together, quite roughly, your total of 12,000 l., exclusive of the police?—Yes, I think I could do that; I exclude prosecutions, because practically, they are repaid; the net charge of the county prisoners, lunatics, reformatories, and payments, of that nature, and the conveyance of prisoners by the constabulary, is 5,457 l.; county bridges, militia stores, and other buildings, and the cost of special constables, 1,220 l.; coroners, 606 l.; public officers, not including prison officers or police, 850 l.; office expenses, including the printing of the voters' list and law costs, 590 l. Then the repayment of the loan, principal and interest, last year (of course this varies from year to year) was 6,042 l.

1097. Did you have a balance at the beginning of the year, out of which you were able to pay that?—We had a balance of 828 l., and at the end there was a balance in hand of 1,380 l.

1098. Then you see there are 2,000 l. unaccounted for; you must have made a mistake in your evidence as to the repayments of loans?—I have no doubt that the figures that I gave you last are quite right. I can now account for it, I think; it so happened that we had a balance from the cattle plague rate last year, which fortunately turned out to be not required, and it was transferred to the county rate, that is 958 l., and that, with the balance of 828 l., will make nearly 2,000 l.; there are certain other receipts, besides county rates; from fines in aid of the county rate we received 420 l.

1099. What do you get from the county rate?—£. 12,770.

1100. Are there any other small receipts besides?—No, I think I have accounted for all the receipts.

1101. Mr. W. H. Smith.] Do any of the officers who are stated to have cost 830 l., receive fees in addition to their salaries?—Yes, the clerk of the peace receives fees on prosecutions.

1102. Colonel Brise.] Does the surveyor receive fees and per-centages?—No, he merely receives travelling expenses.

1103. Mr. Corrance.] Have you no county auditor?—No.

1104. Chairman.] I see in the return 6,000 l. put down for the repayment of debt; the payment for the lunatic asylum was 3,000 l., and there was a payment of 3,000 l. besides; will you state what that debt is besides the county lunatic asylum?—There is a debt in respect of the prison, and in respect of the police stations, but the latter of course is not a county debt; the county debt is in respect of the prison and in respect of the lunatic asylum.

1105. Is that 3,000 l. a variable amount?—The county debt in respect of the prison is now 2,000 l.; last year 1,600 l. was paid off, so that there is only 2,000 l. remaining. In respect of the lunatic asylum, as I stated before, it is 27,300 l.

1106. As regards the police rate, I think you stated that it was 3 d. in the pound?—Last year it was 3 d. in the pound.

1107. Your county rates being 2 d. in the pound?—Yes.

1108. What do you receive from the Government in respect of the police?—£. 3,928.

1109. What was your total expenditure?—The total expenditure over the police was about 20,000 l., and we received 3,928 l. from the Government.

1110. So that, in round numbers, you had to spend 16,000 l.?—Not precisely so; we have other receipts besides the Government grant.

1111. Does the 20,000 l. include superannuations?—No, the superannuations are charged upon the superannuation fund.

1112. Will you state how much you add to that fund?—The superannuation fund is increased by stoppages from the pay of the police, and it has no connection with the rate.

1113. Does no portion of the rate go towards the superannuation fund?—None whatever.

1114. What other receipts have you besides the receipts from the Treasury?—The county police are employed by several of the boroughs, who contribute. There are three boroughs, the

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

South Western Railway Company, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and certain private persons who employ the police, and the aggregate of their contributions amounts to 960 l

1115. Will you state the arrangement that exists between the Government and the county as regards the contribution of the Government to the police?—The Government pay one-fourth part of the pay and clothing of the police, provided that the report of the inspector is such that the police force is in a good state in respect of numbers and discipline, and efficiency.

1116. What is the regulation as regards numbers?—There is none; the county fixes its own number.

1117. The county fixes its own number; and if those numbers are below a certain standard in the mind of the inspector or of the Government, can they withdraw the contribution of one-fourth?—The number having been fixed by the county, if the actual number in the force does not come up to the number fixed by the county, then the police force is inefficient in respect of numbers, and would be so reported, and the Government grant would not be paid.

1118. Has the Government anything to say to the number fixed in the first instance by the county as to whether it is efficient or not?—No.

1119. (To Mr. Webb.) When the numbers of the county police are fixed in the first instance, if they are not fixed high enough, does the county run the risk of not getting its one-fourth?—Yes, certainly.

1120. The standard then is, practically, in the mind of the inspector?—Yes.

1121. But there is no regulation that it must bear any certain proportion to the population or not?—There is no fixed regulation that I am aware of.

1122. Is there this risk, that the county might fix its police unnecessarily high in order to make quite certain of getting the one-fourth from the Government?—It might be so.

1123. On the whole, the stimulus given by that one-fourth is to raise the number of the police, so as to be quite certain that the county may receive the subventive?—Yes, so as to ensure the Government contribution.

1124. Might it occur, if there were a certain force of police in a county, and it was a question whether it ought to be increased, the increase might be paid for entirely out of the Consolidated Fund?—I am scarcely prepared to answer that question.

1125. What is your force in Hampshire, speaking roughly?—260.

1126. Of which the Government pay one-fourth?—Yes.

1127. Therefore they pay, so to speak, for about 60 men?—Yes.

1128. (To Mr. Earle.) Then, so far as the county is concerned, it would be the same thing for the pockets of the ratepayers whether they had 190 men, the Government thinking that number sufficient, or whether they had 250 men, the Government paying their quota?—But there would be this risk on the part of the county, that they might not get their full force.

1129. What do you mean by "full force"?—They might fix their number at any certain standard, and they might not be able to obtain recruits to fill their force It sometimes happens that the Hampshire force is not quite full.

1130. What I mean is, that it is the same thing to the county, as far as its own pocket is concerned, whether it has only three quarters of the force, which is considered sufficient, or the four quarters which is considered sufficient by the Government?—Yes, the same, in a pecuniary sense.

1131. And, therefore, where there is a doubt, there is the temptation to the county rather to raise its force beyond what is necessary, in order to make quite sure of the Government grant?—Yes, I suppose that would be so; but then if they were satisfied that the force was sufficient, they would want to be satisfied that the inspector would think so too.

1132. Supposing the county were to consider that it had more police than was necessary, could it reduce the force without concert with the Government?—No; there must be the approval of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

1133. The county rate is not levied with the police rate; the rates are levied separately, are they not?—Yes, they are levied separately.

1134. And are they collected together?—They are demanded by the same precept, and they are paid by the guardians out of the moneys in their hands.

1135. But in precept it is in separate column from the county rate?—Yes, they are in two separate columns; some parishes are liable to the county rates and not liable to the police rate.

1136. Will you state how that is?—Because they maintain their own police; for instance, boroughs without separate courts of quarter sessions will prefer to have their own police.

1137. Boroughs having their own quarter sessions, I presume, pay no county rate?—Boroughs that have quarter sessions pay neither county rate nor police rate.

1138. Boroughs having no quarter sessions may pay county rate but no police rate?—They must pay county rate, and they may pay no police rate, if they choose to maintain their own police.

1139. Are there many boroughs in your county in that position?—Three or four.

1140. Mr. Hunt.] Is that the case with Basingstoke, Newport, Portsmouth, Southampton, and Winchester?—Southampton, Portsmouth, and Winchester are separate jurisdictions, but they are not boroughs of the class to which the Right Honourable the Chairman is alluding; they are not liable to the county rate. The boroughs liable to county rate are Basingstoke, Newport, Ryde (Ryde has recently been made a borough), Romsey, and Lymington; Romsey used to have its police, but it has given them up. Basingstoke, Newport, Ryde, Romsey, and Lymington are not separate jurisdictions and have no courts of quarter sessions.

1141. Chairman.] Does this depend entirely upon the boroughs?—Yes.

1142. They withdraw themselves as it were, from the county police?—Yes; they obtain a separate commission of the peace, and have magistrates appointed, and thereupon they set up their own police.

1143. Then the fact of their being those three boroughs with their own police, renders it necessary to have the police rate separate from the county rate?—No doubt, in those boroughs.

1144. Will you state any other reason why the police rate is separated from the county rate, if there is any other reason; is it only on account of the the different areas over which it is levied?—I think that is so; all property within the county which is rateable to the poor rate, is liable for county rate, and would be also liable for police rate, if it is within the police jurisdiction.

1145. The only difference is the difference of area, as far as you are aware?—Yes, that is all.

1146. Does the same treasurer account for the police fund as for the other?—Yes, the same treasurer, the county treasurer.

1147. Is it audited by the same auditor?—The accounts are audited by a sub-committee of the finance committee of the county.

1148. You stated that there were certain boroughs that contributed to your receipts, those are boroughs having their own jurisdiction, and they would pay no county rates, I presume?—No; first there is the case of a borough which has a separate jurisdiction, such as Andover; they will contract to employ our police. Next is the borough of Lymington, which is within the county and liable to the county rate, but it is a municipal borough, and might have its own police, only it does not; Romsey also pays county rate.

1149. (To Mr. Webb). In the case of Lymington, Lymington is separate and might levy its own police if it chose; but does Lymington pay police rate or not?—No, the borough of Lymington is consolidated with the county for purposes of police, under the County Police Act.

1150. Being consolidated, does it pay the county rate, or does it pay a certain sum under a contract?—It pays the county rate and then a certain sum under contract for the purposes of police.

1151. Then it pays twice over?—No; it pays county rate; it does not pay police rate.

1152. There are two kinds of boroughs which do not pay the police rate; namely, the boroughs that employ their own police, and the boroughs that contract with you for their police?—Yes, that is so.

1153. Besides the boroughs that have nothing to do with your police at all?—Yes, that is so.

1154. Sir Massey Lopes.] The Government pay one-fourth of the expenses of the police, that is to say, their clothing, and also their salaries; therefore, by paying one-fourth practically, they have the whole absolute power over the police, have they not?—I scarcely understand in what sense the honourable Baronet means.

1155. The Government pay one-fourth towards the expenses of the police, and paying that one-fourth, do not they absolutely control the whole management of the police force?—They have not control as to the disposition of the force, inasmuch, as it has been recently laid down that that rests entirely with the chief constable.

1156. But can the magistrates dismiss the chief constable?—I rather think not without the consent of the Home Secretary.

1158. The actual disposal of the force lies, does it not, with the chief constable?—Yes.

1159. And the chief constable is first appointed by the magistrates, is he not?—Yes.

1160. When once appointed by the magistrates, have the magistrates any power to dismiss him?—I think not without the consent of the Secretary of State.

1161. The Government paying one-fourth of the expense of the police, the inspector has the power, has he not, to say: If you do not appoint so many more police, we will withhold our one-fourth?—That is practicable.

1162. Has he ever done that in your county?—Not in our county.

1163. Have you ever heard of his doing so?—I believe the inspector called attention at one time to the shortness of the number of the police, but that was at a time when there was a considerable vacancy in the force.

1164. Did he tell you that unless you increased your number, he should withhold the Government Grant?—No, not to increase the number authorised by the sessions; but it was that the number authorised by the sessions were not employed. There was a difficulty at one time in obtaining recruits for the force, and so the force was not full; it was not up to the standard sanctioned by the sessions; that was how it was.

1165. Have the magistrates any power in quarter sessions to dispose of, or say where the police shall be located?—No, that rests entirely with the chief constable.

1166. And he is simply and only responsible to the Home Secretary?—He is responsible to the magistrates in one sense, because, as it frequently has happened, applications have been made to the court of quarter sessions for additional constables, and although it rests entirely with the chief constable as to the way in which the force shall be disposed of, an expression of opinion from the sessions that a certain number of constables should be located in a certain place, has always been attended to.

1167. But the magistrates have no power to insist upon it; they may remonstrate, may they not, with the chief constable, but the power is only with him?—Yes, that is so.

1168. (To Mr. Earle.) It is a matter of courtesy only that the chief constable pays any attention to the wishes of the magistrates?—Yes, that is so.

1169. Mr. Pell.] You told us, I think, that in your county the total cost of the police was about 20,000 l.?—Last year I think it was about 20,000 l.

1170. And you received in practice from the Government, I think you said, about 4,000 l.?—Yes.

1171. In theory, you should receive a quarter, which would have been 5,000 l.?—No, not quite so. We are entitled to receive a quarter in respect to the pay and clothing only; but there are other considerable expenses of the police.

1172. What made me ask you this question was, because the Right Honourable Chairman said to you, that in fact, the Government pay for about 60, which is one-fourth of your force; your force being, I think you said, about 260 men?—Yes; no doubt that is so.

1173. Then, in fact, the Government do not pay for about 60 men?—No, they do not; it is only in respect of pay and clothing.

1174. There is a difference of 1,000 l. between what you receive and the cost of the police; what does that arise from; do the Government pay you you anything upon the score of pensions?—No, nothing at all; they pay one-fourth of the pay and clothing; the pay and clothing amounted last year to 17,000 l. nearly.

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. C. A Webb.

22 March 1870.

1175. Chairman.] But from your 20,000 l. you would first have to deduct the sum which you receive from the boroughs before the Government pay you one-fourth; the Government pay nothing for the pay and maintenance of those constables that you lend, or do they?—Yes; there is no distinction; they are all the county police.

1176. They pay you for your men, even although they are employed in the boroughs?—Yes, except those that are appointed for individuals and railway companies; those are excepted.

1177. Mr. Pell.] So that, in fact, it would come to this, that financially it would be a better arrangement for the county to make with the police, to pay them during their time of service a higher salary with no pension to follow, because you would receive from the Government one-fourth of the payment; whereas, if you pay men low, leading to the expectation of receiving a pension hereafter, the county would lose by that arrangement?—That is so in a certain sense; but not quite so; because the men themselves, out of their pay, create the superannuation fund from which the pensions are drawn.

1178. Mr. Hunt.] They contribute to it; they do not create it?—Yes, they contribute to it.

1179. Mr. Pell.] Must all of your police arrangements, with regard to salary and number, be sanctioned by the Home Office?—Yes, there is a maximum scale of pay fixed by the Home Secretary.

1180. Is not the minimum also fixed?—Yes.

1181. Although the Government only recoups the county one-fourth of the expense, with regard to the police they have supreme control in reference to pay and clothing too?—Within certain limits the Government have that control.

1182. They have supreme control, and in fact they impose a tax upon the county and then only contribute one-fourth, as far as pay and clothing go?—Yes, that is so.

1184. Mr. Hunt.] I see that, according to the Return before me of Judicial Statistics, it is nearer 3,000 l.; the station-house charges, including stationery, for the year 1868 being 2,996 l.?—That must include repair of stations; but that is not according to our account. The expenditure, or divisional expenses for the year 1867–8, was 2,580 l., and there were horses 190 l., which makes about 2,700 l. Then comes a small sum for fire insurance, and repairs of stations 220 l.; building rooms at Gosport station 190 l.; and sundry expenses, such as subscription for the county hospital, and professional business 58 l. That is the whole expenditure of that year.

1185. Colonel Brise.] Can you give us the items of the divisional expenses?—The divisional expenses are expenses incurred by the superintendents in each of the divisions. There is a superintendent in each division of the county, and he will incur certain expenses. These are the items: forage, farriery, additional horse hire, fittings up of station, rates, taxes, postages and parcels, oil, gas, allowances on special duty, standing for horses when attending petty sessions and other duty, bridges, ferries, boat hire, removal of constables transferred for benefit of service, medical attendance on constables, stationery, books, printing, advertising, repairs to carts, saddlery, and stable necessaries.

1186. Mr. Hunt.] Then, in point of fact, the 25 per cent. paid by the Government only refers to part of the expenses of the police, namely, the pay and clothing?—Only to the pay and clothing.

1187. As to clothing, I believe accoutrements are not counted in the clothing, are they?—No.

1188. (To Mr. Webb.) There are a great many things, are there not, that the county have to provide for, for which they do not receive a contribution of 25 per cent. from the Treasury, such as belts, lanterns, staves, and so on?—That is so; those things are not included.

1189. Besides that, there is the expense of station-houses, and horses, and harness, and other small things also, which the counties have to bear?—Yes.

1190. With regard to the interference of Government in these matters, was there a circular sent out by the Home Office in 1865 or 1866 with reference to increasing the pay of the police force, called Sir George Grey's Circular?—Yes.

1191. Have you a copy of it here?—No, I have not got the circular with me.

1192. Was the purport of that circular to recommend the giving of higher pay to the constabulary forces?—Yes; and in consequence of the recommendation of the Secretary of State the pay was increased in Hampshire.

1193. And generally throughout the country, was it not?—I can hardly say that.

1194. But you can say that, in your county, the consequence of Sir George Grey's circular was, that the pay of the force was raised?—Yes; slightly raised.

1195. (To Mr. Earle.) Can you tell us to what extent that increase took place?—There was a committee that sat and published a report and a table, which shows that the annual increase on the whole of the police, in consequence of that circular, was 970 l.

1196. Do you mean on the whole expenses of the police?—On the whole force, from the chief constable down to the private constable.

1197. What proportionate increase, or what per-centage, upon the whole cost of the force was it?—About five per cent.

1198. Of which the Government contributed how much?—£242.

1199. (To Mr. Webb.) With regard to the control of the Government inspector, you have told us that if the counties do not provide a sufficient number of police to the satisfaction of the inspector, they run the risk of the certificate being refused; is it the case that they have an intimation from the inspector that if they do not increase their force by such a number of men, the next year he will refuse the certificate?—I believe that is so.

1200. Do you know that, in consequence of those intimations, the county magistrates do increase crease the force in order to satisfy the inspector?—That I do not know.

1201. Chairman.] But you have had that happen sometimes in Hampshire, have you not?—Not as regards the county police, but as regards a borough within the county.

1202. Mr. Hunt.] Did they receive such an intimation?—Yes.

1203. Has the effect of that intimation been to cause an increase in the number?—I am not sure whether they did increase it or lose the Government contribution. I rather think it was the latter.

1204. You stated, with regard to the superannuation fund, that that is partly contributed to by stoppages out of pay; but that does not make up the whole fund, does it?—No.

1205. That fund is made up, is it not, out of the moieties of fines that are paid to the police as informers?—Yes, and for assaults on police constables.

1206. (To Mr. Earle.) Do you know what proportion the stoppages out of pay bear to the other contributions to the fund?—The amount of stoppages from pay last year, and fines was 767 l.; I cannot tell the amount of fines.

1207. It is only as regards that portion which is contributed by stoppages from pay that the Government grant comes in aid; it is only to that extent?—Only to that extent.

1208. (To Mr. Webb.) And with regard to the other contributions, if they were not paid to the superannuation fund, they would go, would they not, in aid of the county rates?—That would depend upon the Statute under which the penalty was imposed.

1209. But if they did not go to the superannuation fund they would go otherwise in relief of the county rate?—Yes, that would be so.

1210. Under the present law, if the superannuation fund, made up as you have stated to us, does not suffice to pay the superannuations, the police rate has to bear the deficiency, has it not?—Yes, if it is not sufficient.

1211. (To Mr. Earle.) In your county, at present, the superannuation fund is sufficient, is it not?—Yes.

1212. (To Mr. Webb.) But, supposing it was not sufficient, the charges would come upon the county rate?—Upon the police rate; but a very large proportion of the constabulary superannuation fund in Hampshire arises from interest on money invested, accumulations to the fund.

1213. (To Mr. Earle). It all arises, does it not, out of the same source?—Yes.

1214. Mr. Seely (to Mr. Webb).] You say that the magistrates have no power to dismiss the chief constable without the consent of the Home Secretary; has the Home Secretary power to dismiss him without the consent of the magistrates?—I do not know how that is.

1215. (To Mr. Earle.) You say that the whole disposition of the force is under the control of the chief constable, and, therefore, whoever has the power of dismissing the chief constable has, practically, the control of the police?—That would hardly be so; because if the existing chief constable were dismissed, another must be appointed, and he would have the control practically. It would not be possible for the magistrates in the county to say that the police should be disposed of in such and such a manner to suit their own views.

1216. Do you not think that if the chief constable has the whole control of the police, whoever has the power of dismissing the chief constable would practically have the control of the police?—In a certain sense, no doubt.

1217. Then, with whom does the power of dismissing him rest?—I find that 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93, gives the power of dismissal to the magistrates; but supposing the Home Secretary had the power of dismissing the chief constable, he could hardly interfere with the disposition of the police in any county.

1218. Mr. Ayrton.] By whose order are the police stationed in the different parts of the county?—By the chief constable's order.

1219. Mr. Hunt.] But that is subject to this, that he can only send them where the magistrates find quarters for them, either in the county buildings or by sanctioning the renting of houses for them?—No doubt that is so.

1220. Mr. Gregory (to Mr. Webb).] I think you gave the Committee a statement of the expenses of the maintenance of county bridges; have you any instances of the liability of those bridges being thrown upon the landowners by ratione tenure, or in any other way?—No, not those particular bridges in respect of which this item of expenditure is incurred; but there are instances in the county of the owners being liable for the bridges.

1221. Who do the repairs, if you do not call upon them for a contribution?—We do the repairs.

1222. In fact, it is a contribution to the county rates to that extent?—Yes; but they are not county bridges.

1223. They are highway bridges, are they not?—They are occupation bridges more than highway bridges.

1224. (To Mr. Earle.) Are they not bridges dedicated to the public?—Yes, they might be so; but they would not become county bridges on that account; you cannot make a bridge a county bridge by dedicating it to the public.

1225. Mr. Corrance.] Can you give us the date when the Government allowance of one-fourth was first given; it was not simultaneous with the constitution of the force?—It was under the 19th & 20th Vict. c. 69.

1226. (To Mr. Webb.) Since that date, can you tell us how much the force has been increased?—The Government contribution was first paid to Hampshire in the year 1857-58.

1227. What was the expense of your force at that time?—That was no doubt in the year 1856-57, because it was received during 1857-58, and the total expense of the force then was 23,300 l.

1228. Do you mean that the expense of the force now is less than it was then?—That was the total expenditure, but that included the repayment of the debt and interest on the police stations and buildings.

1229. Can you give us the separate items of pay and clothing?—The pay for 1855-56 was 15,855 l., and the clothing 1,786 l., and the fourth paid by the Government was 3,644 l.

1230. Then the increased expense since is scarcely proportionate to the amount that you receive from the Government?—I was going to say that the pay and clothing for last year has been 17,000 l.

1231. What I meant was, that the increased expense of your force since the application of the Government allowance is not a proportionate amount amount to the sum which you now receive from the Government; but you are rather better off in consequence of the Government grant?—I should like to be quite sure about that before answering your question.

Mr. T. H. Earle, and Mr. G. A. Webb.

22 March 1870.

1232. Chairman (to Mr. Earle).] What is the clothing and pay now?—The pay and clothing now is about 17,000 l.

1233. Mr. Corrance.] What is the feeling of the ratepayers in your county about the police and the expense; do they object to it?—No.

1234. Is it popular?—With some classes. I do not think that the ratepayers in rural districts trouble themselves much about the pecuniary charge upon them for police.

1235. Do you think that the occupiers would wish for an increase of the force, if the rate was levied upon the owners alone?—I think that the occupiers in some districts would very much like to have the force increased.

1236. Am I to understand you to say that if the police fell upon the owners alone, then the occupiers would like the police force to be increased?—I think that, in some districts, irrespective of the persons who had to pay the rate, they would like the force to be increased, it being too small at present for the purposes of the district.

1237. You mean that they would wish to have another policeman or two?—Yes.

1238. Mr. Ayrton.] Would not the desire to have an increase of the force be influenced by the consideration of whether the rate was paid by the owner or the occupier; or are you able to form an opinion upon that subject?—I can only form my own opinion, and I do not feel that that is worth anything.

1239. Chairman.] Perhaps they might like an increase of the force now, if they think that they are not protected enough?—No doubt. We have constant applications for an increase in particular districts.

1240. What do you think would be the feeling in the county as to the withdrawal of the Government grant and the Government control; supposing that there were to be a proposal that the Government should no longer contribute the one-fourth, and that they should not have the power of dismissing the chief constable, would the ratepayers think that a boon?—No; I do not think they would think it a boon.

1241. You think that they would rather receive 4,090 l. from the Government, and let the Home Secretary have the power of dismissing the chief constable?—I think so, assuming that he has the power, as I understood a certain honourable Member to state; I think that they would very much prefer having the Government aid, the control being, to a certain extent, under the central Government.

1242. The Government grant was given at the time as a boon, was it not?—It is fixed by Act of Parliament.

1243. But it was considered that it was an assistance to the county to receive the Government grant?—It is in the Act which makes the establishment of police compulsory in counties, and it was a quid pro quo.

1244. Mr. Acland.] You have been asked one one or two questions about their feeling; is there a desire on the part of the ratepayers to have more control over the number of policemen and the constitution of the force?—No, I should say not; because where they have made applications to the justices to increase the force in particular districts, and their applications have been refused, they take it in very good part.

1245. Do you know any case in which the ratepayers think that the police is a more expensive institution than they get an adequate return for?—No; I am not aware of any.

1246. Mr. Pell.] I understand you to say that your clerk of the peace directly receives 590 l., but that that did not entirely constitute all that he received, because he received in addition, I think you said, 450 l. in respect of fees, which are not a part of his salary?—I did not say that. The clerk of the peace receives directly 440 l. for salary, and the fees amount to about 450 l.

1247. With regard to the fees amounting to 450 l., do they or do they not form part of the cost of prosecutions?—The great bulk of them.

1248. So I presume that you receive a portion, and perhaps a great portion, of that money back again from the Government?—The Government pays those fees, undoubtedly.

1249. Does it not come to this, that in your county the Governnent pays part of the salary of the clerk of the peace?—Yes.

1250. Therefore, you are making a better bargain for your county by taking those fees in part payment, than we do in the county which I represent, where we pay the officers entirely out of the county rate, and they receive nothing in fees?—No; because the clerk of the peace in that county may probably take fees in the same way, and he accounts for them and passes them over to the county fund; it is merely a matter of arrangement.

1251. Chairman.] The county rate is levied upon the occupier, is it not, and not upon the owner?—Yes, that is so.

1252. Has there been ever any movement to your knowledge in your county, as to charging it upon the owner, and not upon the occupier?—None that I am aware of.

1253. Sir Massey Lopes.] You have given us 15 different charges, which are now placed upon the county rate; with the exception of salaries to the clerk of the peace and salaries to other county officers, are there any of those charges which the ratepayers, through the magistrates, have any control whatever over?—In a certain sense not; of course in small details, within certain limits, they are under their control.

1254. They are all statutory charges, except the salaries to the county officers?—Even some of those are statutory; with regard to the clerk of the peace, his salary is subject to the control of the Secretary of State.

1255. But there is a general control in the magistrates with regard to those salaries?—Yes.

1257. They may do it for less or for more; still there is no control with regard to those charges?—That is so.

1258. Chairman.] There is no part of the county expenditure, is there, that is controlled at all by the ratepayers?—No; the county expenditure is not controlled by the magistrates, at least not with regard to the separate heads of expenditure.

1259. In the administration, it depends very much, does it not, upon whether the magistrates are re economical or not?—No doubt. In the outay of 7,800 l. on the county prison, an extravaant committee of justices might have made it uch more.

1260. Sir Massey Lopes.] If the Home Secreary takes the initiative in making an alteration a prison, is not it, it may be, in the power of he magistrates to say how that alteration is to e made, but the Home Secretary insists, does e not, upon its being done?—Yes.

1261. And so it is with the Lunacy Commisioners?—Yes, that would apply to buildings.

1262. Chairman.] As a matter of fact, one an conceive that your county rate might fall or ise to a certain extent, according as you had an conomical or an extravagant body of magisrates?—No doubt that is so; because otherwise he county rate in two counties that were exactly imilar in size, area, and number, would be the ame, and they are not the same.

1263. Colonel Brise.] Has there been any increase in the county expenditure in Hampshire or the last 15 years, irrespective of police?—No; I should think there had been a decrease. There has been a considerable increase in the alue of the property liable to the rate, and that would account for the decrease in the rates to ome extent. There has been, I should say, a lecrease in the expenditure.

1264. Mr. Pell.] You have two assessments n your county, have you not, one for the county ate, and a union assessment with regard to the oor rate?—Yes, two different assessments.

1265. Was not there an Act of Parliament assed three or four years ago, which enabled he court of quarter sessions to make an assessment for the county?—Yes, there is the County Rate Act, the 15th & 16th of Vict; and there s another Act since that, which was an amendment of it, and which says that in making that rate the magistrates need not take the poor rate basis.

1266. What was the date of that Act?—The 29th & 30th of Victoria.

1267. Under that you make a separate assessment, do you not, with regard to the county rate?—The committee may assess in any way they think proper.

1268. (To Mr. Webb.) But have you done so?—Yes; the county assessment was made under the previous Act, under the 15th & 16th of Victoria.

1269. Was there not a doubt after the Union Assessment Act was passed, as to whether the magistrates were not obliged to accept that as being the county rate assessment?—Yes.

1270. In order to set that doubt aside, there was legislation on the subject, was there not?—Yes.

1271. You have made no separate assessment, but you have taken the property tax assessment, if I understand you aright?—There is a separate basis. The counties have not adopted the union assessment in all cases; but in some cases they have.

1273. You have utilized the best materials at your command?—Yes. There is one observation which I should like to be allowed to make, with reference to a question asked by an honourable Member just now, as to there being no county auditor. The county accounts are audited by the finance committee of the magistrates; and there is a thorough audit of the whole of the accounts, both of receipts and of expenditure.

22 March 1870.

Mr. Clare Sewell Read, a Member of the House, Examined.

1274. Chairman.] You have had considerable experience of rates, both as owner and as occupier?—Yes, considerable as occupier and agent, and also, in a limited degree, as owner.

1275. Have you turned your attention to the subject of the division of rates between owners and occupiers?—Yes, I have for some time past.

1276. Could you state to the Committee what difference you think it would make to the owner and the occupier if the tax was imposed upon the one or the other?—I do not think it would be any pecuniary benefit whatever to the occupier. I believe that if the owner had to pay half the rate he would be sure to recoup himself whenever there was a re-arrangement of the rent; in all probability he would make it safe in this way: I believe the average rates are about 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound in England and Wales; and if he were to pay half, which would be 1*s.* 8*d.*, in all probability he would say to the occupier, in order to make myself safe, I shall charge you 2*s.*

1277. Do you think that he would be able to get it?—I have no doubt that he would, as the owner of land. I do not speak about houses.

1278. Have you directed your answer chiefly to the case of agricultural districts?—Yes.

1279. Do you think that the competition for land is such that the owner would be able, if there were an increase of rates, to throw it entirely upon the occupier?—I have no doubt he would.

1280. But do you believe that at this moment that the rates are paid by the occupier or by the owner?—I believe that the increase of rates is borne entirely by the occupier.

1281. And when a lease falls in, if those rates have increased during the currency of that lease, is the occupier able to get any reduction?—None whatever.

1282. When a re-adjustment takes place, though the burden on the land is increased, you hold that it comes out of the pocket of the occupier and not out of the pocket of the owner?—Almost invariably.

1283. When the time came for the re-adjustment of the lease, if the rates have increased in any particular district, is the occupier not able to get a corresponding reduction of rent because of that increase?—I have hardly ever known it. I would say that I have never known any such great increase as there has been under the Union Chargeability Act, where some rates have been doubled. It is possible that in those cases he might get a certain deduction, but with an average increase he would not.

1284. Let us take the reverse case; supposing that the rates were reduced during the currency of the lease, would he be obliged to pay a higher rent in consequence?—He would save during his lease, lease, as a matter of course, and in the event of a new lease I have always found that if the landlord has not any more to pay, he is quite willing to let the tenant reap the benefit of any decrease.

1285. But you hold that if there is a case of increased charge it then comes out of the occupier's pocket?—Yes.

1286. And if it is reduced, then the occupier has the benefit?—Yes.

1287. And that, therefore, the owners do not take the amount of the rates into consideration when they re-adjust their letting?—I think that they do take it into consideration when it is brought under their notice by the tenant, but they generally say that the tenant must pay it; and, on the other hand, if it is a reduction, they do not put it on to him. I am speaking, of course, of a usual and common increase in the tax.

1288. Do you mean that it really comes to this, that the occupier paying the rates, the owner does not think much about the increase or decrease, but deals with the tenant, as if neither the one nor the other had taken place?—He takes very little interest about the rates.

1289. If the rates were charged on the owner, would it not form a more important element when it came to a re-adjustment of the letting?—I do not think it would, but I think it would be a very great benefit in other ways.

1290. Will you state the other ways in which you think it would be a benefit?—I think it would induce the owner to take a very much greater interest in the expenditure of the rates, and I believe that the rates generally would be more justly, and I will say even more generously and judiciously expended than they are now if he had some direct interest in the expenditure.

1291. Then you do not hold the usual theory, that, in the long run, the rates come out of the pocket of the landlord?—I think the general rate, of course, comes out of the pocket of the landlord, but any increase or any diminution is either saved or lost to the tenant.

1292. Then you state that the owner has no stake in the rates; do you state that absolutely, or do you mean for a certain time?—I should say from one hiring of the farm to another.

1293. But I understand you to say, that even at the end of the lease, when a new tenancy comes to be made, the owner is almost always able to throw the additional rate upon the tenant?—I think he is.

1294. And, therefore, the owner is not interested, in your view, in the interest of local taxation?—No, not in the same degree as the tenant is.

1296. Would you look at it from this point of view: the tenant calculates, does he not, in the hiring of a farm upon a certain profit which he can make out of his farm, and that he shall be able to get a certain interest for his money?—Yes, he hopes so.

1297. Then he takes into consideration the rates that he shall have to pay?—Yes.

1298. Then, if there are two farms in two different unions, and the rate in the one is high and the rate in the other is low, the farms being otherwise of equal value, would he not clearly give less to the owner as rent for the one farm than he would for the other?—If the rates are high in one union and low in another, and there are no compensating advantages in the two localities, I have no doubt he would give more rent where there were less rates.

1299. In that case the owner of the land where the rates were high, if he wanted to let his farm, would be obliged to accept a lower rent than the owner of the other farm?—Yes, provided there was no compensating advantage.

1300. And, therefore, in that case the rate would come out of the owner's pocket, would it not?—It would come out of the owner's pocket in that way.

1301. What you state is rather this: that, generally speaking, any increase of rate over the whole county is thrown upon the occupier?—Yes.

1302. But that if the increase is faster in one union than in another, that circumstance will modify the terms when new lettings of farms take place?—Yes, if the increase is considerable.

1303. But you would hold that if there was an increase in one place of 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, whereas in another case there has only been an increase of 6*d.* in the pound, the difference of 1*s.* would have to be borne by the owner in the one case, and he would have to accept so much less rent?—If he were going to exchange the tenant it might be so; but if he were going to continue his tenant it might make hardly any difference.

1304. Therefore, if the rate were put upon the owner, the onus of changing the terms with his tenant would be thrown upon him, would it not; that is to say, supposing the owner were to pay in the first instance, instead of the tenant, when they renewed the lease it would be the owner who would have to take the first step, and say to his tenant, "You must pay me more rent, because the rates have increased"?—It would.

1305. And do you think that the owners would do that?—Of course they would.

1306. But the occupiers do not say the same thing to the landowner, "You must let me off some rent, for the rates have increased"?—They generally say so, but they do not succeed in obtaining it, as a rule.

1307. Except for the competition for farms in places that are rented differently, you think that the owner is stronger than the tenant, and is able to throw the rate on to him?—Yes.

1308. If the rates became so high that they interfered seriously with the profits of the tenants, would they still be able to do so?—No; for if they became excessive, as they were before the abolition of the Old Poor Law, if the rates were 10*s.* and 15*s.* in the pound, the landlords could not let their land then.

1309. But you think that the increase in parochial taxation has not yet been so great as to interfere, to any great degree, with the profits of the tenant, so as to make him ask for a reduction of rent?—I think it has very much interfered with his profits, and he has asked for a reduction of rent, but he has not got it.

1310. Then it has, so far, only affected his profits?—It has only affected his profits.

1311. The profits of farmers, then, have decreased in consequence of the rise in the rates?—Yes, certainly.

1312. But the rise has not been so great as yet as to have touched him in his negociations with the owner; his profits before were so large that he is able able to bear this increase of rate, and stand the competition and pay the same rent?—His profits were small then, and they are rendered smaller now.

1313. Still they are large enough to tempt him to create such a competition, and he is still able to give the same rent to the landlord?—The competition is created by the small quantity of land and the large number of tenants.

1314. Still the profit which is held out appears apparently large enough to increase the number of those who are anxious to hire land, and who compete for land, or have you seen any diminution in the competition for land?—None whatever.

1315. Notwithstanding the increase of local taxation?—Notwithstanding the increase of local taxation, and the general reduction of farmers' profits, there is an increased competition for land.

1316. But if the landowners were to say that they had been affected by the increase of rates, as far as you are aware that would be a wrong statement, because their rents have not suffered at all?—Their rents, except in a very few instances, have not suffered. I would say that they might, perhaps, have been higher, but they have not been reduced.

1317. If there has been a diminution of the aggregate profits between the two on account of the rates, that has fallen exclusively or mainly in your belief, upon the occupier, and not upon the owner of the land?—Entirely upon the occupier.

1318. So that you would hold that the increase of the rateability of property has got nothing to do with easing the burthen of local taxation, as regards the agricultural part of the country?—That depends upon what the increased assessment would be; whether it would be from a large amount of building in the neighbourhood, or simply an improved state of agriculture.

1319. But what I understand you to mean is, that the increased burthen is not borne by those who are really receiving the rent, but is borne by those who pay the rent?—Yes.

1320. And that therefore the criterion of rise in rent has little to do with the question?—I do not think I quite apprehend the question.

1321. It may be said that if local taxation has increased, the rateable value of property has also increased; is not it a fair argument to use, to show that the rateable value having increased, it is able to bear a larger proportion of local taxation, without its being really an increased burthen?—I do not think that purely agricultural land has increased in value very considerably.

1322. Will you state your view as to the advantages to be derived by the owner feeling more directly interested in the expenditure of the rate if the owner were rated?—I think it would place the owner in a very much better position at the highway board and at the board of guardians. He is, as a magistrate, an ex officio guardian now, and his presence is not always looked upon as being altogether pleasant or satisfactory.

1323. He is not looked upon now as representing the owners of property?—He, no doubt is, but he is not recognised so by the other ratepayers.

1324. If he were an elected owner, he would have more power, and be more welcome at the board?—Certainly.

1325. Do you think that it would increase the good administration, if the owners were directly represented at the various boards expending the funds?—I do.

1326. And that if the owners were rated directly, some change ought to be made in the law, in order to give them such representation?—Certainly.

1327. Have you ever considered what would be the best means of giving them that representation?—Something like the Scotch plan, to depute to owners of a certain amount the election of their representatives.

1328. Which would you prefer, that the body of electors should elect a certain number of owners as members of the board, or that the owners themselves should form an electoral body, and elect the owners?—I think that the owners had better elect their own representatives.

1329. But in cases where in any union, or in any district, there were a few very large landowners, would it not become difficult to carry out that system?—I think it might; but at the same time, when I say that the owners should select their own representatives, it does not follow that they need be owners themselves.

1330. Which would be the more important do you think, that the owners should be the elected persons, or that they should have the power of electing?—That the owners should have the power of electing their own representatives.

1331. Without its being necessary that the representatives of the owners should be owners themselves?—Yes.

1332. Take such a case as a board of guardians, supposing half the rate were put upon the owners, what share do you think they ought to have in the representation?—If they paid half the rate, they should have half the representation.

1333. And do you think that it would be accepted by the ratepayers in country districts as fair, that if there were some 10 or 20 owners who owned nearly the whole of the land in the union, those owners should send half the representatives to the board of guardians?—If they paid half, I think it would.

1334. Might not that feeling come to what you have alluded to, that if the owner paid one-half of the rates he would really get it out of the occupier?—But he would pay half the increase, which he does not now.

1335. In future you would be able to get half the increase out of the owner?—During the term or the lease on which the tenant held the farm.

1336. You do not think that he would put on such a great increase as to cover himself against all contingencies?—He might; but at the same time, if there was an increase of rate it would be money out of his pocket.

1337. You think that the owners would look sharp after the administration of the rate, generally speaking?—I think that they would take a more general interest in the expenditure of the local rates; and I also think that there are several improvements which now are not done, in consequence of the owners having no direct interest, which would then be carried out.

1339. From your knowledge generally of the feeling in agricultural parts of the country, would you say that it would be acceptable that the owners should be rated for half of the rates, or for half of some of the rates?—It is really a subject that does not stir the agricultural mind in any degree. We should like to have them rated for one reason, that we think in all probability they would help us in getting off some of the burthens that are now levied exclusively on lands and houses.

1340. But the owners do not feel sufficiently interested to join now in trying to get rid of a portion of the local taxation?—I do not think they do.

1341. Does your remark as to the greater interest that the owners would take, apply to the administration of poor relief, to county business, and to the highway business?—I do not think it is of any use halving one rate and letting another be paid in whole; if you halve one I would halve the whole.

1342. Do not you think that a portion of the county rate might be entirely put upon the owners?—No, I should put it upon the Government if I had my will.

1343. If you could not do that, could you put it entirely upon the owner, or would you let it be half upon the owner and half upon the occupier?—I would let it be half.

1344. Which might have the advantage of only one collection?—Yes, which would have the advantage of only one collection; and if you have county financial boards, of course you will have representatives of the ratepayers there, which would do away with the unpleasant feeling that now exists in some parts, where the ratepayers do not think that they are properly represented.

1345. Mr. Ayrton.] As a matter of fact, did you ever know a case in which the rent was either increased or diminished in consequence of the fluctuation of rates?—I have, in some of the recent great changes that have taken place under the Union Chargeability Act.

1346. Do you mean that there has been a readjustment of the rents in consequence of the great changes in the amount of the rates?—Yes, but it is very exceptional.

1347. Which do you think would be the best mode of getting contributions from property to local rates; to charge half the rates upon the income tax or to charge half the rates upon the owners of the land?—To charge half the rates upon the income tax, most certainly, if general property was to contribute.

1348. In that way you would deal with the question of personal property contributing to the public burthens?—I should say that everyone ought to contribute according to his ability.

1349. Mr. Rathbone.] Does this affect your evidence, that it is practically the tenant who feels the increase and decrease of taxation, and who therefore alone takes any vivid interest in the matter?—Certainly.

1350. And you consider that this is not a good state of things, or favourable to good or enlightened management?—It is not.

1351. Sir Massey Lopes.] You think that there would be no pecuniary benefit to the occupier if there was any division of rates between the owner and the occupier?—None, whatever.

1352. Do not you think that if the owner as well as the occupier were interested in the expenditure of rates, they would tend to diminish in amount?—No.

1353. Did you not state that you thought they might be more generous in their expenditure?—Yes.

1354. But your opinion is that it would give the owners a better status to be present at meetings of guardians or highway boards, and so on, if they were rated themselves?—Yes; my idea is that the more the different classes of the community are interested in the expenditure of the rates, so much the better for the community.

1355. Could you tell us whether, in the last five years, the rates have very much increased in your own instance?—On my farm they have increased about 20 per cent. within the last five years in consequence of the action of the Union Chargeability Act.

1357. You were asked with reference to the increase of rateable property, how has rateable property so much increased of late years; has it been done by the fresh assessment under the Union Assessment Act?—I think that is one reason, and I should say the principal reason within the last five years, and that previously parishes were not assessed up to their full value.

1358. So that really rateable property has not increased in the same proportion as local taxation has increased?—Certainly not; I am speaking now generally of land, and my observations on land are not confined to Norfolk, because I know a good part of the country.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. CLARE SEWELL READ, a Member of the House; further Examined.

Mr. C. S. Read, M.P.
25 March 1870.

1359. Mr. Ayrton.] As regards the relative charge upon landlord and tenant, if they are free to make a contract, so far as any contract can be altered, do you see any injustice, or can any injustice arise in putting the rate on either the landlord or the tenant to any extent?—I do not think it would be well to alter existing leases and contracts.

1360. But so far as they can make a contract, no injustice could arise in putting the burthen on either landlord or tenant?—I think it would be impolitic to put it all upon the landlord, for obvious reasons.

1361. But somehow or other, between them, it is clear that they pay the whole burthen, and whatever may be the argument as to which of them ought to bear it, between them they must bear the whole?—Yes.

1362. Then, so far as they are free to make a contract, there can be no injustice in putting it upon either of them?—There is no injustice in it.

1363. Then it comes to be purely a question of expediency, does it not?—Expediency and policy, I suppose, as to whether the owner should pay all, or half, or none.

1364. Then, the only influence that results from the rates being paid by the one or the other arises from the fluctuation from year to year, and the difficulty of either party altering his contract?—Yes; and the almost continual increase that there is in rates.

1365. You have spoken of the Poor Law Board, and the change in 1834, do you know that previous to that time the Poor Law was virtually administered by one individual, the overseer, under the control of the justice of the peace residing in his neighbourhood?—Yes.

1366. At that time, then, there was a considerable ratepayer, and another considerable ratepayer, in the form of the justice of the peace, and also a freeholder and owner of property, undertaking the administration?—Yes, and very badly it was done, I should think.

1367. Then it does not appear that the mere fact of the administrator paying the rates is any motive at all for good administration, judging from that experience, I mean?—That depends upon whether he is interested in the payment.

1368. But before the new Poor Law, both the overseer and the justice of the peace were greatly interested in the payment, and yet the administration was as bad as it could be, was it not?—I only know from results, and what I have heard; I was a child in those days, but I should fancy that generally speaking the overseer had not the same power nor the same interest as the justice.

1369. But are you aware that the justices, chiefly by their mismanagement, succeeded in getting the rates to an enormous amount throughout the country?—I do not know whose fault it was, whether it was the fault of those who administered the law, or of the law itself, but the rates were very high.

1370. There is no substantial change in the law of relief itself, is there?—Yes, a good deal, I should think.

1371. Was not it competent to them to administer the law just as it is administered now, if they chose?—I do not think you had any workhouse test then as you have now; you had no workhouses, only a poorhouse in the village.

1372. To what do you ascribe the general improvement in the administration of the law; do you ascribe it to the fact that there has been a representative board acting through stipendiary officers?—I think that there has been a more regular system throughout the district; and I also consider the test of in-door relief to be the greatest advantage that we have under the new Poor Law.

1373. Will you explain what you consider to be the difference between the ex-officio guardians and the elected guardians, and why the ex-officio guardians should not be in a satisfactory position; is it the fact that they are not elected, and therefore have no representative character?—I think it is that they are not elected, and that their attendance is very irregular.

1374. You think that it results from this, that they are in the same position as they were before, and that coming there by privilege, and not with any responsible duty to the body of ratepayers, is the

25 March, 1870.

the reason why you think the justices are inefficient as ex-officio guardians?—I do not know that I ever said that they were inefficient when they would attend; the complaint is that their attendance is so irregular; in some boards particularly.

1375. Will you give the Committee the benefit of your experience as to how we can best have efficient boards who will administer local affairs well, and keep down the charges?—By electing people who will attend to the business regularly.

1376. How are you to secure that?—I think that if a man attend as an elected officer, rather than as a privileged person, he would attend more regularly.

1377. Therefore, the only point to be aimed at, is to have the whole board elected?—I think so, provided you have the division of rates as between the owner and occupier.

1378. Mr. Acland.] You do not consider that the justice under the old system was at all in the position which has been suggested by several members of this Committee, namely, that he should pay one-half of the rates, and feel personally the rise of the rates; under the old system he was not in that position?—Certainly not.

1379. Do you think that that would be a very material element in any proposed alteration of the law?—I should think it would.

1380. Therefore, it is not simply because the ex-officio guardians attend irregularly, or even because they are not elected, that you think their position questionable, but because they are known by the ratepayers who are elected not to feel immediately the rise or fall of the rates?—It is one of the considerations, if people think of it; but I believe that they generally object to ex-officio guardians, without very much consideration.

1381. The elected guardians, the ratepaying guardians, so to speak, feel that the ex-officio guardians, when they vote money, will probably not feel the increase of the rates for the next 10 years?—Yes.

1382. I understood you, in your former evidence, to say that if they were in a position in which they would be known publicly to feel immediately the rise of the rates, they would, probably, not only endeavour to keep down the rates, but that they would endeavour to bring intelligence and far-sightedness to bear on the expenditure?—Yes.

1383. And you think that a board so constituted would spend more wisely as well as more economically?—Yes.

1384. In your first answer you spoke of the average rate being 3 s. 4 d. in the pound in England and Wales; and in answer to the next question, you said that you were speaking not of houses but of land; I think that that is liable to some misapprehension, and perhaps you would tell us what is the average rate in your own neighbourhood?—I said that the 3 s. 4 d. was the average rate throughout England and Wales; that includes all the local burthens.

1385. As in your next answer you happened to say, though it does not immediately bear upon that point, that you were speaking of lands and not of houses, your answer is liable to be misunderstood; and I wish you now to state what is the average amount of rate in the agricultural district in which you reside yourself?—The average amount for the agricultural portion of the county of Norfolk would be something like 2 s. 6 d. in the pound.

1386. Will you be so good as to explain to the Committee how that 2 s. 6 d. is made up?—About 1 s. 8 d. would probably be the poor rates, 4 d. the county rate, 4 d. the highway rate, and 2 d. the church rate.

1387. Should you be disposed to draw any distinction between those rates in consideration of the question of dividing the rates between owner and occupier, or would you apply the same principle to the whole of them?—If you expect to obtain mathematical accuracy by dividing them, I think you will find yourselves in a very difficult position; not only would you require to have different rates divided in a different manner, but you would have actually to divide the different items that come upon the same rate. For instance, you might say that building workhouses and asylums should be paid entirely by the owner, and the maintenance of the poor, perhaps, be divided between them; and then again you might go on to say that there are some charges, such as the repairs of roads, that should fall entirely upon the occupier; but I believe that if you take it as a whole, it would be very much better to divide all the rates than to tinker with them and divide some.

1388. Taking that as your general opinion, would you be so good as to take the rates one by one, and take the poor rate first; are you prepared to say that you would make no distinction between maintenance charges for workhouses, or buildings of any kind, and the current rate for relief, or would you divide both?—I would divide both.

1389. In the case of roads, I do not know whether you are aware that in Scotland the construction of roads, and the construction of bridges, and, as I am informed, in some counties the repairs, amounting to 500*l.* and upwards, are charged wholly on the owner, and the expense of the current repairs, and the salaries, are divided between the owner and the occupier; would you approve of any plan of that kind, or would you also apply the principle there of dividing equally?—I believe that the repair of highways in Scotland varies in almost every county, but the upshot of it is, that the owners pay half and the occupiers half.

1390. In England, would you recommend that the owner should pay half and the occupier half, without distinction?—If you are going to alter it at all, I should say divide that as well as the other rates.

1391. With regard to the county rate, there are buildings and bridges in some counties forming a large portion of the expenditure of the county; would you make any distinction there between the owner and the occupier?—No, I would not.

1392. Would you distinguish between rates which should be paid by large districts for the main roads, and rates payable in smaller districts for parish roads, or would you have the whole of the roads in one hand?—I think that you will require to have some large county supervision for the thoroughfare roads of a county, if you are going to abolish turnpike roads.

1393. Could you suggest a good plan for dividing those expenses; would you have any larger area, for instance, than a county; would you group counties together for certain purposes?—I do not think I should; I would take the county as the large area, and the union or highway boards for the small district.

1394. Do you think it desirable to have any roads for small byeways in parishes taken off the é highway boards, that is to say, assuming that no distant time the highway districts will have uniformity of rate assessment, would you think desirable that there should be some small roads paired by a smaller district than the highway ard?—No.

1395. You would have the whole left in the nds of the highway board, would you?—es, if you make the Highway Act com-ilsory.

1396. Then you would only have two kinds of ads, county roads, and highway district roads?—Just so.

1397. In both cases you would divide the rate qually, would you, between the one and the her?—I would.

1399. Are you aware that the selection of unty bridges in some counties has been ex-emely arbitrary?—I am aware that there has een no uniform system.

1400. Do you think that some alteration is esirable in that respect, or would you leave natters exactly as they are?—I do not say that would leave matters exactly as they are. If ey are wrong, I would put them right, but I ould have the system more uniform.

1401. Have you given your attention to the nconvenience of the present units of area for the urposes of local government; and if you have, ill you give the Committee your views upon at subject?—I have thought of it a little; I onsider that Parliament has for all civil purposes bolished the parish which we have had from the ime of the Saxons; and without reorganising a ood system, it has created an indefinite variety f areas which overlap and clash with each other; would say that in my own parish we belong to ne area for the poor law, another for the high-ay, and another for the purposes of justice; we o to one town to pay our taxes, and we go to nother town to appeal against them.

1402. Have you any sanitary districts?—The oard of guardians are generally the sanitary uthorities.

1403. Are you acquainted with the way in which the country is apportioned or not appor-ioned for the purposes of arterial drainage?—Generally speaking, if there is no navigable iver, there is no arterial drainage in the country t all.

1404. I asked you if you thought the county would for all purposes be the largest area; do not you think that if England ever takes up the question of arterial drainage in a thorough man-ner, it will be necessary to form districts for certain purposes larger than counties?—It is possible that you may have to take up a river basin or something of that sort, which would ex-tend perhaps into several counties; but what I should like to see, if there is to be any re-arrangement is, that highways, poor laws, and the administration of justice, and, as far as possible, taxes, should all have one and the same area.

1405. You would think it desirable to have the unit such a unit as a man can ride to on his saddle-horse or drive to in his gig, for almost all purposes?—Yes, I would take a moderate-sized union as the unit.

1406. But do you also want a unit within reach of a man's own house, amongst his neighbours, as far as he can walk to, say a couple of miles for certain purposes, for instance, education which is coming on, do we not want a civil parish within convenient limits?—Yes.

1407. Is there not great inconvenience arising from the fact that the old parish we had originally sent their guardians and way wardens in certain proportions to those local boards, would it not be better to decide upon a reasonable size for the civil electoral district for purposes of guardians or way wardens, and then to group parishes with that view?—That is a very general question, and if all were properly arranged I should say, yes.

1408. With any such view, is it not desirable to endeavour to rectify the boundaries of parishes where, arising from ancient antiquarian causes, they are extremely inconvenient?—I do not see any objection to grouping two or three small parishes together, for the election of officers to the board.

1409. What population, on a rateable value, would you call a reasonable size for election of a way warden or a guardian?—A population, perhaps, we might say of 500 to elect one officer.

1410. Do you think that all boards would be better constituted if they were not obliged to send or to take almost the only man in the parish as a guardian?—I know that in some very small parishes in Norfolk it is extremely difficult to find a man who is willing to attend.

1411. Supposing that Parliament should decide to divide the rates between the owner and the occupier, it would be still more desirable to reconsider the electoral districts, would it not?—I should think it would.

1412. With regard to the existing engagements between landlord and tenant, supposing the case of a farm, the net rent of which is 200 l., but with 25 l. rates, which is on the scale of 2 s. 6 d. in the pound, and, supposing that Parliament were to decide that the rates should be paid half by the owner and half by the occupier, would it not be quite possible to provide, in such a case as that, that there should be an arrangement between the landlord and the tenant based on the existing system; because it is not to be supposed that the intention of Parliament would be to make the tenant a present of 12 l. 10 s. a year?—I think it would be undesirable to interfere with existing leases and agreements; and I am perfectly sure that in any fresh arrangement with the tenant, the tenant would come off worst.

1413. We will suppose it to be the case of a lease of 21 or 14 years, you would leave the existing arrangement untouched and leave the parties to settle as they please?—Yes, I would.

1414. But in case there was no lease, would you bring the new system into operation at once?—Not till they came to a fresh agreement as to rent.

1415. But then your law would be practically not acted upon?—Even in the Irish Land Bill, which some consider a revolutionary measure, you do not propose to interfere with existing agreements, except in very small farms.

1416. I mean where a man is renting by word of mouth or tenantry at will, and tenancy from year to year, you would surely not pass a law that the rate was to be paid one-half by the owner and one-half by the occupier, and leave them by a sort of tacit contract to contract themselves out of it, and evade the law, would you?—Take my own case; I have no agreement, I farm from year to year without a word being on paper of any sort or kind.

Mr. C. S. Read, M.P.

25 March 1870.

1417. Could not you very easily make an arrangement with your landlord to take the existing rate as the basis, and that if he paid one-half the rate, you would pay him whatever the amount might be in future as an addition to your rent; would that necessarily open the question of the value of your farm?—I should not wish to come to a fresh arrangement with my landlord.

1418. Chairman.] If a law were passed now that one-half the rate should be put upon the owner, do you expect that your owner would come upon you and ask for more rent?—Of course he would.

1419. Then he would disturb the existing agreement?—I think so.

1420. Mr. Acland.] Would there be any objection to adopting the principle of the income tax, that the tenant should pay half the rate, and the landlord half; the tenant to have the right to recover it from the landlord, and then leave it to the landlord and the tenant to settle it how they pleased?—You see the property tax and the cattle plague rate were both new changes, and they never previously entered into consideration in letting land, and therefore they are not similar.

1421. If I understand you aright, you would have a law passed in such a state that it would not be acted upon?—It would be gradually acted upon; I do not think that you can interfere with existing agreements and leases so as to have it become general all at once.

1422. Will you give us your opinion upon the best mode of electing the owners on those boards; we will begin with the highway board and the boards of guardians; how would you elect the owners on those boards?—I would have every owner of, say, 20 l. have one vote, and one vote for every 50 l. up to perhaps six votes, or something of that sort. Then, if you want a very small owner to have a voice in the matter, I do not see any reason why four or five of them should not club together so as to make one vote.

1423. Do you think that it would be politic in this country to pass a law giving all owners of 20 l. power to levy a tax on a small freeholder without giving this small freeholder a voice?—That is what I said, that I would allow four men that had 5 l. worth of property to club together and give one vote to the vestry.

1424. But supposing that to be thought very inconvenient and difficult of arrangement, you would not leave them without a vote, would you?—I do not see that it would be very difficult to arrange; it would prove that they did not care about the vote if they could not arrange matters between them.

1425. Have you considered the best mode of rating river basins or other districts in which great agricultural improvements may be made by drainage or otherwise?—That is generally done by Act of Parliament, and I do not think you can do it without some special Act to apply to a special district.

1426. One of the points which are referred to this Committee is the arrangement between owner and occupier; how would you apportion the improvement of a district between the two?—Generally speaking, I think all drainage rates in the fens are charged direct upon the owner.

1427. I understand you to be in favour of constituting financial boards, not on the basis of justices and ratepayers, but of owners and occupiers?—Yes.

1428. Supposing we are to have a county board representing equally the owners and the occupiers of the districts liable to county changes, whatever they may be, by what process would you elect the representative of the occupiers and owners?—I would have each board of guardians send one member for the occupiers, and the other for the owners.

1429. Do you advisedly say that you would intrust that duty to the board of guardians and not to the highway boards?—I do not care which, if they were both elected; I think in all probability they would be the same persons.

1430. Supposing that we had a rectification of our local areas, and that we had the same district both for poor administration and road administration, we should perhaps come to having one governing body for the whole; but we must assume at present that we have two distinct areas and two distinct bodies as between the relief of the poor and the construction and repair of the roads; which do you think is most closely connected with the county business?—As at present conducted, I suppose that the poor relief in consequence of the poor rate having to pay the county rate; otherwise, I should say, the highway board.

1431. Is there as close a relation between the relief of pauperism and the county administration as there is between it and the roads and bridges and prisons, and so on?—We have mixed up so many things with the poor rate that the actual relief of the poor constitutes but a small portion of it, and therefore I should say that the county boards would be better represented from courts of guardians than from the highway boards.

1432. Mr. Walter.] Should you not consider the whole of the rates which fall under the denomination of poor rates as a burden upon land subject to certain fluctuations of benefits, or of losses which fall upon the occupier, upon the person who directly employs them?—Yes.

1433. But with that qualification, you would consider it, would you not, a burden upon land paid by the owner of the land?—Yes.

1434. Do you consider that there is any difference in principle between local rates regarded in that point of view, and tithes?—Tithes are practically a fixed sum, and rates are not.

1435. But subject to the qualification of the rates being liable to certain fluctuations, more or less, and tithes being to a great extent, though not absolutely, a fixed charge, you do not consider that there is any distinction in principle between the incidence of tithes and the incidence of rates?—They are all burdens upon land.

1436. I presume that nobody supposes that tithes on land are really paid by the occupier, whatever the arrangement be between him and the owner?—No.

1437. In your county, is it the custom for the occupier, generally speaking, to pay the tithes, or does he compound with the owners for a higher rate in consideration of the owner paying the tithes?—Of late years it has been more the custom for the owner to pay the tithes, but a great number of farmers still pay the tithes direct to the clergyman.

1438. Looking

1438. Looking at the tithes as practically a ...ed charge, have the tenant farmers, do you ...ink, any preference for the payment of the ...thes themselves, or a composition with the ...vners?—I think that, as a rule, they would ...ther pay it all in one sum direct to the landlord, ...ecause amongst other things the parsons gene...lly expect payment on a day when the tithes ...e due, and the landlord always gives three ...onths' grace.

1439. Do you think that the tenants would, as ... rule, be desirous of compounding with the ...ndlords for the payment of all other charges ...sides the tithes, the poor rate, county rate, ...ghway rate, and so forth, and be willing to pay ... equivalent rent in consideration of that com...utation?—I think probably they would as rates ...ve so continuously increased.

1440. They would be willing, you think, to pay ... fixed rent, rather than to take the chance of the ...tes increasing?—Yes, but then the owners, ...ther than the occupiers, should spend the rates.

1441. The increase in that case would be ...rne by the landlord, would it not?—Yes, in ...at case the increase would be borne by the ...ndlord.

1442. Is it not difficult at present to make any ...ch arrangement with the tenant for the pay...ent of particular rates, in consequence of their ...ing so mixed up together that it is difficult to ...parate the one from the other?—Yes.

1443. Is it not desirable, in your opinion, with ...view to such an arrangement, to make a more ...mplete classification of the rates, so that tenants ...d landlords might mutually contract for the ...yment of such rates as they thought desirable ... be paid by the landlord?—I think it very neces...ry that we should know when we pay a rate ...at it is paid for. For instance, take the ...arter's poor rate, and say, it is 6 d. in the ...und; we do not know what portion belongs ... the county, what to the police, and what is ...tually paid to the poor; I think that there ...ght to be a classification.

1444. To what extent, if any, in your opinion ...es the liability to the payment of rates influence ...e employment of labour; I mean to what extent ...e tenants induced to keep men on longer than ...ey otherwise would, or are they to any extent ...duced to do so, in order to prevent their being ...rown upon the rates?—When every parish ...aintained its own poor, there was a certain in...cement for even a small farmer to keep on a ...an that he did not particularly want in the ...nter, but since we have had the Union Charge...ility Act, that has in a great measure been ...ne away with, and I think that the small ...rmers are more inclined to get rid of their ...bourers in the winter, the slack months of the ...ar, than they were formerly. But I do not ...ink that that would be extended now in conse...ence of your dividing the rates; and if I might ...y why I think so, it is because if you look at ...eland and Scotland, where the rates are divided, ...e fine the burden of the poor considerably less ...ere than it is with us, and I consider that our ...eat extravagance in out-door expenditure is the ...ief cause of our pauperism.

1445. In parishes where the landlord is resi...nt, and where the tenants throw people off in ...e winter months, is it usual for the landlord to ...ke any considerable number of those people, ...d find them temporary employment in order to ...ep them off the rates?—I do not know that ...ndlords do that more than some enterprising ...

tenants. There generally is a man in the parish who is an improving tenant, and he drains and grubs hedgerows and that sort of thing in the winter, and, of course, where he is a rich landed proprietor, he is trenching and planting, and felling timber, which is best done in the winter, and he employs the surplus labour. There has also a custom sprung up in our county, and I think everywhere else, of the steam-threshing machines going round in winter with large gangs of men, some 10 or 12, and they take off a good deal of the surplus labour in the winter; so that I think, generally, there are very few agricultural labourers out of employ in the winter.

1446. Mr. Corrance.] You have stated that the owners can command the increased rates in their present rents; could they command the best tenants at such an increased rate?—If the land had previously been rated at its extreme value, they could not.

1447. And they would be obliged, in fact, in the case of such increase, to take a worse tenant?—Yes.

1448. And the worse tenant would virtually constitute a worse offer for the farm?—Yes.

1449. So far the increase of rate would actually depreciate the value of the farm, at all events?—Yes.

1450. Is it not the case that when a farm is let the tenant always asks the amount of rates, and will abate his offer accordingly?—He invariably asks, what are the rent, the tithes, and the rates; and he makes his offer accordingly.

1451. Is it not then the case that if the rent is high, men of capital would decline to bid?—If the rent is too high, they would.

1452. But smaller men would bid?—Men of less capital, or of very hopeful temperament, might bid.

1453. Do you not think that this alienates capital from the farming occupation?—Yes.

1454. In answer to a question of the Right Honourable Chairman, you said that the increase of rateable value, as denoting increase of rent, might not, after all, constitute an increased burden if the value of the rateable property has in the meantime increased; of whom did you speak in that case, of the landlord or tenant, or to put it in this way, the rates have increased, but the value of rateable property has also increased; the increase of the value of rateable property depends upon the increase of the rents, and the rents may have been raised by simple competition; would you not consider that as constituting an increased burden, not upon the rental, or upon any portion of the produce, but upon the produce itself?—Yes.

1455. When a larger part of the gross produce is thus taken without a corresponding advantage?—Yes.

1456. It would then be a heavier burden upon produce, at all events?—Yes.

1457. When you spoke of the advantages accruing from the landlord directly paying his share of the rates, did you contemplate all rates?—Yes.

1458. Do you see no reason to exclude poor rate?—No.

1459. You have stated that under the operation of Union Chargeability Act, a small employer of labour is less anxious to keep all his men during the winter; is not that because the rate no longer falls upon him in the same proportion?—Yes.

1460. Do you entertain no apprehension that if the owner paid the rate, the same consequences might ensue?—I think they might be increased slightly.

25 March 1870.

1461. Would not precisely the same effect be produced on his mind by any relief of any kind whatever?—The same effect would not be produced upon his pocket, because now, if a man has a farm which is rated at 50 l., and he has to pay a labourer 12 s. a week, and does not want him, he turns him off, and if he goes upon the rates that small farmer bears perhaps only a thousandth part of the rate which would be increased by that man going upon it.

1462. That is under the Union Chargeability Act?—Yes.

1463. In case there was a division of such rates, it would only fall upon the half-a-thousandth part?—It would; but I do not think that that would be anything like the same inducement as the union chargebility was.

1464. At any rate, you have said that it might lead in some degree to a discharge of labour; would not you be apprehensive that that might lead to increased pauperism in the country?—As I said before, I believe that if you divide the rates you would get no economy, but probably a more generous and enlightened expenditure of them, and consequently increased rates.

1465. And a generous distribution of the rates includes increased pauperism as its results, does it not?—The main portion of the poor rates are not applied to the actual relief of paupers in these days.

1466. I am supposing only the poor rate; I have asked you whether you see no reason to except those poor rates from the operation of such a division as this, and whether you would not be apprehensive that this larger and more generous application of those rates might not lead to increased pauperism in this country?—I do not think it would be appreciable; I do not doubt that it would in a slight degree.

1467. Would not you esteem it a great evil if this was the result?—If you had increased pauperism, no doubt.

1468. In what sense did you use the word "generous" application of the rates?—I meant to say that the rates now-a-days are not applied exclusively, or in the great majority of instances, to the actual relief of destitution, that there are so many things that you have now charged upon the rates, we will say roads and buildings, and all those sort of things, which really have nothing to do with the maintenance of the poor. Even if you took the poor rate at 6 d. in the pound, how very little of that actually goes in the shape of direct payment to the poor; not one-third of it does.

1469. Mr. Walter.] Would your interpretation of the words "generous administration" apply more to medical relief, or to what kind of assistance?—I mean to more just and liberal expenditure of all the rates of the kingdom, independently of the actual relief to the poor.

1470. Mr. Corrance.] You have spoken of the election of owners by owners, and of occupiers by occupiers, and under such an arrangement you have spoken also of plurality of votes; would you not consider it a far better arrangement that one common body of ratepayers should elect both under separate qualifications?—I have only thown out the suggestion; I have made no definite plan in my own mind.

1471. You would entertain no objection, would you, to both being elected under separate qualifications, both as owner and as occupier by the same common body, which would obviate the antagonism between the two?—I think you might do that.

1472. And they would represent the common body of ratepayers at large?—In the country certainly they would; I do not know much about towns.

1473. Concerning the effect of such taxation when levied on the occupier class, is it not your opinion that it discourages the employment of capital thus brought under its incidence?—Yes.

1474. And that such capital will consequently seek out other trades?—Yes.

1475. You are of course aware that labour is dependent on capital, and must follow it into all the more productive fields of employment, and unless it does so, what would be the result, that is to say, supposing that capital is diminished in any one employment, what would be the result upon the labouring class employed?—They would have to go elsewhere for employment.

1476. Supposing that they do not go elsewhere for employment, and that being agricultural labourers they are not fit to go elsewhere, what would be the result?—They must either emigrate or come upon the rates.

1477. If the capital were insufficient for their employment, and they were still to remain in large numbers in that employment, would not the result be to depreciate the wages of labour?—Very probably.

1478. Then if more capital came into a trade or employment, the wages would rise, would they not?—Yes.

1479. To this, agriculture, I presume, forms no exception?—No.

1480. Then, to a certain extent, the low wages for agricutural labour is a consequence arising out of its peculiar burdens of this sort?—Yes, in a degree.

1481. Would a division of the burdens between landlord and tenant obviate this?—No.

1482. You stated, did you not, that you do not recognise a distinction between tithes and rates; is not there this distinction, that tithes are absolute property and rates are not?—I suppose that the question was put to me from a farmer's point of view, and not as a politician or political economist.

1483. Is not tithe simply a rent, neither more nor less?—Yes.

1484. And it is paid to the owner when the tithes are merged in it?—Yes.

1485. We have examples of that sort almost every year; does the tithes being merged tend in any way, do you think, to the advantage of the tenant who hires a farm?—No, I do not know that it does.

1486. Are they not generally valued at their full amount?—I think they are.

1487. Mr. W. H. Smith.] You have expressed an opinion, as to whether it is desirable that the rates should be paid by the owner or the occupier have you given any attention to the question o rates in large towns?—No.

1488. You have no scheme in your mind, I presume, by which any arrangement of that sor could be carried out in large towns, with regar to house property?—I would rather not talk o what I know nothing about; I have my idea upon the subject, but they would not be wort anything to the Committee.

1489. You have mentioned the Irish Poor Law in Ireland and Scotland the rates are paid by th owne owner and the occupier, and you attribute the smaller cost of the relief of the poor in Ireland and in Scotland to that system, do you not?—No, I beg your pardon; I only meant to say that that was an instance which I brought forward, to illustrate that it did not increase the rates.

1490. But are you aware that in Ireland, at all events, out-door relief is the exception and not the rule?—Yes, just so; and that is the main cause of there being so few paupers; I believe that in England we have one pauper in every 20; in Scotland 1 in 35; and in Ireland only 1 in 85, although they are so poor a people.

1491. So that you do not attribute the economy of the administration of the Irish Poor Law to the fact that the owner pays one-half the rates, and the occupier pays the other half; but rather to a difference in the law as it is applied in Ireland compared with England?—Certainly; the great reason, I consider, is the more stringent restriction of out-door relief in Ireland; that is to say, the workhouse test.

1492. Chairman.] Do you approve of the workhouse test?—Certainly.

1493. Mr. Backhouse.] If you divided the rates between the landlord and the tenant, how would you collect them, through the tenant, allowing him to deduct them from the landlord, or direct from the landlord?—Certainly in the Irish way, and not in the Scotch way; you should collect direct from the tenant only, and not make two collections.

1494. I think you said that part of the local taxation ought to be borne by the Imperial taxation; can you tell us what class of local taxation you think ought to be borne by the Imperial taxation?—I think that almost the whole of what is now called county rate ought to be paid by the Imperial taxation.

1495. What check would you have upon the extravagance of local management expending the Imperial funds?—We have a very strong check now upon the expenditure of the county, to which the Government contributes a little, because they have certain inspectors, and if you do not do what they tell you they threaten, and do sometimes stop the Government allowance. If you were to extend that very much indeed, so as to make a contribution of one-half towards the poor rates, I for one should not at all object that the chairman of the board of guardians should be a Government official.

1496. Do you think that it would be desirable that the poor rate for monies absolutely expended in the relief of the poor, should be specified as a rate separate from the other rates which are now added to it?—Yes.

1497. Mr. Birley.] In recommending a division of rates between owner and occupier, your object is the better administration of the rates, is it not?—Yes.

1498. I understood you to say, the other day, that you thought that the owners' representatives would look after many things better than the occupiers' representatives do, and that in other matters they would be more generous; that is to say, that several improvements which now are not done, in consequence of the owners having no direct interest, would then be carried out; is that what you mean by a more generous application of the rates?—Yes; and I have been told (I do not know whether it is so) that in some towns, boards of guardians, in consequence of the owners taking no interest whatever in the administration of the rates, are inclined to jobbery, and I think that you get a class of guardians that are open to that accusation. I do not think they would be so if you divided the rates as suggested. But I wish, if you please, to express my opinion generally, and to state that I have never said that I was so greatly in favour of dividing those rates. I have given reasons, I think, both for and against; but on the whole I think that it would be advisable.

1499. For the reasons that you have just stated?—Yes.

1500. And you think that, if there be any division, it should be one that should be simple, and easily understood, and it is for that reason, I presume, that you recommend an equal division, rather than placing certain rates upon the landlord and other rates upon the occupier?—Yes.

1501. Sir James Lawrence.] Reference was made just now by an honourable Member to the increase of rent, as having the effect of causing less capital to be employed upon the land; has not the rent in Norfolk increased very largely within the last 20 years?—In some districts it has; in other districts it has not.

1502. In those districts in which it has increased, has the effect been that less capital is employed?—The rent has been increased by the application of capital.

1503. Then, where the rent has been increased, the capital has not been lessened, but rather the employment of capital has increased upon the land where the rent has increased?—Where you have had the rent increased by a large expenditure of capital, of course the capital, which was personal property before it was placed on the land, has increased its value.

1504. Are you prepared to lay down any general rule, such as Mr. Corrance laid down, that an increase of rent necessarily involved the withdrawal of capital from land where the rent was so increased; has not the effect been exactly the contrary throughout the district of Norfolk?—If you hire land at 2*s.* 6*d.* an acre, and by improvements have to pay the rates upon an assessable value of 1*l.*, of course that is an increased capital. There has been land in Norfolk which has been increased within this century from 2*s.* 6*d.* an acre to 1*l.* an acre rent at the present time; but then, on the other hand, there is a large quantity of land that was farmed pretty well 30 years ago, and is farmed pretty well now, and it commands about the same rent.

1506. Excepting that the raising of rent has not driven capital away from the land on which rent has been so raised?—If you increase the value of land by the tenant's and the landlord's capital, it is worth more rent and of course more capital is required, not only to pay the rent, but to farm the land.

1507. You have stated that by the Union Chargeability Act the effect in some measure had been to throw more people out of employment during the winter, and you were asked what would be the effect if the owner paid half the poor rate, whether the tendency would not be in the same direction; the question I wish to put to you is this, whether the tendency would not be exactly the reverse; that if the owner were interested, which he would be more largely than the tenant, as holding perhaps much more land than some tenants would hold, would not his interest be that the people should be in employment rather than out of employment?—Yes; and the result would probably be that you would put two burthens upon the owner; you would first of all make him employ more labour and then pay more rates.

25 March 1870.

1508. With regard to the wages question, does the lowness of wages depend at all upon the burthens upon land; does not it depend entirely upon whether a larger number of labourers are seeking employment than employment can be found for them?—Not in agriculture generally; the price of labour depends more upon the value of wheat in the purely agricultural districts.

1509. Do you not know it was a fact that throughout Lincolnshire, for example, whenever the number of labourers has diminished the amount of wages has always risen?—I should think so, and so it would anywhere else, if labourers became really scarce.

1510. Then the rate of wages depends not altogether upon the peculiar burthens upon the land, but upon other circumstances?—Yes; but if you always have plenty of labourers it does not follow in the same proportion; you may have too many.

1511. You made some reference to Imperial taxation as superseding, so to speak, a portion of the local taxation; did I understand your answer rightly, when you stated that you believed the control which would be exercised by the Government in contributing a portion of the rates to the poor, as they do now to the police rate, by withholding at their will, the contribution would prevent any extravagant employment of those rates?—I think it would.

1512. You were asked if the amount of rates was always ascertained and considered in the offer made for the occupation of land; what difference can it make in the employment of capital if the tenant pays his rates in the form of rent to his landlord?—You must remember that in agriculture we change our tenancies very seldom indeed; and that in the majority of instances on the larger estates of this country, when once a man gets upon an estate, and he pays a fair rent, the landlord does not disturb him, and very frequently does not ask for any increase in the rent; consequently all that he can save out of the local burthens goes into the tenant's pocket, and all the increase has to be paid by the tenant.

1513. Colonel Brise.] I think you stated that the presence of ex-officio guardians is not always looked upon as being altogether pleasant or agreeable at boards of guardians; has not this reference mainly to interference on their part in the election of the officers of the board of guardians; which they are in the habit of attending only occasionally?—In some boards you have two or three ex-officio guardians who regularly come, and they are the most useful guardians upon the board; you may have some doctor to be elected, or some relieving officer that wants an appointment, and you get a whole shoal of ex-officio guardians to attend; but you do not see them any more until the next election; I would not confine that remark entirely to the ex-officio guardians, because a great many elected guardians are just as bad.

1514. But if the ex-officio guardians are regular in their attendance, and are known to take a general interest in the proceedings of the board, do they not always have a hearty welcome at the board?—Yes, all those that come regularly; they are always glad to see them.

1515. Do not you think that the presence of a preponderating number of owners, if they had half the representation for instance, would have a great tendency to increase the expenditure of the union?—I have said before that I should think it would have a tendency to increase it; but I do not think it would be so to any great amount. Gentlemen, generally speaking, might be more liberal than farmers; but if they had to pay for it perhaps, they would not.

1516. I think I understood you to say that, if half the rates were put upon the owner, the occupier would not derive any benefit at the end, but how would it be if the county rate only was put upon the owner; would that lead to any increase in the rent, do you think?—The effect would be that if the owner paid all the county rates you would not want any county financial boards.

1517. And that would be a benefit to the occupier in this way, would it not, that in all probability the increase would be so small upon the owner that he would not make any alteration in the rent?—Most probably not.

1518. Have you taken into consideration that if you put half the rates on the owners, and the owners had to increase their rent, the owners would have to pay increased taxation, income tax, inhabited house duty, and probably, also rates?—I should suppose that in that case you would allow a deduction of rates in the same way as you do land tax at the present time.

1519. I think you say that if an occupier asked for a reduction of rent, owing to the rates having increased, as a rule he does not succeed in obtaining it; is not this because landlords, when they let their farms make an agreement with the tenant to pay all rates and taxes, however fluctuating those rates may be?—I do not think that as a rule a tenant would go to the landlord to ask for a reduction of rent, but he would name it when they came to a fresh agreement, or a new tenant hired the farm.

1520. Mr. Pell.] Is there any land tax upon any land that you occupy of your own?—Yes.

1521. Is that collected from the tenant?—Yes; collected from the tenant, and paid by the landlord.

1522. Did you ever know a bargain between a landlord and tenant, that the land tax should be paid by the tenant, and not recouped to him?—Never. We have in some parts of Norfolk an exceptional rate, which is collected about once in seven years, I think, which is called a sea-breach rate, that is collected from the tenant, and paid by the owner.

1523. Does the tenant ever take upon himself so far as you are aware, the payment of that rate?—No, I never heard of it; it is an extremely irregular and fluctuating payment, sometimes it is very little, and sometimes it is rather heavy.

1524. In answer to question 1321, you stated in purely agricultural districts there has not been much advance in rent; is that really so?—I think I have answered that question before to-day; I mean to say this, that if there has been no extra application of capital to the land there has been but little increase in the value of arable land; but wherever there has been an increase in rent, it is almost all owing to the application of personal property to the cultivation of the land.

1525. The poor rate is a personal charge, is it not, that is to say, it is charged upon the tenant, and not recoverable upon the soil itself, like tithe?—No, it is not like tithe, they would seize a man's goods if he did not pay the poor rate.

1526. Is not a farmer assessed to the rates on his his rent, which is supposed to be double the amount of his profits?—Yes.

1527. Is there any other producer, trader, or manufacturer, rated in a similar manner, that you are aware of?—No, certainly not.

1528. The inland revenue officers assume that, do they not, in assessing the income tax?—We pay under schedule B. on half our rents.

1529. Do you know what the average ratio of poor-rates to profit is upon agriculture, or rather would not it be from what we have heard already about 25 per cent.?—It is about 11 per cent. upon his rent, and therefore it is about 22 per cent. upon his profits.

1530. I think that you stated, in answer to almost the first question put to you in your examination the other day, that the poor-rates were about 2 s. 6 d. in the pound in purely agricultural districts?—All the rates are 3 s. 4 d. throughout the whole of England and Wales, and our rates in Norfolk would be 2 s. 6 d. in the agricultural districts.

1531. Two shillings and sixpence in the pound is, as nearly as possible, 12 per cent., is it not?—Twelve and a half per cent.

1532. If the profits are equal to half the rent, which is assumed by the income-tax officers to be the case, the rates would then be 25 per cent. upon your profits, which would be double?—They would upon the farmer's profit. I believe that in America a hereditament is not assessed upon its annual value, but upon the profit which is supposed to be made out of it, consequently if we had that principle here, we should have a very different assessment of manufactories and land.

1533. Do you know the amount of capital employed in cultivating poor light land in Norfolk?—Yes.

1534. Is it not large, with reference to the natural value of the soil?—Yes.

1535. You have told us, have you not, that rents have risen very much in Norfolk this century from 2 s. 6 s. up to 1 l. an acre?—Yes. In some districts where great works in the shape of drainage have taken place, or in other districts, light land districts, where a very large expenditure, chiefly on the part of the tenant, has increased the letting value of the land.

1536. But in other districts, such as Marsh Land and good land in Norfolk, the rent has not much altered?—Where there has been no extra expenditure on the part of the landlord or the tenants, the rents have not risen very much.

1537. Then it comes to this, does it not, that in Norfolk rent has become very much a measure of the tenant's capital, or of capital successfully applied to the land?—The application of personal property to the land has raised the rent and the assessment.

1538. Does it not follow that the poor rate has almost become a direct tax or rate upon the capital employed in agriculture?—I should say so.

1539. And that in a very much larger proportion, at all events upon the poor land of Norfolk, than upon the good marsh land?—Certainly, because on those soils which now produce an immense amount of corn and meat, the rent is out of all proportion to the gross produce. It used to be considered in olden times a fair thing if a farmer made three rents, but if he does not make five rents on those light soil lands he could not live now.

1540. Therefore the rise in the assessment for rating purposes on poor land depends in Norfolk upon those poor lands upon the amount of capital laid out by the tenant?—By the tenant in a great measure, and the landlord in a smaller one. The landlord puts up the buildings, but if you do not get the tenant to put plenty of his capital into the land, the buildings are of no use.

1541. So that it comes to this, that you tax upon those poor lands the profit of the capital expended upon them at the rate of about 12 per cent.?—The income derived from every pound of personal property that a man puts into the land is taxed to the extent of 2 s. 6 d. in the pound.

1542. When you say that landlords have not felt the present increased local burdens as much as the tenants, would not their rents have increased if the rates had not been so high?—If they had let their lands at their full and extreme value, no doubt it would be so, but as I have said before the great landlords of England generally let them on a reasonable rent, and do not afterwards disturb the tenant, and consequently the tenant rather than the landlord feels the effects of increased rates.

1543. You have also said that the profits of farmers have diminished of late years; if so, how has it come to pass that the competition for the hiring of land has increased?—Independently of there being a great number of farmers' sons, there is an immense competition for land sprung up in consequence of rich traders and merchants sending some son who is good for nothing else, to take a farm, and he occupies his land really more with the idea of occupation and stowage than with the idea of making a fortune or earning his living.

1544. Have you been a guardian of the poor yourself?—Yes.

1545. For any length of time?—In different places I have been.

1546. Do you find yourself, from your own experience at the board, that there is a tendency to give more out-door relief than there used to be, and a less inclination to test a pauper by the house?—I think that there is a slight tendency since the Union Chargeability Act to give more out-door relief, and to be, I will not say, less harsh, but more generous in the out-door allowances for temporary sickness and medical orders.

1547. Do you look upon this as applying a rate in aid of wages, or has it led to it in practice, in your opinion?—I do not think that you can look upon it in the way of being a rate in aid, but there is no doubt that it has an immense influence upon the habits of the poor, and that if they could not so frequently run to the board of guardians on the most trivial occasions, and know that they would get out-door relief, they would be more provident than they are.

1548. Do you, from your own experience as a farmer, find this to be the case, that people who are in receipt of out-door relief are occupied very frequently in working their own allotments, and in doing trivial work of that sort, and thereby making a compound income, the result of their own labour and of that which is given them out of the rates?—I should say not as a rule; a man who would be utterly unable to go to work for a farmer for 10 hours in a day might very well work for half an hour at a time in his garden or allotment.

1549. Mr. Rathbone.] Did I rightly understand you to say that the usual calculation of a farmer is, that he ought to be making three rents to be doing a fair business?—I said that that was the old calculation.

25 March 1870.

1550. Do you think that that is about the calculation now?—No, I think that there are so many more expenses to which a farmer is put in these days that, unless he makes very considerably more than three rents, he would not get any profit at all.

1551. What do you mean by making three rents?—That his gross produce should be three rents.

1552. Have you made any calculation as to what, in the case of an ordinary farmer, not a very large or a very small one, would be considered a fair average profit for a farmer to make?—Ten per cent. is the supposed return on his capital invested.

1553. Independently of his living?—No, including his living; of course there are a great many small perquisites at a farm-house that are never calculated, such as eggs, milk, &c., but he would not make 10 per cent. and his living, and I may say that I never made 10 per cent. for two consecutive years in my life, but that may have been my fault perhaps from not farming properly.

1554. I think I understood you to say that you were in favour rather of dividing all the different rates between the owner and the occupier, than laying one rate upon the owner, and one on the occupier, and that it was advisable to do so in order to give each an interest in the rate and leave each to take his share of the administration?—Yes.

1555. And on the other hand, when you spoke of dividing the burdens between the Imperial taxation and the local taxation, did I rightly understand you to refer rather to the Government taking the whole of certain expenses, such as the county rate, than dividing the county rate and the poor rate between the Imperial and the local taxation?—I think that as at present administered, there are certain rates which the Government could take upon themselves without any fear of their being squandered; but there are others, for instance, the poor rate, with regard to which if the Government contributed one-half of the present outlay, they might want a more strict local supervision than now exists.

1556. But do you not think that it might be still better if the Government were only to give a certain fixed contribution to the different local expenditures, and leave the balance of such expenditure to be borne by the rates paid directly by those who elected such managers?—I should be very glad if they would give anything; if they would give a good large fixed sum it would be very much better than giving nothing. I should say that there are very great advantages in the plan which you have suggested.

1557. What, in your opinion, are the effects of high rates on poor lands; is it to throw them out of cultivation?—The effect of greatly increased rates and other burdens tend to throw that sort of land into grass.

1558. You proposed that the representatives of owners and occupiers on county boards should be chosen by the boards of guardians; would you propose that the whole board of guardians should choose the representative for the owners, and the whole board of guardians should choose the representative for the occupiers, or that the representatives on boards of guardians of owners and occupiers should each choose their own representative?—They should vote in classes.

1559. Mr. Fielden.] Do you mean that the owners should vote for the representative owner and the occupiers for the representative tenant?—Yes, the occupiers should select their representative and the owners theirs.

1560. Mr. Hunt.] Going back to the question that we started with at the commencement of your examination the other day, that is, how far rates are paid by owners and paid by occupiers, may we not consider that in one point of view all that the occupier pays for his land, whether in rent or rates, is that which is the annual value of the land to him, or what it is worth his while to give for the land?—Yes.

1561. And therefore, whether he pays it in the shape of rent, or in the shape of rates, it makes no difference?—Not if he pays a fixed sum, certainly not.

1562. Putting aside tithe, we may take it that what the occupier pays may be divided into two heads, rent and rates; at present the occupier pays the rent to the landlord, and he pays all the rates himself directly, does he not?—Yes.

1563. And you said to-day that if the landlord were required to pay half the rate, he would raise the rent upon the tenant?—I think he would.

1564. So that, supposing that alteration were made in the law, the tenant would pay just the same as he does now, only the difference would be that he would pay half the rate in the shape of additional rent to his landlord?—I should say that in all probability he would pay a trifle more.

1565. If the landlord had to pay half the rate, would he not on the next adjustment of his rent, take care to put on a sufficient amount to cover that half of the rate?—To quite cover it.

1566. In fact, he would go ahead of the fluctuation of the rate, and he would probably put on a little more than the tenant now pays in the shape of his half of the rate?—Yes; I said that if half the rate was 1 s. 8 d., in all probability, in order to make himself safe, he would charge 2 s.

1567. Do not you think that that shows that now the landlord really pays the rate?—No doubt he pays the rate, but he does not pay the increase.

1568. What I understand you to say is this, that between the times when there is a readjustment of rent, the fluctuation of the rate affects the tenant?—Yes.

1569. But whenever a farm is re-let or there is a readjustment of rent with the existing tenant then the alteration of rate affects the landlord?—If it is really perceptible; in the case of the abolition of compulsory church rates, which were very insignificant, I do not think that in consequence of their having been abolished in some parishes, the landlord would expect or ask for any more rent.

1570. But he would, would he not, when he had a new tenant?—If he could calculate to three halfpence, he would.

1571. If you were going to take a farm in a new parish, before you agreed with the landlord as to what rent you would be willing to pay, you would go and look at the rate-book, would you not?—Yes, of course I should.

1572. And you would make your offer or agreement according to what you found was the average verage amount of rate over a term of years?—Yes, exactly so; and I might say that I did so in the year 1865, when I took my present farm, and since then the rates have increased by the Union Assessment Act to 20 per cent.

1573. You told us the other day, that you had known some instances of alteration in rent in consequence of the Union Chargeability Act?—Very few, about two or three.

1574. Is that by way of increase of rent or diminution of rent?—One was in diminution, and two were in increase. In the first instance it made a very considerable difference in the rent, because it was a close parish before; it had no poor at all, and now it comes into the general fund of the union

1575. And in that case there was a diminution of rent, was there not?—In that one case there was a diminution of rent.

1576. Can you tell us to what extent?—I believe somewhere to about the extent of the increased rate, I should think about 2 s. per acre.

1577. Then under the existing law the tenant has the strongest interest in keeping down an increase of rate?—He has.

1578. To go to the division of the different kinds of rate which are now charged, with a view to see how those who administer the rate are able to keep it down, we will take the figures from this Supplemental Return on local taxation which I moved for in 1868. I am quoting now from the last memorandum which heads the Supplementary Return. The total amount levied for poor rate given is 11,061,502 l.; then that includes the sum raised for other purposes under those headings: county, hundred, and borough, police rates, highway boards, burial boards, commissioners of baths and washhouses, and fire brigade; the total of those being 3,226,632 l., leaving as the sum raised for poor rate proper, 7,834,870 l.; so that it is roughly as eight to three for poor rate proper, and therefore it is evident that that which is raised for poor rate proper is the main burden that is collected under the head of poor rate?—Yes, so far, but there are a great number of things collected under the poor rate proper that are not absolutely spent in the relief of destitution.

1579. We have taken out that which is levied for county, hundred, borough, and police purposes, for highway boards, burial boards, commissioners of baths and washhouses, and fire brigade, and you say that then there are other items which must also be deducted?—There are other items which must also be deducted. There are sanitary acts which come in the poor's rates which refer to the health of the district, and do not at all come under the head of relief to the poor in the country; such charges as the prosecution of vagrants, and things of that sort, and many establishment charges which are necessary no doubt for the administration of the poor law, but not for the actual relief.

1580. However, we may take it that the bulk of that sum is expended for poor relief?—Yes, certainly.

1581. Who can affect the expenditure most for poor relief, the occupier or the owner; at present, practically, it is the occupier who administers the poor law?—Yes.

1582. At present, you have told another Member of the Committee that it is in the power of the occupier, by discharging men at such times, to throw a great burden upon the rates?—It is in his power, but he very seldom makes use of it.

1583. I mean that the occupier, rather than the owner, is the great employer of labour?—Yes.

1584. Therefore, if you had a board composed half of owners and half of occupiers, the occupiers who are represented by the occupier part of the board would be the class who could affect the burdens much more than the owners?—They could increase the burdens.

1585. But there would be less inducement on the part of the occupier to keep down the charge, supposing half the rate was paid by the owner?—Yes.

1586. Just in the same way as under the Union Chargeability Act, there is less reluctance to increase the charge than there was before, so that if half the charge was thrown upon the owner, instead of upon the occupier, there would be less inducement to the occupier to keep down the charge?—Yes.

1587. How would you deal with the case of a large area of land, with only one owner, how would you have the owner represented in that case?—I would allow him to select his representative; supposing he was the proprietor of half a dozen parishes, I do not see any reason why he should not have half a dozen representatives; I would allow him to nominate anybody as his representative, he does not want to be an owner; I do not think that the representative of an owner must of necessity be an owner himself; I would allow him to be fixed upon anybody who resided in the district.

1588. You would allow him to have his nominees upon the boards?—Yes, I would.

1589. We have taken the case of the poor rate; now with regard to the county rate, do you consider that the county rate, including in that the police rate, would be more economically managed, supposing half the rate were thrown upon the owner?—No.

1590. Do you think that at the present time there is any extravagance in the administration of the county rate?—No, I think that the magistrates are so pressed by the ratepayers, generally speaking, that they are very careful.

1591. You think that the force of public opinion acts upon them?—I think that there is considerable force of public opinion upon them, and I believe that, if you had the ratepayers at the quarter sessions, you would find that there was no diminution of the county rate, but on the contrary a slight increase.

1592. Have you at all gone into the question of how far it is discretionary with the magistrates as to the charges which the county rate pays?—Their discretionary power I think is very trifling.

1593. Nearly the whole of the charges which they sanction is really forced upon them by Parliament, and by the action of the Imperial Government, is it not?—I believe that a very large proportion of it is.

1594. With regard to the police, it is so; is it not?—Yes.

1595. And with regard to lunatic asylums?—Yes, you have those irresponsible gentlemen, the Commissioners of Lunacy, I believe; and I do not know whether they are Government officials, or what they are.

1596. But that is under the Act of Parliament, is it not?—Yes, it is.

Mr. C. S. Read, M.P.

25 March 1870.

1597. And with regard to militia warehouses, the same?—Yes.

1598. And with regard to county bridges?—I do not know; I should have thought that that was very discretionary on the part of the magistrates, so that you keep them in repair.

1599. But they are bound by law to keep them in repair?—Yes, as they are to keep their own roads, and to maintain their own poor.

1600. And with regard to gaols, the same?—The dietary, and that sort of thing, is set forth by the Secretary of State.

1601. That is the administration of the law, as under the present Act?—Yes.

1602. And the Secretary of State, acting through the inspectors of prisons, can force expenditure upon the magistrates?—He can force it, and I believe he does.

1603. So that nearly the whole of the matters which come under the supervision of the magistrates, and required to be paid for out of the county rate, the magistrates have the very smallest margin of discretion in the matter?—They have a small amount of discretion, but at the same time with regard to salaries and certain expenditure, I think they have a good bit of discretion. For instance, whether you will build a gaol like a gaol, or whether you will build it like a palace, I believe is at the discretion of the magistrates.

1604. They have a certain amount of discretion as to the style of the buildings, and they have a certain amount of discretion as to the amount of salaries?—Yes.

1605. But generally speaking, you consider that the magistrates are not extravagant in their administration of county affairs?—I only speak from my knowledge of my own county. I have heard what evidence was given before a Committee here on county financial boards, and I should say that, as a rule, the expenditure of county magistrates would contrast favourably with the expenditure under many elective town councils.

1606. With regard to the incidence of the rate upon the occupiers, is it not the case that there are certain inequalities with regard to the county rate, that is to say, sometimes a heavier charge falls upon one year than upon another?—Yes.

1607. And in that case the incoming tenant or the outgoing tenant, as the case may be, may be dealt with unequally as regards his predecessor or successor?—Yes.

1608. Would that inequality as regards the tenants be got rid of if the whole of the county rate were thrown upon the owners?—Yes.

1609. Which would be the preferable mode of dealing with the question; to throw the county rate upon the owners entirely, or to have representatives of the ratepayers at a county board?—I am looking forward to the time when we shall have a better system of county management altogether, or rather, a more extended one, and that we shall have several things put under one general county board, such as turnpikes and the like, and therefore I say that you ought to have an elective board.

1610. Your view is, that you would have a county board for many other purposes than those for which the magistrates assemble at quarter sessions on the day of county business?—Yes.

1611. But apart from that, and until you get such a system, do you think there would be any advantage in having representative ratepayers at county boards?—I do not think that you would get any important advantage to the ratepayers, but you must satisfy the people.

1612. The next important item of expense is for highways; the highway board is now composed partly of ratepayers and partly of magistrates, is it not?—Yes.

1613. Do you find that the constitution of those highway boards works satisfactorily?—We have not any of those boards in Norfolk; we tried them once, but we would not have them again; we had one in our county, but we dissolved it.

1614. Then you have no experience of them?—No practical experience.

1615. Do you remember why you got rid of them?—Because the expenses were greater and the roads no better.

1616. Would you like to see that extended?—No, but I should like to see it certainly differently arranged from what it is now, and, if possible, I should like to have the districts the same as poor-law divisions.

1617. At present, though there is a highway board, yet each parish is liable for the repairs of the roads within its own limits?—Yes.

1618. Should you like to see the repairs of roads thrown upon a district rate?—Certainly, directly, as soon as you get a highway board; I do not see any reason why you should have the poor rate upon the union and should not have the highway rate in the same way.

1619. You cannot tell us, as regards expenditure, whether the present system provides a check upon extravagance?—I believe that, generally speaking, whenever you take the management away from the individual parish and place it in a board, although you may have a somewhat better expenditure, you always have an increased expenditure.

1620. Things are done better but they cost more; is that what you mean?—They may be done better, but they certainly cost more.

1621. You have told us that the ex officio guardians attend very irregularly; that is to say, that an elected guardian charges himself with the duty of going into details upon matters, and furnishing information to the board about his own parish, but the ex officio guardians do not charge themselves with that duty and they attend very capriciously?—They do.

1622. Do you think that when they do attend, their attendance tends at all to increase the expenditure of the board?—I think, as a rule, they are more liberally inclined.

1623. Is it the case that since the Union Chargeability Act has passed there is a worse attendance at boards of guardians than there used to be?—Yes, worse; the business is left more entirely to about 10 or a dozen men.

1624. Before that Act was passed the guardian of every parish attended, did he not, to see that there was not a greater charge than he thought was right put upon his parish?—If he had a case which he thought required the attention of the board he was sure to be there, but now he says, "Well, it is of no consequence whether a widow gets 2 s. 6 d. or 3 s., so I shall not go there."

1625. Under the former state of the law, such things might directly affect his pocket to a considerable extent, might they not?—Yes.

1626. But under the present law the charge is spread over a larger area, and he does not fear the the burden, and therefore there is not the same inducement to him to go?—Yes, just so; but that is not to any very great extent.

1627. Do you think that that would be the case with regard to highways, supposing the highway rate were thrown over a district?—The highway rate is rather different; for instance, the highway rate expenditure must be certified and come through the surveyor of the district, and it would have to be submitted to a board, and I do not think that in all probability there would be quite so much indifference to the expenditure.

1628. You think that there would be less danger of extravagance in highway matters than in poor-law matters?—Yes, I think there would; I think that if you were to divide the highway rates between the owner and the occupier there would certainly be an increased expenditure for highways.

1629. Is not it the case that the owner, generally speaking, using a different kind of vehicle on the roads, is anxious for a better state of the roads than the occupier?—Yes, certainly.

1630. And that the effect of their presence in great numbers, on highway boards, would be to cause greater expense upon the roads?—I think that you would certainly get better roads; but in addition to the actual repair of the roads I think there are many improvements, such as making a hard road, or building a bridge, which the occupiers would now fight against; that they would not mind if the expense was shared by the owners.

1631. At present the county pays for the bridges, and the roads are paid for by each parish, and you propose that the roads should be paid for by a district; would you propose that the bridges should also be paid for by a district, or left for the jurisdiction of a county board?—I think that where there are some great thoroughfare roads through the country as well as some very large bridges, they ought to come under the larger authority of the county.

1632. You would propose to make a distinction between different roads and bridges?—Yes, both as regards roads and bridges.

1633. You would take the main arterial roads through a county, and throw them, would you not, upon the larger authority?—Yes, if you are going to abolish turnpikes.

1634. With regard to bridges, would you make the same distinction?—Yes, I think I should. I think there are some bridges which would be hard to throw upon a small district.

1635. Is not a bad road a dear road; sometimes are not occupiers not sufficiently alive to that fact?—A road may be a very bad road for those little trumpery basket carriages that are so much used, but it would not be a very bad road for a very heavy tumbril.

1636. What I understand is this, that very expensive bridges you would still throw upon the area of the county, and also the maintenance of the great arterial roads?—Yes.

1637. But as regards the minor bridges and the common highways, you would throw the expense of both of those upon the smaller area?—I would.

1638. With regard to what should be the extent of highway districts, do you think that a county would be too large an area to throw the administration of the highways upon?—Yes.

1639. Is this your reason, because, do you think that there would not be sufficient check upon extravagance?—I do not think that there would be sufficient local knowledge in a county to prevent extravagance.

1640. With regard to a rate for the purpose of repairing ordinary highways and minor bridges, you think, do you not, that that rate should be divided between owner and occupier?—I would simply say that I have not formed any very decided opinion one way or the other; I say that if you are going to divide and alter the rates, you should divide them all.

1641. Would you not make a distinction with regard to the county rate?—I have said before, with regard to the county rate as it now stands, that it seems to me that the administration of justice is more an Imperial than a local question, and therefore the main part of it ought to be paid by the Government.

1642. But with regard to that which is paid out of local rates, do you consider that it would be possible to separate the financial administration of a county from the magisterial administration?—It might be done, but it would not be worth while, I think, it is so small.

1643. Supposing that a county board were to administer the finance of a county, would it be possible to confine the administration of the police, for instance, to the magistrates?—Yes, I think it would.

1644. Is not it a general rule that he who pays is the master?—Yes, except that the magistrates are the masters now, and they do not pay.

1645. Supposing the magistrates thought that the number of the police ought to be increased, and the county board declined to find the money, the county board would virtually be the masters of the position, would they not?—They would be in exactly the same position as the town council are now with respect to the justices of the peace in boroughs.

1646. There is a police committee, is there not, in the town council of a borough?—I dare say there is.

1647. Are they not considered to be the masters of the police in the borough?—I should have thought not; I should have thought that the magistrates were, as they are, responsible for the peace of the borough, and it must be remembered that you would always have the great check of the Government Grant with regard to the police.

1648. When you speak of a check, you mean a controlling power, but we do not find it much of a check, do we?—Perhaps not; but I mean this, that if your police are not efficient, you would not get the grant from the Government, and consequently you would hold a very strong rod over a financial board that was inclined to be stingy.

1649. That is to say, there would always be sufficient inducement by reason of the Government Grant to a financial board to find sufficient money for the purposes of the police?—Yes; to keep the force in efficiency and up to the Government standard.

1650. With regard to gaols, would you have the questions of the salaries of the gaol officers given over to the county board?—Yes; I suppose so.

1651. In that case the gaol officers would look to the county board as their masters, and not to the magistrates; would not that weaken the authority of the magistrates over those gaol officers?

Mr. C. S. Read, M.P.

25 March 1870.

officers?—I suppose you would have a committee specially appointed by the county financial board. You would not have 50 or 60 people to run about the gaols, but you would have a small committee who would represent the committee of the magistrates now.

1652. But would it not be the case in all these matters, the gaols and so on, that the control would pass from the hands of the magistrates to the county board; would not that be the effect of it?—I suppose it would.

1653. You would like to see these county boards manage all those matters which we have lately been speaking of, and also the county bridges and the main roads through a county?—Yes.

1654. And would you give them any directions with regard to assessment?—I should like them to be a sort of court of appeal for assessments. I should also like them to be a sort of court of appeal for sanitary purposes. I do not think that you can have sanitary matters conducted by a county, but there ought to be some large county authority to which individuals could appeal against the decisions or against the shortcomings of the union board.

1655. Mr. Acland.] You say that you do not think that those things could be managed by a county, but yet you think there should be a county authority; would you explain what you mean?—I mean that you could not by any possibility have a great county board look after every nuisance that occurred in a village; such things should be under the jurisdiction of the union, or the smaller division; but that you should have a large county board to which people might appeal if they thought that the local authority had not done its duty, or had exceeded its duty.

1656. Mr. Walter.] In answer to the Right honourable Chairman, you stated that you thought the strict enforcement of the workhouse test was the right way for administering of the poor law; do you apply that to the case of the able-bodied poor or to the poor in general?—Certainly in the case of able-bodied people, and I think that it might more generally be applied in some other cases.

1657. Do any able-bodied poor in your union receive out-door relief?—None.

1658. Are there many able-bodied poor in the workhouse?—There are perhaps in winter from eight to ten on an average that are classed as able-bodied men, but I should say that out of that number six or eight of them were what I call ¾-men, or partially disabled.

1659. What class of men receive out-door relief at present, is it not chiefly given for the support of elderly people, women, and children, and medical relief?—For old people and children, but what I particularly object to is the way in which we guardians administer the poor law in giving temporary relief and temporary medical assistance. A man has four children; he knows perfectly well that in nine months he is going to have another, and he comes up to the board of guardians for medical relief for his wife during her confinement; and in nine cases out of ten the guardians grant it, and they also allow in that case a nurse besides.

1660. Has the practice of benefit societies, and sick-poor relief societies, extended much in Norfolk?—Not to the extent that I could wish, and I am quite sure of this, that if it were not for the large amount of out-door relief, they would increase in a very much greater proportion.

1661. Mr. Fielden.] Does not the strict enforcement of the strict workhouse test tend, in your opinion, to increase vagrancy?—I do not think it would in agricultural districts; I daresay in towns it might.

1662. Mr. Corrance.] You have spoken of the magistrates as exercising sufficient supervision over the expenditure of the rates; I presume you only speak of the rates over which they themselves, without the interference of the Government officers, have the control?—Yes.

1663. Are you satisfied with the check that the magistrates are accustomed to exercise at quarter sessions, as to the requirements imposed upon them by the Government officers?—I find that some county magistrates resist the orders of the Government, and somehow or other they manage to escape, whilst another county adopts them without any objection.

1664. Do you think that as a body the magistrates are at present a wholesome check to further expenses of that sort?—I should say not; but my experience as a magistrate is so extremely limited that I would rather not answer the question.

1665. Do not you think that a financial board possessing a more popular element would present greater resistance to any such increase of expenditure?—No doubt.

1666. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Will you tell the Committee to what cause you attribute the failure of the highway boards in Norfolk?—We had but one highway board in Norfolk; I would say that we have a very good subsoil, and we have plenty of materials handy, and generally speaking our highway rates are exceedingly low. The working expenses of the highway board approached 50 per cent. of the original cost of the highway rates, and then you had a surveyor to look over 200 miles of roads, and unless the way wardens would undertake to do his work, it was impossible for him to give supervision to the labourers that he employed upon the roads.

1667. Then it comes to this, that the increase of expense was not attended with a commensurate improvement in the condition of the roads, and therefore you gave it up?—Precisely so; we had very good roads before, and I do not think that they were any better for the increased expense.

1668. Chairman.] You said in answer to a Right honourable Member, that the occupier pays the fluctuations, but that the owner pays the rate?—Yes.

1669. Out of the 2 s. 6 d., which is the aggregate of the rates in Norfolk, how much would you consider to be the rate?—You must take every individual farm in that case.

1670. But on the aggregate, in Norfolk, how much of that 2 s. 6 d. represents an increase during the last 20 or 30 years?—Somewhere between 6 d. and 8 d., I should say.

1671. Therefore you would put it quite roughly in this way, that the leases on the agreements were based upon a rate of 2 s.?—Yes.

1672. And that 6 d. comes out of the occupier's pocket?—Yes, the 6 d. comes out of the occupier's pocket.

1673. Taking it quite roughly, the 2 s. would come out of the owner's pocket, and the 6 d. out of the occupier's?—Yes, but that is a rough guess, of course.

1674. The owner pays what you may call the old stationary rate, and the increase is borne by the occupier?—Yes; but in addition to the actual increase of rate, there has also been a considerable increase of assessment, which really does not represent any increased value, but merely a more just and full value.

1675. But before the year 1834, your rates were higher than they are now; were they not?—In some parishes they were fearful; and I have heard of some land being taken in those days, simply for the payment of the rates.

1676. When you were examined by an honourable Member, and it was put to you that there was 2*s*. 6*d*. in the pound upon the farmer's profits, that statement must be modified, as I understand, because it was not upon the farmer's profits; but you have acknowledged that 2*s*., or some smaller sum than 2*s*. 6*d*. comes out of the owner's pocket?—I did not understand the question to be put to me as to the actual amount of deduction from his profit that the farmer pays in the shape of rates, but that the rates were 11 or 12 per cent. upon the rent, and consequently they were about 20 or 25 per cent. upon the farmer's profits.

1677. But they do not diminish his profits by that amount, because they do not come out of his pocket at all, except so far as the fluctuations are concerned?—If he did not pay the rates he would, of course, pay more rent.

1678. So that the analogy between such an enormous tax upon the farmer's profits as compared with the manufacturer's profits, does not quite represent the case?—It does not represent the actual money payment, no doubt.

1680. It comes, does it not, to that which has been put to you several times over, that the bulk of the rate, so far as there is no increase, comes from the owner, and therefore it is a hardship upon him, if it be a hardship at all, but the hardship upon the occupier is limited to the increase and to the fluctuations?—Yes. A man takes a a farm on a 21 years' lease, and he rents it at 10*s*. an acre; he drains it, he farms it thoroughly well, and he increases the value of it to 1*l*. an acre, and perhaps he does that in two or three years. The very moment that he has done that, down comes the assessment committee and puts him up to 1*l*. an acre, and therefore in that case it is a very considerable burden upon him, and discourages the application of capital to the soil.

1681. Then, as regards a change in the law, and the placing of a portion upon the owner, you were asked certain questions as to existing leases; would you consider it necessary to enact that in the case of existing leases, would you consider it necessary to enact that in the case of existing leases the occupier should continue to pay the rates until the expiration of the lease?—Yes, I think so.

1682. Did I rightly understand you to say that you would extend it to agreements not under lease, to what you may call yearly tenancies?—Yes, I should; just the same as is proposed to be done with the Irish Land Bill.

1683. Till then you would exempt the case of yearly tenancies, and say that the occupier should continue to pay the rates till there was a change, or could you put into shape your idea upon that point?—I mean that until there is a re-arrangement of rent, I would allow matters to be as they are. I would not force a re-arrangement of rent, because if you are going to make the owner pay one-half, you must, as a matter of justice to the owner, make him also re-arrange the rent.

1684. But he would be able to re-arrange the rent if it were a yearly tenancy, would he not?—Yes, he would; but at the same time I, as a tenant, should not like it.

1685. But with regard to the way in which that could be put into an Act of Parliament, in the first instance, in the case of leases you would enact that there should be no change, but that the occupier should continue to pay rates, and then you say that in the case of yearly tenancies you would also stipulate that the occupier should continue to pay them until there was a change in what?—Until there was a re-arrangement of rent.

1686. When would the law come into effect?—When there was a re-arrangement of rent.

1687. Therefore, you would have this state of things, that the great majority of the holdings would continue under the old arrangement, and only as new leases were made on new arrangements of rent, the new state of things would come in?—Yes, it would be gradual.

1688. Then, would it not be very difficult to carry out arrangements for the administration that you have suggested; would you not give the owner, who would be rated, a voice in the matter?—I quite see the force of that; so far as regards the election of proprietors there would be a grave objection.

1689. I am afraid that the landlords throughout the country might take advantage of the change in the law in order to raise the rents generally, and in any change of rent you think that the occupier would be likely to have a disadvantage at the present moment if matters were disturbed?—Yes.

1690. That must be, must it not, from the feeling that the rents might be raised; but on the whole, if there is any disturbance of the rent it is more likely to be upwards than downwards?—I say that there is no doubt that the owner would, in order to make himself safe, put on rather more than the half rate in the shape of rent.

1691. And that the margin of the profit of the tenant is great enough to bear that at present, without capital being drawn out from agriculture?—The real truth is that the greater portion of the land that is let in England, is not let at its extreme value, and therefore the tenant might afford to pay for it.

1692. So that, notwithstanding the theory that was expressed by an honourable Member, that the rates are lowering the amount of capital that is put into the land, and which is engaged upon farming, it has not yet had the effect of at all lessening the competition for farms?—It has not yet had the effect of at all lessening the competition for farms, but it has had the effect, no doubt, of decreasing the tenants' profits.

1693. I understand you to say that you are afraid to disturb the present state of things, because if there were a disturbance the tenants would be more or less at the mercy of the landlords, and the landlords would put the screw on?—I don't say they would put the screw on; I have never never yet discovered that they are at all inclined to take any advantage of a reduction, but when they have to make payments out of their own pockets they naturally wish to be recouped, and they take very good care that they are recouped in full.

25 March 1870.

1694. Do you admit that, although at present the owners are paying the old rate, their position is such that they can prevent the imposition of any new rate, and can shift it on to the tenants?—Yes; any new rate, or any increase of rate.

1695. Do you know of any application of capital to rateable property which is not subject to the hardship of being rated on the increased value; if it is successful in its application?—Of course, if you build a cottage, or if it was a very bad one before, and you make it a good one, you have to pay increased rates upon it; but I do not know of any other interest in which there are such slight profits and such heavy rates as the agricultural interests.

1696. That is to say, you put the poundage rates upon the agricultural profits, as I understand, whereas you have stated before that it merely comes out of the owner, who is not a trader at all?—I look at the owner and the occupier as being in partnership in a great measure, and not to have two separate distinct interests.

1698. He receives and has received his rents subject, from time immemorial, to certain charges?—Yes.

1699. Those charges were higher before 1834 than they are now?—Certainly the poor rates were.

1700. Therefore one of the partners in the joint partnership, at all events, is not worse off now than he was before?—If you mean the owner, he certainly is not worse off; but at the same time, I think that in the general prosperity of the country he would have increased his income more if he were not burdened by those rates.

1701. Mr. Acland.] You have admitted, as I understand, that the landowner is in no sense a trader; is it not a fact that a landowner, whether he lets his farm or whether he farms his own land, is a trader so far as this, that if he makes a heavy investment in the form of building or draining he ought to get a return for it; to that extent he is a trader, is he not?—He is an improver; I do not know whether he is a trader.

1702. Is it not the fact that yeomen who farm their own land feel very acutely this difficulty, that if they improve their own property, immediately their rates are increased?—Yes, exactly; and in the east of Norfolk we have a very considerable body of yeomanry who farm their own land, and by no possibility would they be benefitted by this division of rates. There are also the tithe owners and the clergy who would receive no benefit.

1703. Does your experience lead you to think that thus far an increased rate on the improved value of land prevents yeomen farming their own land, from making the best of it by investing capital in the improvement of their buildings, or in draining, or in any other way?—I think it has a certain deterring influence, but I would not say that it is to any very great extent.

1704. Mr. Brise.] I think I understood you to say that 6*d.* out of the 2*s.* 6*d.* in your own county falls upon the occupier, did you refer to the occupier merely or to the holder under lease?—No, it is applicable to annual tenancies; I will take my own case; I do not suppose that there will be any increase of rent till I quit the farm, and then somebody else will pay it.

1705. But that is an exceptional case, is it not?—No, I do not think it is an exceptional case. I think that in the great majority of large estates in England, if a man gets on to them, and pays a fair rent, there is no increase of rent for many years.

1706. It is as good as a lease, in fact?—Yes.

Mr. JOHN LAMBERT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Lambert.

1707. Chairman.] YOU have had great experience of rating with connection with the Poor Law Board for some years, I think?—Yes, considerable experience.

1708. Have you given your attention to the law of rating in Scotland and Ireland?—Yes, I have.

1709. In both those countries the system of dividing the rates between owner and occupier is different, is it not, from what it is in England?—Yes, it is.

1710. Both countries recognise the rating of the owner to a certain extent?—Yes; a deduction from the rent of a portion of the rate paid by the occupier.

1711. They acknowledge the principle that a certain portion of the rates comes out of the owner's pocket either by rating him directly, or by rating him through the tenant, who may deduct it from the rent?—Quite so; but I think, it would be better that I should state to the Committee that in Ireland half the poor rate is deducted by the occupier from the owner; but with regard to the county cess, which is paid by the occupier, no portion whatever is deducted from the owner. In Scotland, under certain circumstances, one half of the poor rate is deducted from the owner; but with regard to the county cess, the whole of it is paid by the owner.

1712. We will take Ireland first; who make the poor rates in Ireland?—The guardians make the poor rates, upon the basis of the Government valuation, known as Sir Richard Griffiths' valuation.

1713. According to what kind of divisions?—Each union in Ireland is composed of electoral divisions, and each electorial division is composed of one or more town lands; the electoral divisions may be said to correspond somewhat with our parishes, before the passing of the Union Chargeability Act, because the costs of the relief of the poor of each particular electoral division are borne by that electoral division.

1714. They have no union rating in Ireland?—No; except for salaries and establishment charges, and the wandering poor.

1715. Do the electoral divisions correspond more or less in size to our parishes or are they much larger or smaller?—The electoral divisions, as regards size vary considerably, but they are, in many instances, larger than some of our parishes.

1716. In making the rate do the guardians have regard to the amount chargeable on each electoral division?—Yes, and a separate rate is assessed on each electoral division in order to meet the expense of the poor of that division, and also the establishment charges of the union generally.

1717. There are certain establishment charges on the union, but the poor are charged to their own parishes?—Yes, as formerly was the case here according to the electoral division in which the people reside.

1718. Who makes out the rate?—The clerk to the guardians makes out the rate. He makes it out upon Griffiths' valuation. Upon the certificate of the clerk the guardians generally approve the rate and sign it; and then it becomes a legal rate and can be enforced by law.

1719. Who is it that pays the poor rate?—The occupier pays poor rate in every case except with regard to property of a less annual value, and not exceeding 4 l. a year. In that case the whole rate is charged upon the owner. There is a provision enabling the owner of property of a value less than 5 l. to enter into an agreement with the guardians to pay the rate for the occupier. And by a provision in a subsequent Act of Parliament that is extended to all property above 5 l.; but in the case of property which is of the exact value of 5 l., the owner is prevented entirely from entering into any such arrangement.

1720. Is there any limit otherwise, either upward or downward, as regards the owner entering into an arrangement to pay the rate?—No; but it must be done with the consent of the guardians, and the occupier may at any time claim to be rated if he thinks proper to do so.

1721. What are the provisions as regards the deduction of the rate from the rent?—The provision is that the occupier shall be entitled to deduct one-half of the rate paid by him from the rent. In the original Poor Act there was an express provision precluding the occupier from entering into an agreement with the owner to pay the whole of the rate; but that provision has been repealed by a subsequent Act, and he may now enter into an agreement, if he chooses to do so, to pay the whole rate; but, as a rule, in Ireland half the rate is deducted from the owner.

1722. Have you got the clause which forbids agreements to forego deductions for rate from the rent?—It was the 77th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, which provides, "That any covenant or agreement whereby any person liable to pay rent and entitled under the provisions of this Act to deduct therefrom any rate or portion of rate, shall have covenanted or agreed on, shall hereafter covenant or agree to forego, such deduction shall so far as such rate is concerned be of no effect."

1723. Then that was similar, was it not, to the enactment in this country as regards income tax?—Yes, and it was repealed by the 12th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 104, except as to any covenant or agreement entered into prior to the date of the Act.

1724. Do you happen to know the circumstances which led to the repeal of that clause?—No, I do not.

1725. Is it an Act for other purposes in which this is an incidental clause?—The Act which repealed that clause contains a number of other provisions which refer to the relief of the poor. It is the second Irish Poor Law Amendment Act.

1726. Then an agreement not to deduct the rate from the rent can at present be lawfully made?—It can at present be lawfully made.

1727. But, as far as your information goes, little advantage is taken of that repeal, and the tenants continue to deduct half the rate from the landlord?—Yes; I believe it is the general practice.

1728. Is a receipt for the whole rate taken in discharge of an equivalent amount of rent?—It is taken as part payment, and the Act of Parliament provides that it shall be. The landlord is bound to accept the receipt for the poor rate as an equivalent for the payment of so much rent.

1729. But this reduction is not known as regards the county cess?—No, the occupier is not entitled to deduct any portion of the county cess from the owner; I should state also that, with regard to the county cess, the occupier is made chargeable down to the lowest amount of value.

1730. The poor rate is only charged down to 4 l.?—Yes, that is so, but the county cess is charged upon the lowest occupiers, and collected from them.

1731. The amount, therefore, must be exceedingly small in many places?—Yes, very small.

1732. Mere shillings almost?—Very small, indeed.

1733. Mr. Hunt.] By whom is the county cess collected?—It is collected by a collector appointed for the barony by the grand jury.

1734. Chairman.] Do you happen to know the total amount of the county cess?—The net amount of presentments for the year 1867, was 1,083,000 l.

1735. That is considerably higher, is it not, in proportion to the rateable value of Ireland than the county rate of England?—Yes.

1736. Can you tell us how much in the pound the county cess is on the rateable value of Ireland?—I think the rateable value of Ireland is about 14,000,000 l. at the present time, according to Griffiths' valuation.

1737. And this would be roughly, 1,000,000 l. upon 14,000,000 l.?—Yes, it is 1,083,000 l.; I am quoting the figures of 1867.

1738. That would be about 1 s. 6 d. in the pound, would it not?—Yes, about that.

1739. The county cess includes, does it not, a great many more things in Ireland, than the county rate in England does?—Yes, the county cess in Ireland, includes charges for new roads, for repair of roads, bridges, quay walls, cutting down hills, or filling up hollows and ditches, the expenses of quarter sessions houses, erection and repairs of gaols, bridewells, and all the other prison bridewell expenses, including salaries of police and police establishments, and salaries of county officers, and besides these, public charities to the extent of 92,000 l.; also the repayment of advances to Government, 105,000 l. and miscellaneous charges, 96,000 l.

1740. One respect in which it seems to differ mainly from the English county rate, is that it includes highway rates?—It includes highway rates, the whole expense of maintaining the public roads in Ireland is borne by the county.

1741. And it includes a portion of the police, which, in England, is partly raised by a police rate?—It includes the police establishments, and the establishments for the constabulary.

25 March 1870.

1742. There is no highway rate, I believe in Ireland?—There is no highway rate, in Ireland; originally, the charge for the police was upon the county cess, and the year 1830 the charge amounted to 128,000 l., but in 1867 the charge for the police borne by the county cess was only 15,000 l.

1743. Will you state the amount of poor rate levied in Ireland?—The amount of poor rate expenditure in 1868 was 829,000.

1744. Speaking very roughly, the county cess is a little more than the poor rate?—It is about 250,000 l. more.

1745. The county rate is levied only upon the occupier, whereas the poor rate is taken half from the owner, and half from the occupier?—Yes, that is so.

1746. Therefore the owner would pay about one-fourth of the whole of the rates?—Yes, somewhat less.

1747. Are there any other rates in Ireland with which you are acquainted?—In the towns there are improvement rates, and, in some instances, borough rates. The Sanitary Act of 1866 has been extended to Ireland, and there are some rates levied under it, but I am not prepared to say to what amount.

1748. Would you be prepared to say whether in those cases, they are levied from the landlord or from the tenant?—The incidence is the same as in England. If I remember rightly, it is charged upon the occupier, and not deducted by him except in those cases where the rate may be deducted under the English law from the owner.

1749. As regards the borough rate, the occupier has got the power of deduction?—No, they levy it from the occupier.

1750. Then the poor rate is the only large rate to which this deduction applies?—Yes, that is so.

1751. Will you state, with regard to boards of guardians who administer the poor rate, what representation, if any, has been given to the owners?—The owners are entitled to vote for the election of guardians according to a certain scale. The 81st section of the 1st and 2nd of Victoria, chapter 56, provides that an owner may vote, if he contributes to the rate in respect of his property; it is necessary that he should contribute to the rate in respect of his property. The words of the section are, "And in the case of a person receiving rent and contributing rate in respect thereof, the number of votes is to be computed and allowed according to the net amount of the rent received by him after deducting therefrom all rent which he may be liable to pay, and in respect of which he may be entitled to deduct from the rate contributed."

1752. Does that point to the fact that the sublessee may deduct a portion of the rent from the middle-man, and that the middle-man may deduct a portion from the landlord above him?—There is a provision in the Act which sets forth the proportions that intermediate persons have to pay.

1753. Then it is not only the person in receipt of the rack-rent who has a vote?—I am not quite certain as to that without referring to the Act.

1754. Will you read the clause regulating the plurality of votes to which you alluded?—"And be it enacted that at every election of guardians in a union, where a rate shall have been made under this Act, every ratepayer who under the last of such rates shall have paid or contributed, or be liable to pay or contribute rate (whether in one or in more than one sum or charge) in respect of property in such union, shall have a vote or votes, according to the scale hereinafter mentioned (the number of votes in the case of an occupier, to be computed and allowed in respect of the net annual value of the property occupied by him; and in the case of a person receiving rent, and contributing rate in respect thereof, to be computed and allowed according to the net amount of the rent received by him, after deducting therefrom all rent which he may be liable to pay, and in respect of which he may be entitled to deduct from the rate contributed; and in the case of the tithe-owners to be computed and allowed according to the net annual value of his tithe); where such property so occupied, or the net amount of such rent, or the net annual value of such tithe, as the case may be, shall not amount to 20 l., one vote; shall amount to 20 l. and not to 50 l., two votes; shall amount to 50 l. and not to 100 l., three votes; shall amount to 100 l. and not to 150 l., four votes; shall amount to 150 l. and not to 200 l., five votes; shall amount to 200 l. and upwards, six votes." That is the scale for them all.

1755. That is very much the same as in England, is it not, under Sturges Bourne's Act?—Yes; but you will observe every person here votes according to the amount of net rent which is received by him, "And in every case where the occupier paying rate shall not be entitled to deduct any part thereof from any rent paid by him, he shall have double the number of votes above mentioned."

1756. That is in theory that he is both owner and occupier, and entitled to vote in respect of each capacity?—Yes; I think I had better read the rest of the clause: "And where the net annual value of the rateable property shall exceed the rent paid by the occupier, he shall, in addition to his votes as occupier, have the same number of votes as if such excess of net annual value were rent received and retained by him without deductions; and for the purpose of ascertaining the number of votes which a ratepayer shall be entitled, the aggregate amount of the valuation under this Act for the time being of the property in respect of which he claims to vote shall be taken to be the annual value."

1757. Then he has a vote so far as he has a beneficial interest in the land?—Yes.

1758. As regards the ex officio element, is the system in force in Ireland?—Yes, with this restriction, that the number of ex officio guardians in no case is to exceed the number of elected guardians.

1759. Are the ex officio guardians qualified in the same way as in this country?—Yes; section 23 of the 1st & 2nd Victoria says that "Justices of the peace residing in the union, and acting for the county in which they so reside, are qualified to be ex officio guardians for such union."

1760. But an ex officio guardian might have to be struck off in order to keep down the proportion of ex officio guardians to elected guardians?—They are regulated by the rating; those being selected to fill up the number who are rated highest in amount.

1761. Do you know whether the number of elected guardians is, generally speaking, larger or smaller in Ireland than in this country?—It is not larger certainly, but I have not made an accurate comparison.

1762. Could you tell the Committee the arrangements as regards the administration of the county cess?—With regard to the administration of the county cess, the grand jury nominate, or rather fix within certain limits the number of cess-payers who are to be associated with the justices in the presentment sessions for each barony, and one-half the number in the list made out by the grand jury are elected by ballot by the justices at the meeting of the presentment sessions, and then those so elected become associated with the justices in forming the presentment sessions for the barony; afterwards the justices and the cess-payers so associated elect a cess-payer from amongst themselves, who is to be associated with the justices of the presentment sessions for the whole county.

1763. Are there presentment sessions for each barony and one presentment sessions for the county?—Yes; that is so.

1764. And the cess-payers are associated with the justices?—Yes; they are. The grand jury, subject to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, fix, as before stated, the numbers of cess-payers who are to be associated with the justices in the presentment sessions for each barony. The number of cesspayers must not exceed 12 nor be less than five.

1765. Do they bear a small proportion to the justices?—They form a minority.

1766. The occupiers pay the whole of the county cess, and although the occupiers have a proportion of the representation, they are in a minority?—They are.

1767. But while the English occupiers pay to the county rate and have no representation, the Irish occupiers have a little representation, and their claim to representation has been acknowledged?—Yes; they have representation in the manner which I have described; the cess-payers who are selected by the grand jury, I believe, must be the cess-payers who pay the largest amount of county cess. I believe that is the regulation.

1768. To go back for a moment to the ex officios in the case of the poor rate, do they attend regularly in Ireland; do they take much interest in the administration of the funds?—They frequently attend; I am not able to say whether they take much interest or not.

1769. You are not able to say whether, having to pay half the rate themselves, they take greater interest in the administration than they do in England?—I am not able to speak of that from any practical knowledge.

1770. Mr. Ayrton.] Have you any knowledge which will enable you to explain to the Committee how it is that the charge for the poor in Ireland is comparatively so much smaller than the charge for the poor in England, considering that Ireland is so much poorer than England?—The poor law in Ireland is much more strict than it is in England.

1771. Is not the law the same?—No.

1772. The Statute law is the same, is it not?—No. In England the administration of relief is subject to the regulation of the Poor Law Board, and the Poor Law Board make regulations for the administration of relief under the power which is conferred upon them by the original Poor Law Amendment Act; but in Ireland the Statute itself lays down the regulations for the administration of relief, or rather the classes of persons who are to receive it, and the manner in which they are to receive it.

1773. Is the law much stricter than the rules laid down by the Poor Law Board in this country?—Yes, certainly.

1774. Are you aware that originally the Poor Law Board laid down rules in England nearly as strict as those in Ireland, and that the rules in England were then much less?—I know that the principles which they laid down originally were more strict than the regulations which are now in force.

1775. May we attribute the increase of rates to the course pursued by the Poor Law Board in altering their regulations?—I think there can be no doubt, that if the law were administered as strictly in England as in Ireland, the rates would necessarily be reduced, because there is no out-door relief to able-bodied paupers in Ireland.

1776. Are you of opinion, that after all by exercising greater strictness we may come back to a good system of administration?—There is no doubt of that.

1777. So long as you have a bad system of administration maintained in England, on the ground of what is called humanity, we cannot expect to get any serious reduction of rates?—The more rigid the administration of the law the less the rates will be.

1778. You do not attribute it to any superior attention, or care or intelligence on the part of the administrative body; that is the board of guardians, but to the superior law under which they administer?—In Ireland, a man has simply an order for the workhouse, as a general rule. The out-door relief is very small indeed compared to the in-door relief; it is quite the exception and not the rule. There are some exceptions in the case of sickness and relief to aged and infirm persons.

1779. Mr. Hunt.] Has the in-door relief in England increased since the Union Chargeability Act?—I am not prepared to answer the question accurately without referring to the statistics; but I know that the poor relief has been increasing latterly.

1780. Could you give us that information another day?—I could.

1781. With regard to Ireland, do you know whether the attendance at the presentment sessions is full?—It is not full generally.

1782. Do you know whether the magistrates or the elected members of the body attend best?—I know that the magistrates attend best.

1783. Do you know whether the position of elected representative is much sought after?—It is not so; in many instances there is great difficulty in getting them to attend.

1784. Would they come from the same social rank as the magistrates?—No, not as a rule, but from a lower social rank. The Grand Jury Act in Ireland contains a clause enabling the justices to act in the case of the non-attendance of the cesspayers, and there are instances given where only one cesspayer has been found to attend; indeed I believe sometimes none have attended.

1785. Can you give any reason for the attendance of the magistrates being better than that of the cesspayers?—It was stated to me by several persons in Ireland that the reason was that the cesspayers generally found themselves in a minority.

1786. They voted in classes, did they?—I do not not know how they voted, but that was the reason given to me.

1787. Was it found that the magistrates and the elected representatives took different views of matters?—Yes, the elected representatives considered that they were out-voted.

1788. And therefore it was not worth their while to attend?—That was their feeling as stated to me.

1789. Do you know upon what points they differed generally speaking; was it with regard to excessive expenditure, or anything of that sort?—I do not know the points. The expenditure at the discretion of the presentment sessions in Ireland is very considerable; for instance, with regard to highways and roads, there is a very large expenditure under that head.

1790. It is in the jurisdiction of the baronies?—Yes, there are two presentment sessions; there is the presentment sessions for the barony, and there is the presentment sessions for the county.

1791. But with regard to highways, is that within the jurisdiction of the presentment sessions of the barony or of the county?—It is wholly within the jurisdiction of the barony where the barony bears the whole cost of the works; but it is only partly within the jurisdiction of the presentment sessions of the barony when half the cost of the highways is cast upon the barony, and the other half is paid by the county.

1792. But who makes the rate that is assessed?—The grand jury; the presentment sessions only present the amount which is to be so expended.

1793. Who settles it; the presentment sessions of the barony or the presentment sessions of the county: there being a presentment sessions for the barony, and one for the county, the presentment sessions are obliged to recognise a certain proportion as falling upon the county, is that so?—Yes; where the obligation is cast upon them by law.

1794. Do you know what the proportion is?—It is half in the cases to which I have referred, but it is all subject to the revision afterwards of the grand jury; the presentments are made to the grand jury and revised by them afterwards.

1795. Do you know whether there is an economical administration as regards highways in Ireland or not?—I am not prepared to say; the roads are very good in many parts.

1796. Mr. Pell.] In the case of a presentment for the repairs of a highway, or making a new highway, in Ireland, is that first brought under the notice of the county?—No; it is first brought under the notice of the presentment sessions of the barony, and it then goes up to the county for consideration.

1797. It comes back again, does it not, to the highway boards, or as they call it in Ireland the road board in the barony?—It ultimately goes to the grand jury.

1798. From what body does the vote for the money come?—From the grand jury, and that is composed of persons selected by the sheriffs in a particular way.

1799. So that in Ireland the landowners have the entire disposal of the funds that are raised upon the ratepayers in respect of highways?—As a rule, the presentments which are made by the barony in the first instance are acted upon.

1800. Is there a power to raise the question before the grand jury?—Yes, there is.

1801. It is an open court, is it not?—Yes.

1802. Mr. Fielden.] Can you tell me whether vagrancy exists to a greater extent in Ireland than in England in proportion to the population?—Yes; the last returns show that vagrancy does exist to a greater comparative extent in Ireland than in England.

1803. Is it your opinion that the strict enforcement of the workhouse test tends to increase vagrancy or not?—The Irish are very averse to going into the workhouse.

1804. Is it your opinion that they are in consequence driven on to the roads?—It may have that effect in some instances.

1805. Mr. Birley.] Is there any part of the administration of county cess in Ireland that you think desirable to introduce into the English system with reference to the counties, the presentment to the barony for instance, or to the grand jury, or the associating of cess-payers with the magistrates?—I am not prepared to say that there would be any real advantage in associating the cess-payers with the magistrates, but I think it is reasonable that the persons who contribute towards the rates should have some kind of representation in the expenditure of them.

1806. I mean, is there nothing in the Irish system which has struck you that might be usefully adopted in England, with regard to the levying of rates or with regard to the administration?—I have not considered the two systems with the view of suggesting any alterations of that kind.

1807. Mr. Corrance.] May not the county cess in Ireland be classed with our county rate, to all intents and purposes?—Yes; with this exception, that it is levied differently; it is levied as a separate rate in Ireland throughout.

1808. But would you have any objection, from your experience, that the English county rate should be levied in the same way, and classified under the same number of heads?—I think it would be a disadvantage to levy it separately. The great point to be aimed at is the collection of all rates by one simple collection, if you can manage it.

1809. Is it your experience of the practice in Ireland that there is a disadvantage in their being collected separately?—Yes; you have a double class of collectors to pay, you have a double collection, and you have not the same system of audit; in fact, you have two systems going on at the same time, when it appears to me that it might be very much better arranged under one general system.

1810. You would recommend that the whole of the rates should be levied together, provided no other reason existed?—The whole levied together under the name of poor rate or general local rate, and the amount required for county purposes being paid by contributions in the same way as in England.

1811. Do you see no reason for dividing the poor rate from those other rates; is there any general relation between them?—I think that it is very desirable that the collection should be as simple as possible.

1812. You have told us that the poor rate has diminished on account of the rigidity of the test in Ireland; what provisions exist for the aged and sick?—The aged and sick may be relieved out of the house.

1813. Are there less aged and sick in Ireland than in England?—There are a great many aged and sick; there are probably about the same number number in proportion, but I am not prepared to speak positively as to that; but with regard to the sick in Ireland, the hovels and cabins in which those people live are altogether so unfavourable for recovery, that it is very much better that they should be brought into the workhouse.

1814. That is owing, is it not, to the state of Ireland itself?—Yes, as regards the sick.

1815. I presume you are aware that relief cannot be given to able-bodied paupers in England out of the house?—It can be given out of the house, and is so in reality.

1816. Is the Irish law more rigid on that point than the English law?—Yes; in Ireland you cannot relieve an able-bodied man on account of the sickness of any member of his family; you must bring the whole family, including the man, into the workhouse.

1817. And you think that the application of the law to that extent actually diminishes the rates?—Yes.

1818. Would it do so in England as well?—Yes, I think it would.

1819. Do you approve of the administration of the Poor Law by the employers of labour as to its economical effect; and is not the poor rate so levied upon the employers of labour as to constitute it a sick and superannuation fund in aid of wages, to a certain extent?—It is so, to a certain extent.

1820. Does not that set it completely apart from any other rate; is there any other rate that at all partakes of the same conditions?—If I understand by your question that the poor rate is applied for one purpose and the county rate for another, I say that it is so.

1821. But is there any other possible rate which could be so applied in aid of wages as the poor rate?—I am not aware of any other which can be so applied to the same extent.

1822. Does not that in your mind draw a very broad distinction between such a rate and any other rate levied for other purposes?—It makes the distinction which you put.

1823. Therefore that would render it almost essential that employers of labour should be the administrators of such a rate?—I think it is proper that the persons who pay the rate should administer it; that is the view I take of it.

1824. Is there any other rate that you know of where misapplication could cause such serious results; for instance, supposing you misapplied the county rate, or the highway rate, or any other rate, you would not produce any great economical or social effect; but is there any other rate which, if it is misapplied, could cause such serious consequences as the poor rate?—I think not, because I am not aware of any rate that is so large in amount.

1825. Irrespective of that, do you think the conditions of the increase of pauperism, and other effects that might be produced renders it more serious than the misapplication of any other rate?—I think probably the misapplication of the poor rate would produce worse results than the misapplication of the county rate.

1826. Did we not see an instance of that misapplication under the old Poor Law before 1832?—No doubt; there was very much misadministration.

1827. And it produced the most serious results?—No question about it.

1828. Mr. Pell.] The rate is levied now in Ireland, on Griffiths' valuation, is it not?—Yes, all the rates and all the public taxes are levied upon that valuation; the income tax is levied upon it, as well as county cess and poor rate.

1829. Will you give us the date of Griffiths' valuation?—I think Griffiths' valuation began about 14 years ago, and it is only recently that it has been completed.

1830. Has not that assessment been varied or been altered at all since that?—Not except from time to time by the additions of new buildings.

1831. Do not the assessments for buildings in Ireland form a totally separate class?—They are included in the same valuation. For instance, take Belfast. There have been very large additions indeed to the valuation of Belfast since the original valuation was made.

1832. But if agricultural land in Ireland during the last 14 years has been improved by the successful application of capital upon the surface, the assessment has not been altered, as I understand?—It has not.

1833. Therefore there has been a material difference between the condition of a farmer in Ireland with respect to assessment, and his condition in England, namely, that in England the assessment of the land would follow the improved condition of the land from the farmer laying his capital out upon it; whereas in Ireland that would not be the case?—It would only be the case whenever the valuation was revised.

1834. But we know that in England it is revised every third year as a matter of practice by the assessment committee?—Yes, and it may be more frequent in case of necessity.

1835. But in Ireland, at all events, the improvements have run for 14 years without any change in the assessment, except with regard to additional buildings?—Yes.

1836. That cannot be applied in Ireland, and therefore agriculture in Ireland has been very much better treated, if I may say so, than in England?—It has in that way.

1837. In England compared with Ireland, there is a direct rating of the result of the cultivators' capital?—Yes, as often as you make a fresh valuation.

1838. But in Ireland at all events he is left for 14 years without any additional charge?—There is a provision in the Irish Valuation Act, that the valuation shall not be altered except after a given period.

1839. Is it not the fact that there is a great quantity of land in Ireland at the present moment letting at double Griffiths' valuation?—I am not prepared to say that it is letting at double, but I know it is letting at a very much higher value than Griffiths' valuation.

1840. Chairman.] Therefore, as the general valuation is so much below the real valuation, so much more in the pound must be raised in order to get the same sum of money?—Yes.

1841. So that you cannot say it is a gain, but a heavier rate in the pound is required to produce the same sum which would be produced if the valuation had been raised?—Yes, a heavier rate is required.

1842. There are two ways, are there not, of increasing your receipts, either by raising the valuation, or by a higher rate in the pound?—Yes.

1843. Mr. Ayrton.] With regard to vagrancy in Ireland, have you had your mind called lately to the particular causes which produce vagrancy in that country; is it not the practice of able-bodied men to go away for a certain period of the year for the purpose of obtaining work, his house being shut up, and his family going about as vagrants?—In several parts of Ireland the people go to Scotland at one period of the year, and they come to England also during the harvest season in very considerable numbers.

1844. Are you aware whether it is the practice for them to shut up the house for some period, and the family to go about begging?—I am not aware of that practice.

1845. Mr. Fielden.] Is there any return published of the number of vagrants in Ireland?—Yes, 1846. Has it been presented to the House?—You will, I think, find a statement of the number of vagrants in the last Report on Irish Local Taxation, by Dr. Hancock.

1847. Chairman.] Do not the Local Taxation Returns of Ireland give very full and complele details of the local taxes raised in the country?—Yes, very full details; and there are some remarks on vagrancy. The number of vagrants is given, and there is a comparison instituted between the number in Ireland and in England, and it shows that the per-centage is greater in Ireland, but I forget to what extent.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY POWNALL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H. Pownall.

29 March 1870.

1848. Chairman.] YOU are Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, are you not?—Yes.

1849. And you have for very many years had experience of the county rate, and the administration of the county affairs?—Yes, for nearly 40 years.

1850. Could you state to the Committee the present amount of the county rate in Middlesex?—Perhaps you would allow me to give it you in 1868, as I have not had time to get the documents together for 1869. The total amount of the expenditure of the county in the year 1868 was 172,127 l. 4 s., and the gross receipts last year, 1869, were 180,520 l. 10 s. 6 d.

1851. Can you tell us how much in the year that you have before you, whether 1868 or 1869, was raised by the county rate alone?—The amount levied by the county rate last year was upwards of 170,000 l.

1852. Could you tell the Committee what rate in the pound that amounted to?—The county rate in the pound last year was 2¼ d., and 1¼ d. for the lunatic asylum rate, together making 3½ d. for the county rate.

1853. Did you levy rates separately for the county rate and for the lunatic asylum?—Yes; the county rate last year, I think, was just the same in the pound as it was 30 years ago, but the amount of course was very much beyond that, inasmuch as the increased population and wants of the county have corresponded with the increase of the wealth of the county.

1854. Can you state the total assessment for the county rate?—It is 13,852,000 l.

1856. So that the assessment has more than doubled, and the amount raised has more than doubled?—Yes, certainly, considerably more.

1857. In comparing the county rate in the county of Middlesex with the county rate elsewhere, I presume we have to take into account that the police rate is not paid in the metropolis out of the county rate?—The police rate in the metropolis is taken out of the poor rate; it does not come upon the county rate.

1858. The police rate in the county of Middlesex is perfectly distinct from the county rate?—Yes, perfectly so.

1859. There is no county police, is there?—No.

1860. Does the Metropolitan police jurisdiction reach over the whole area of the county of Middlesex?—Yes.

1861. And beyond the area, which is called the area of the Metropolitan Board of Works?—Yes.

1862. The fact being that the two areas of the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Metropolitan police are separate, and overlap at various points?—Yes, quite so.

1863. Then the administration of the justices of Middlesex is quite separate from the administration of the police?—Quite.

1864. Has any inconvenience, to your knowledge, arisen from the county justices having no authority over the police?—Not that I am aware of.

1865. Your administration extends to the prisons, does it not?—Yes.

1866. And to the lunatic asylums too?—Yes.

1867. Will you state any other purposes?—The reformatory school, the county bridges, the militia storehouses, the coroners, and the inspectors of weights and measures.

1868. In fact, your area of administration is the same as in other counties, with the exception of the police, generally?—Yes, with the exception of the police.

1869. Can you state to the Committee the allowance made by the Treasury to you for the prosecution of prisoners?—We recover from the Treasury a very considerable amount; and we recover from the Treasury part of the expenses of criminal prosecutions, which last year amounted to 13,135 l. 6 s. 8 d. We recovered also for the conveyance of prisoners sentenced to penal servitude to the depôts for convicts, 42 l. 18 s. 10 d. The total amount that we recovered from the Government was 35,959 l. 5 s. 6 d.; the maintenance of prisoners in the House of Correction at Westminster, which amounted to nearly 23,000 l. of that amount.

1870. Are you aware whether there is a great loss to the county, or whether you recover nearly the whole?—There is a great loss to the county; but I scarcely know whether the question is simply with regard to prosecution, or as to the maintenance of prisoners till they are tried and convicted.

1871. I mean simply the expenses of the prosecution of prisoners; properly speaking, you are entitled to recover the whole; but the Committee have understood that certain portions are disallowed by the Treasury, and in some cases there is a considerable loss to the county; how is that in Middlesex?—It is so; I am not able to state the amount, but it is not very large.

1872. As regards the general administration of the county affairs, are there many of the expenses which you incur over which you have full discretion?—No; out of the expenditure which I have stated for 1868, the total over which we have scarcely, or I may say no control, amounts to 106,420 l. 4 s. 3 d., which is the expenditure under statutes, and over which the quarter sessions have no control; it is merely ministerial, paying for money borrowed under Acts of Parliament, and things of that kind. I could give the whole of the items, but it is not necessary after stating the total. The amount over which the magistrates are supposed to have control is 65,706 l. 19 s. 9 d.; that over which we have control is the House of Correction for prisoners, where there are very nearly 150 principal officers and warders; to the warders we give, for instance, not less than 20 s. a week wages, or 21 s., as we are obliged to give those wages which will secure efficient warders for so large an establishment, there being upwards of 2,000 prisoners in the gaol. So it is at Westminster, and so it is at the Industrial School, the item for which amounts to 15,182 l. If you will allow me I will hand in the whole detailed statement, showing the total amount as well as the amount over which we are supposed to have control and that which we have not. (The Witness delivered in the same, vide Appendix.)

1873. I presume that in administering the county rate you have a certain discretion as to the carrying out of those duties which are imposed upon you by the statute?—Yes.

1874. And whether you manage them economically or not depends a good deal upon the business-like minds of the gentlemen to whom they are intrusted?—Our system is, that for the prisons they are not at liberty to expend a larger sum than 50 l. on any object without the sanction of the court. With regard to any particular grant, such as a grant for the enlargement of the lunatic asylums, or the enlargement of the prisons, or other establishments, notice must be given at one county day that so much will be moved for on the next county day. It is then inserted on the agenda paper for the county day, and taken into consideration; and it is often reduced, and sometimes refused. The system when any sum is ordered to be expended upon the establishment is, that it be borrowed upon mortgage of the county rates under the direction of the court. It is then referred to the committee of accounts, who advertise for tenders, and report to the court, who always take the lowest tender.

1875. If the court of quarter sessions were at all to relax its vigilance, do you think it possible that the amount in the pound might rise?—I think there is no doubt of it. I should say that the committees are exceedingly cautious, both of the prisons and the asylums, which I know from long experience as to their expenditure; but still the control of the county, and, if I may so phrase it, the fear of the discussion of the court, has a very salutary influence, I think, upon the committees.

1876. You have never found any lack of attendance upon the part of the justices in the county of Middlesex?—Not at the quarter sessions. Perhaps, occasionally in the summer months, we may fall short at the prisons; but then if there are, which has occurred but very rarely only, but one or two magistrates, they would never think of incurring any expense without giving notice in the committee that it would be taken into consideration at the next committee, and a special summons would be sent round to all the members.

1877. Has there been any dissatisfaction amongst the ratepayers of the county of Middlesex, as far as you are aware, at having no voice in the administration of the county rate?—I have heard that it is so occasionally, but it appears to me to be a very unreasonable thing, because the ratepayers take so little interest, generally speaking, in the expenditure of the county, that even when it is proposed to lay out a sum of money, as was recently the case, to build a new prison, which would involve an expenditure of 80,000 l. or 100,000 l., perhaps there were not half-a-dozen strangers in the court; whereas, if a pickpocket is to be tried, the court will be crowded with strangers.

1878. As far as you are aware, have the ratepayers not taken considerable interest in other rates in the metropolis?—I believe they have; and there was a meeting in my own subdivision of Holborn, in which the ratepayers passed a resolution against the magistrates building a new prison. But, from the manner in which explanations which were subsequently given to a meeting of the guardians were received by them, I believe such a resolution would not have been carried if they had understood that the repayment of the cost would have been spread over 30 years; and that, allowing for the present expenditure for the farming out of the prisoners, the increased charge to their parishes would not, at most, have much exceeded 30 l. a year, while at the end of that period the county would possess a new prison, and be able to accommodate all their prisoners. If I may be allowed to go on, I would observe that it is the same with regard to the lunatic asylums. The parishes are in favour of our building a new lunatic asylum, but until the parochial asylums are opened the magistrates think that it would be unwise to embark in that; but the building of an asylum that would cost perhaps 120,000 l., or 140,000 l., it would not, in fact, cost the county one single farthing, because the amount of money that would be borrowed for the erection would be more than repaid at the end of 30 years by the difference in charge for the asylum, and what the parishes are bound to pay to private institutions which take in their paupers.

1879. The outlay at first would be considerable, but it would ultimately bring in a return?—Yes, and put the county in possession of a lunatic asylum, free building debt, as is the case with Hanwell.

1880. Do you see in that statement which you have made any argument as to the persons who ought to pay the county rate, the owners or the occupiers?—I think it should be divided. I think that those public institutions are a permanent benefit to the county, and whatever is a permanent benefit to the county is a permanent benefit to the property of that county, and therefore the owners of the property ought to contribute something towards it as well as the occupiers. I would instance the metropolis, of which perhaps two-thirds is built upon freehold ground rents ents; what does the ground landlord pay towards ll the improvements that are going on, and owards all the splendid establishments that have een erected during this last 30 years, such as anwell and Colney Hatch, and the enlarge- ent of the prisons? Nothing at all.

1881. Supposing that a law were passed rowing a portion of the county rate upon the wner as well as the occupier, what is your pinion as to its being made to affect ground nts at present?—The present contracts could ot of course be disturbed, but it might come to operation with all new arrangements.

1882. Therefore it would only affect those ases where new agreements were gradually ade?—I think not.

1883. And those cases where the ground rents re expiring, and new ground rents are being rranged for?—Yes.

1884. Have you given your attention at all o the representation of occupiers or of tenants, who now pay all the rates in the administration of ounty affairs?—Yes; I have a good deal. I have very strong opinion upon it, and I published pamphlet some eight or nine years ago, which as gone through three editions, in which I show hat I think that the poor rate, which is the grand ource of complaint, ought not to rest solely on ouse and landed property, but nothing has re- ulted from it.

1885. The point is as regards the occupier, whether the occupier ought to be represented in dministering the county finance?—He is to a ertain extent represented, for all the magistrates re very large occupiers and ratepayers. The nly difference is that the county magistrates old their commission from the Crown, and the orough magistrates throughout the country hold heir commission direct from the ratepayers; but f a return were called for to show what has been he result of that system, I am inclined to think hat the public would be astonished at the in- rease of the rates in every county town where the ocal magistrates that are elected by the corporate ody have had the control of the local rating of he boroughs, compared to the increase of the ounty rates where they have been administered y the county magistrates.

1886. Do you think that the system of what re called nominated magistrates in the county is etter than that of elected magistrates?—Most decidedly; they have all a qualification, and are ll ratepayers, and have, perhaps, as large a stake, r a larger stake for their numbers, than any ther portion of the inhabitants.

1887. Mr. Corrance.] Do you consider that he county rate and the poor rate ought to be collected together?—In fact they are so.

1888. But is it your opinion that they ought to be?—I think it saves expense, and I see no objection to the present mode, namely, the county treasurer receiving the amount from each parish through the accredited organ of that parish.

1889. I think I have gathered from what you have said, that you are of opinion that the incidence of the two rates ought to be, to a certain extent, distinct; that the poor rate, involving the employment of labour, ought to fall upon the one class of persons, and the other upon property more especially?—That was not my meaning, although, perhaps, I expressed myself improperly.

1890. May I draw that inference from it?—I do not see any difference between the ratepayer paying a county rate, or paying it in the shape of a poor rate from which the county rate is deducted. My objection is to all the rates being paid by real property only.

1891. I thought I might draw this inference from your observation that you do recognise a certain distinction between a rate levied for the purpose of the poor, and a rate levied for the purposes of the property of the county?—Just in this sense, that I think the county lunatic asylum is a permanent benefit to the county, and, therefore, the owners of property ought to pay a portion of it; the support of the poor of a parish or of a county does not improve the property of the owners, and, therefore, ought not, I think, to be levied upon tenants only.

1892. On the other hand, the county rate does not create poverty?—No.

1893. Which the poor rate does?—To a certain extent it does, because, in Middlesex, we have upwards of 600 different officers attending the asylums and the prisons, and they may, of course, leave widows, and they may leave orphans who may become chargeable to the poor.

1894. But you have a superannuation fund, have you not?—Yes, but not equal to their support.

1895. Do not you think it desirable that it should be made equal to their support?—It is a very difficult question. If the retiring allowance is large, the ratepayers complain very much, and they make comparisons of course between the situation of a warder of a prison, and of a clerk in a merchant's counting-house.

1896. Still is it not your opinion that a public officer ought to retire upon an adequate pension, at any rate sufficient to keep him from coming upon the poor rate?—I think that if his services are paid according to the general scale of remuneration during his life, he has no right to expect the public to support his family if he does not lay by a portion of his earnings for their support himself.

1897. But could you not provide that he did so by making it part of the arrangement that there should be a certain sum deducted for superannuation?—We should have no power to enforce such a regulation under the present Acts.

1898. Mr. St. Aubyn.] In answer to a question from the Right Honourable Chairman, you said that the ratepayers were already all well represented at the quarter sessions because the magistrates were amongst the largest occupiers; in what sense do you say that the magistrates are amongst the large occupiers?—In house property and in land, and other incidents of wealth.

1899. Do you mean occupiers in the sense that they pay rates directly?—Unfortunately the rates do not keep pace with a man's wealth; there is many an individual that has 10,000*l.* a year whose rates perhaps are not more than upon a house of 500*l.* a year; and there is the injustice, I think, of the poor rate.

1900. Do you wish your answer to apply to Middlesex particularly, or generally throughout the country?—I would apply it particularly to Middlesex, and generally, too.

1901. Do you think that there are more magistrates in Middlesex, who are direct ratepayers, than there are in other counties?—No, I believe there are not so many; the list of magistrates in Middlesex appears exceedingly large; there are about 360, but I believe in some other counties with not half the population there are nearly as many many magistrates; and I could soon explain why there are so many magistrates, and the different occupations which they had, when I say, for instance, that our six public establishments occupy the attention of 90 gentlemen every week, and that we have upwards of 6,000, and now with the beer houses we shall have nearer 9,000 licenses with all the transfers connected with them, and all the business that is incidental, as well as our sessions every fortnight; we try at our sessions in Middlesex more prisoners, I believe, than six of the largest boroughs in the country.

1902. Mr. Gregory.] Did I rightly understand you to say that greater economy was exercised by county magistrates than by borough magistrates? —As far as I have been able to ascertain from the Parliamentary Returns which I have looked at, I think there is no question about it. Speaking for Middlesex, our county rate per pound has not increased for 30 years, but I think it will be found that the borough rates are more than three times what they were formerly.

1903. Have not the county magistrates a more direct interest in the property which is subject to taxation than the borough magistrates have?—I am not able to speak as to that, because I am not acquainted with many borough localities. I am not aware what the relative proportion of wealth is.

1904. Are you not aware from what class the borough magistrates are generally selected?—I believe, as far as I have understood, they are selected from the most influential inhabitants of those boroughs.

1905. They are tradesmen and professional men, are they not?—Yes, I understand so.

1906. And not owners of property generally speaking?—I am not able to say; I have not analysed them.

1907. Colonel Brise.] In answer to a question from the Right Honourable Chairman, I understood you to say, that you thought that half the county rate should be collected from the owner, and half from the occupier; what is your opinion as to collecting all the county rate from the owner?—The ratepayers should contribute towards the maintenance of the prisoners and the prisons, and they are as much interested in the protection of their property, be it great or small, as the owner of the house in which they live.

1908. I think you said that it was your opinion that the ground landlord ought to be rated?—It seems to me to be very unfair that an individual who when his land was merely agricultural land paid rates, but when it becomes building land and fetches 50 l. an acre instead of 2 l., pays nothing.

1909. Mr. Pell.] Is it the case that the landlord pays nothing in London?—I have tried to ascertain how the landlord could be said to pay anything having let his land upon building lease.

1910. Is not the whole value of the hereditament assessed in London, and does not that include the value which belongs to the landlord, as well as the value that belongs to the building upon the land?—In one sense it does, but I apprehend in another it does not; it comes into the value of the house, the rent which the tenant pays; but the portion of the rent that goes to the ground landlord is certainly so much clear gain to him over and above what he obtained for his land before it was let upon building lease.

1911. But what I want to get at is this, is there any loss to the parish or to the union; that is to say, is the assessment less upon the hereditament now from the way in which it is made than it would be under any alteration that you would propose in order to bring the ground landlord directly into the assessment?—I am not aware that it would affect the rate, although it would affect the parties who paid the rate.

1912. How comes it that the ground landlord is not now assessed on the rate book?—Because it has been a matter of agreement with the party to whom he let his land for building purposes.

1913. And do you think it would be a fair and just thing to propose that an agreement under seal, in which in all probability the two contracting parties have considered this question, should be set aside by an Act of Parliament?—I think I expressly guarded myself against any such opinion.

1914. You do not think the community at large suffers at all by the method of assessment: you do not think that there is any part of the hereditaments left unassessed at present, or excluded from contributing to the rates?—I think that if the poor rate had originated during our period, it would have had a very different operation from what it has under the Act of Queen Elizabeth, who had nothing that she could rate for the poor but house and landed property. Even minerals were excepted, except slate and coal, because they were just discovered, and therefore came under the category.

1915. In your opinion, does the parish or the union suffer at all from the ground landlord not appearing upon the assessment?—I think that the union or the parish does not suffer, because it does not signify who contributes the amount so that they receive it; but it does affect very much the tenant, whether he pays the whole or the ground landlord a part.

1916. Mr. Ayrton.] Have you considered that there is a distinction between the two branches of expenditure incurred by the justices, the one in the performance of their duties as assigned to keep the peace, and the other the expenditure that they make as mere administrators for the benefit of the inhabitants?—With the exception of maintaining the prisoners in the gaols, I am not aware that they expend anything for the protection of the public.

1917. If you go through the list of the heads of expenditure, in the first place there is the expenditure for rural police?—That does not affect Middlesex.

1918. But it does affect the magistrates in general, though not in Middlesex?—Yes.

1919. Have you no lock-up houses at the stations under your charge?—No; which I think is to be regretted, inasmuch as, take a case from Staines, for instance, that is remanded for a week, the man is obliged to be sent up to London, and then brought back again; if they had a lock-up house in the different districts, I think the expense would be less.

1920. Would you consider that those two items of expenditure by the justices were paid in the performance of their duty or as the mere administrators of expenditure?—It could only be administrative; we have no expenditure as to lock-up houses.

1921. But would you so consider it, or have you considered the thing at all?—Yes, I have considered considered it, and I think it would be a very judicious arrangement if in certain districts the magistrates had the power of erecting such places.

1922. Do you consider that an expenditure incidental to the performance of their magisterial duty or not?—Yes, certainly, the keeping of a prison is.

1923. Next, conveyance of prisoners; is that an expenditure incidental to the performance of magisterial duty?—Certainly.

1924. Then there is commitment of vagrants; is that an expenditure of the same kind or not?—Yes, certainly.

1925. Then there is maintenance of prisoners in prison; do you consider that that ought to be an administrative expenditure, or as an expenditure of the justices for the maintenance of peace and order?—It is both with us. It is administrative inasmuch as there is a special committee appointed to superintend it, and to guard against extravagance; and it is general, inasmuch as it is allowed by the quarter sessions.

1926. Do the justices undertake the maintenance of discipline in prison?—Yes, certainly. If they found any (if I may use a common phrase) screw loose they would very soon interpose and see that it was put right.

1927. Do you think it desirable that there should be two authorities in a gaol; one administering the gaol merely as a matter of finance, and another administering it as a matter of discipline?—No, certainly not. I think the two should go together.

1928. The next is the conveyance of transports; does that belong to the justices in their peace capacity?—If the Home Office preferred sending a van to the prison to take the convicts, they would be delivered over to them; but if we have an order from the Home Office to convey to Chatham a certain number of prisoners, of course we obey it, and then the expense is under our control.

1929. That is connected with prison discipline and management, is it?—Yes.

1930. The next is the shire hall; that is your place of meeting, I suppose?—Yes, and a very inadequate one it is, too; but we dare not provide a better.

1931. It is quite good enough for the justices in Middlesex, is it not?—Perfectly good enough for the justices, but certainly not good enough for the public who attend the sessions.

1932. Now we come to the lunatic asylums; do you consider that in any way connected with the preservation of the peace?—Unquestionably it is; as you would find in every parish, if lunatics were going about at large, you would very soon have the peace broken.

1933. That would apply to commitments on the order of the justices to confine lunatics; but do you consider that the administration of a lunatic asylum has anything to do with the preservation of the peace, or the performance of justices' duties?—I think the greatest glory that any set of magistrates ever had belongs to the magistrates of the county of Middlesex, in introducing the non-restraint system, which has been a model copied almost throughout Europe from it; and the greatest benefits have resulted, I think, from the lunatics being under the management of the magistrates, in preference to their being under the management of the overseers and boards of guardians in union workhouses.

1934. I am not speaking of the moral glory of the magistrates; I want to ask you this: whether you think the superintendence of the lunatic asylums has not more analogy to the superintendence of a workhouse, or other asylum for the poor, than it has to the functions of a justice of the peace in the performance of his duties?—Lunatics require peculiar treatment. They need much sympathy, patience, and forbearance, and there are a variety of reasons why men of education and gentlemanly habits should superintend them, in preference to rough people who will not control their own tempers, and therefore cannot influence others.

1935. Do you exercise any magisterial functions in connection with the lunatic asylum; that is to say, is it like the prison, where you generally superintend the imposition of punishment; do you in any way exercise that magisterial function in preserving order in the lunatic asylum?—Unquestionably they do, not only with the medical officers, but the principal matrons and those who are the head officers of the prison. But my friend Mr. Wyatt, who has been chairman of Colney Hatch Asylum, would give you more details of that, as I have been obliged to forego going to the asylum for some few years.

1936. With regard to the charge for the maintenance of pauper lunatics, you are merely the channel of assessment and collection, are you not; you do not have any particular functions in that respect?—If the magistrates did not exercise the greatest vigilance in the expenditure of the asylums, the rates per head for each lunatic would be equal to what is charged in private asylums; but from their vigilance and care, the maintenance money per week is at least 4 s., and often 4 s. 6 d. a head less than the private asylum charge.

1937. What magisterial functions are exercised by you in relation to that particular head of charge; how do you act magisterially?—We can have no magisterial action over the lunatics; but if we found an attendant striking a lunatic, we might send him to the petty sessions in the neighbourhood for the assault, which has sometimes been done.

1938. The next item is militia storehouses; how is that connected with your magisterial functions?—It is very difficult to say why the county should be put to the expense and the ratepayers have to pay for militia storehouses, when they have not to pay for the barracks of the country. Why should not they be just under the same category as barracks; but they are by the Act put under their jurisdiction.

1939. That is not a magisterial duty, particularly, is it?—It is confided to the magistrates entirely, and therefore it becomes their duty.

1940. There is nothing judicial in it?—It becomes the duty of the magistrates by the Act of Parliament to see that they are erected, and that they are kept in order.

1941. But there is no judicial function in it?—It is everything judicial. As individuals we should have nothing to do with them whatever, but as magistrates, and under an Act of Parliament, we have everything to do with them.

1942. The county bridges you merely administer as an administrative body, without exercising any judicial functions?—We visit the bridges, and if repairs are wanted the local magistrates have to report and obtain the sanction of the court before they can be done; the county bridges are placed under the charge of the justices.

1943. There are the charges for the clerk of the peace and the treasurer, those, I presume, are merely charges for officers?—Yes.

1944. Then comes the coroner; do you exercise any functions over the coroner?—Parliament has taken that out of our hands, except that we are obliged to pay him more than we think he ought to have. It seems to me to be a very extraordinary thing that the coroner should receive 1,700*l.* or 1,800*l.* a year (which one of our coroner's has), and pay a deputy about 200*l.* to do a great portion of the work.

1945. Have you any power to examine the bills judicially, and allow or disallow any items?—We have, and we do occasionally; for instance, I could give you the different statements of charges which are made by different coroners.

1946. With regard to the inspectors of weights and measures, are they your officers for the purpose of administering justice in fining people for the violation of the law?—Yes, and from the extreme care of the magistrates in cutting down the salaries of the inspectors below what, I think, ought to have been done, the county have gained about 70*l.*, and they have not been to one farthing of expense.

1947. Then comes the register of electors; have you anything to do with that?—The clerk of the peace has to draw up the register, and we have to pay him.

1948. But the justices have nothing to do with it, have they?—They have to order the payment, and they have to ascertain, in the different divisions of the county, whether the charge for any borough is excessive.

1949. The registration of electors has nothing to do with the administration of justice; they merely examine the assessment and judicially decide upon the claim?—They have to pay for the register, and they have to name the polling booths and other minor arrangements which are confided to them by the Act of Parliament.

1950. There would seem to be no other charges, except paying rates?—I think not; I think it would be well to consider whether, in the poor rate, another column should not be added of the owners of property, which might be substituted for the register every third year, instead of the enormous expense of printing the register annually.

1951. Middlesex is rather an exception, is it not, to all other counties in the small proportion which the number of justices bear to the owners of property possessing the magisterial qualification?—There is no magistrate of Middlesex but what has his qualification.

1952. I suppose the number of persons in Middlesex who possess the qualification for the magistracy, is much greater in proportion than it is in other counties, is it not?—The wealth of the metropolitan county, of course, will give a much larger number than anywhere else.

1953. Are the justices in Middlesex the owners of property generally, do you think, to a considerable extent above their qualification?—I do not believe that there is one of them, as far as my knowledge extends, who has not considerably above his qualification; we have several millionares on the Bench, as well as others with large property.

1954. Mr. Pell.] How does it come that the Middlesex magistrates are unable to reduce this 1,700*l.*, of which they complain so bitterly, and which is paid to the coroner?—As to coroners, under the present Act of Parliament, the average of their salary depends upon the number of inquests they hold, which average is taken every five years. The magistrates have, on two different occasions, and, I think, three, represented to the Home Office that the charge was excessive, and that the number of inquests was unnecessarily large; but the Home Office have always increased the amount of salary which we have recommended for the coroner to have for the next five years.

1955. So that the power rests with the Home Office?—Just so.

Mr. William Henry Wyatt, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. H. Wyatt.

1956. Chairman.] You have been for some time, I believe, a magistrate of the county of Middlesex?—Yes, for some years.

1957 And you have devoted yourself considerably to the public business connected with the magistracy, have you not?—I have taken a fair share, I believe.

1958. Are you chairman of the committee that deals with the lunatic asylums?—Of the Colney Hatch Asylum, I have been chairman for nine years.

1959. What are the asylums in the county of Middlesex?—There are two, Hanwell and Colney Hatch, each of them managed by a committee of visitors, consisting of 18 magistrates.

1960. In Middlesex, as we have heard, you levy a separate rate for the lunatic asylums?—For the purposes of repairing and building and paying off the debt. The parishes pay all other charges connected with the asylum, according to the number of patients that they have in it.

1961. The rate is 1¼ d. in the pound, is it not?—It varies from 1 d. to 1¼ d., sometimes it may get up as high as 1⅛ d.; but I should think that 1¼ d. might be taken as the fair average for the last 10 years.

1962. How much does 1¼ d. represent?—A farthing will produce, on the present assessment, which has lately been raised, about 14,500 l.

1963. Do you not spend about 72,000*l.* a year on the lunatic asylum, including the repayment of debt?—No; we spend about 53,000*l.* a year on it.

1964. But 1¼ d. would give you 72,000*l.*, would it not?—Then it will not exceed one penny. I was right in one way, because the assessment has only just been raised from 11,000,000*l.* up to 13,800,000*l.*; one farthing produces that amount on 13,800,000*l.*; therefore, 1¼ d. on the lower amount would be about right.

1965. The Committee may take it that you spend between 50,000*l.* and 55,000*l.* a year upon the lunatic asylums?—Yes, about that.

1966. How much of that goes to the repayment of debts?—It is made up in this way: the expense of lunatics belonging to the county, that is foreign lunatics, and Scotch or Irish lunatics, for which no parish can be found, comes to 15,000*l.* a year. The repairs for the two asylums come to 8,900*l.*; the superannuations came to 800*l.*; the interest on the money comes to 10,900 l.; the repayment of the principle comes to 16,800 l., or we may take it at the rate of 17,000 l. a year at the present time.

to

1967. The asylums are perfectly full, are they not?—Yes, quite full.

1968. Are you able to take in the whole of the pauper lunatics in the county?—No.

1969. Who have the first claim upon you, the pauper lunatics, or what you may call foreign lunatics?—Not the paupers necessarily maintained by the county, but there are also lunatics belonging to other counties; but we have not a large number of them.

1970. Still your loss is very heavy upon them, as I understand?—No; there is a difference between the lunatics which are paid for by other counties; what I call foreign lunatics are lunatics for whom no settlement can be found in a parish, such as foreigners coming over, or on Irish or Scotch lunatics; they are thrown by the parishes on the county fund, and are paid for by the county treasurer.

1971. That forms a very heavy item indeed, does it not?—Yes, this comes to 15,000 l. a year.

1972. Are you acquainted with the finance of any other counties in England?—No, not sufficiently to speak of it.

1973. Are you not aware whether this is not an extraordinary charge in Middlesex?—I am sure it is.

1974. London drawing more of those lunatics, whose settlement cannot be discovered, than probably any other part of England?—I believe the same remark applies to Lancashire, with regard to Liverpool, where they have a large number of Irish landing.

1975. Do you have any Government lunatics?—No; but we have to pay for certain lunatics kept at the criminal lunatic asylum, which are included in that 15,000 l., at the Broadmoor Asylum.

1976. Have you no dealings with the Government, with regard to your lunatic asylums?—None at all.

1977. Are there any boroughs in the county of Middlesex that contribute at all towards your county asylums?—There are no boroughs in the county of Middlesex for that purpose, with an independent jurisdiction, except the City of London.

1978. Except the City of London, there is no town in the county that has its own lunatic asylum?—None.

1979. Have you any unions in the county of Middlesex that overlap, and part of which are in other counties?—Yes; I know two, and there may be more. The Barnet Union comprises part of Middlesex and part of Hertfordshire, and the Kingston Union does the same with regard to Middlesex and Surrey, and I think very likely there are others.

1980. How do you manage with regard to them?—We profess, of course, only to take those belonging to our own district, but I daresay some mistake arises in that way, but the parish pays for them, so that there is not very much harm done.

1981. How do you levy the lunatic asylum rate upon those unions?—The proportion in the county is assessed.

1982. Do you levy it, or do the boards of guardians in the union?—The boards of guardians are directed to pay us, and to repay it out of the poor rates.

1983. Do you assess the parishes that are in the county?—Yes.

1984. Do you not happen to know whether there are any parishes that are partly in and partly out of the county?—For instance, I believe Barnet itself is. I know that part of it is in Hertfordshire, and I believe a part of it is in Middlesex.

1985. But there are no cases of sufficient importance to have drawn your attention to it financially?—No; it does not affect us.

1986. What is the rate that you charge the parishes for pauper lunatics?—At the present moment we are charging them 9*s.* 7½*d* a week at Colney Hatch for each patient, and that covers everything except the cost of the building and the repairs. I believe it is 10*s.* 2½ d. at Hanwell.

1987. Except on lunatic asylums, no portion of your expenditure is caused by any deficiency in the cases of paupers?—No; certainly not.

1988. It has been stated to the Committee that most of the expenditure under the county rate is entirely by statute; how far do you hold that it lies within the discretion of the justices whether their expenditure is large or moderate?—Only to a most trifling extent. The only thing in which you may say they have any power over, is in regulating the salaries of the officers. I cannot see that there is any other control at all.

1989. How do you regulate the administration of Colney Hatch; for instance, do you have contracts?—We have contracts for nearly everything, everything of any amount, and we do not, of course, invariably take the lowest, unless we are satisfied that the man can perform his contract; but we invariably take the lowest if we think that the man tendering is able to supply us.

1990. Can you tell us from what the difference per head between Colney Hatch and Hanwell arises?—There must be a difference in those large numbers. We have at Colney Hatch 2,070 lunatics, and at Hanwell 1,700. The establishment charges will vary just a little in that way.

1991. Sevenpence per head makes a considerable amount per annum, does it not?—Yes; for the county generally the expenditure for the year 1869, out of the sum raised by the rates, was 71,000 l. on prisons, 22,000 l. on reformatory schools, 53,000 l. on lunatics, 13,000 l. on coroners, 3,500 l. on the militia, and 8,500 l. is put down for sundries, which includes the registration of voters, the clerk of the peace, the county treasurer, the inspectors of weights and measures, and a great many small amounts which make up that sum, making altogether 171,000 l. The Government paid last year 23,000 l. towards the prisons, 5,500 l. towards reformatory schools, and 759 l. is the allowance for the militia each year. Then the Government pay very nearly the whole expense of criminal prosecutions, which comes to about 12,000 l.

1992. My question applied to the lunatic asylums; how much is spent upon the patients' maintenance?—Colney Hatch divide their accounts in this way: provisions, 4*s.* 11*d.* a week; house, and other expenses, that means coals and gas, and a variety of other expenses like that, 1*s.* 4*d.* per head; clothing, 7¾*d.*; salaries and wages, 2*s.* 1½*d.*; and medicine and incidentals, 5*d*; making altogether, 9*s.* 5¼*d.*; that was the exact cost at Colney Hatch during the last year.

1993. Have you got the gross amount sterling that that has been spent under those various heads? —£.51,733 6*s.*

1994. Do not you think that under those heads there is a great margin either for excessive liberality, or for a certain amount of economy; I am not criticising the mode in which it is administered; but in administering such a large sum, do not you think a great deal is left to the discretion of the committee administering it, or the justices themselves, whether the amount would be large or small?—No, I think not so very much; for instance, say a certain diet is fixed, which is adopted after consultation, that is to say, with the other authorities; then as to the Commissioners in Lunacy, they insist upon certain things, and so on, and they find fault if we do not keep a sufficient number of attendants. Then as to the payment to the coroners, that is pretty much fixed; I do not think we could affect the whole expenditure of the county to the extent of 2,000 l., one way or the other.

1995. Does not it make a great difference, whether you have a good manager to superintend the whole, or a man that does not look sharp after everything?—I think it depends entirely upon having good officers; that is my own impression.

1996. What is your discretion as regards the choice of officers?—We are absolute in the choice of officers.

1997. To put it broadly, if you were to relax your vigilance, and let things go at all easily, would not that lead to an increase of expenditure?—Undoubtedly; the committee go down every week, and spend some hours there, and it is only by that that they keep the expense down, I am sure.

1998. Otherwise it might rapidly rise?—It would, undoubtedly.

1999. Although the duties to be performed are marked out by the statute, and the mode in which you perform them, there is considerable room for administrative capacity?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

2000. It would be conceivable that you might have an extravagant board, or it would be conceivable that you might have an economical board?—Yes.

2001. Does the price of provisions materially affect your expenditure?—Very considerably; for instance, our weekly rate a short time ago, was as high as 10*s.* 6*d.*, which was a considerable difference.

2002. When were your two lunatic asylums built?—Colney Hatch was finished about the year 1851, I believe, and Hanwell was finished about 1833; but I am not certain about it.

2003. And the debt was spread over how many years?—Thirty years in both cases; and the result is that Hanwell, with the exception of a recent addition, has been paid off entirely, but Colney Hatch has still a large debt upon it.

2004. Can you state what the debt is at this moment?—The total debt of the county on the 1st of January this year was 570,000 l., and there was a debt outstanding for Coldbath Fields of 164,000 l.; for the prison at Westminster 27,000 l. the House of Detention at Clerkenwell 14,000 l.? Colney Hatch 183,000 l.; Hanwell 60,000 l.; the Industrial School at Feltham 50,000 l.; and militia store-houses 23,000 l.; and besides that there was a certain sum of money which was borrowed on tontine a great many years ago, which is now valued at 44,000 l., and which you will find makes up the amount.

2005. For what was the tontine established?—It was for building prisons; but it was a great many years ago, the year 1780, for building the House of Correction at Coldbath Fields.

2006. Mr. Birley.] Are any of the details of the expenditure of the lunatic asylums printed and published?—Yes, they are both printed. I shall be glad to hand in these two books (delivering in the same.)

2007. Mr. W. H. Smith.] I want to ask you whether some pressure has not been put upon the county of Middlesex to provide an additional lunatic asylum very recently?—Very considerable pressure.

2008. Have you resisted that pressure?—I saw the Home Secretary about a year ago, and I told him that we thought that we ought to wait until the district asylums were opened; and we thought that they would sufficiently accommodate them.

2009. Have you an estimate of the number of patients for whom additional accommodation was required?—We said in this way, that we thought that those new district asylums that were building would relieve the present asylums of about 600 or 700 patients, and that would afford room enough for all the cases now.

2010. The district asylums of which you speak would be for the relief of the pauper patients, which are now distributed partly amongst the workhouses and partly in the asylums of Colney Hatch and Hanwell?—Yes; we thought that they would take about 700 from the two asylums.

2011. But what was the accommodation you were required to provide by the Home Secretary?—He did not name any number; but he simply said that a third lunatic asylum should be built.

2012. Have you an estimate of the cost of building that asylum?—No; we have never yet considered what the number would be.

2013. You spoke of the payment to the Broadmoor Asylum falling upon the county; to what extent is that a charge upon the county?—I believe it is this; that all criminals are sent to Broadmoor that are found to be insane, and therefore not fit to be tried; and the county has to repay the Government the cost of them.

2014. We understand that the Government makes that payment to the county for the convicts who are insane, after a certain rate; is no payment made in respect of the lunatics at Broadmoor?—Not a farthing.

2015. So that criminal lunatics are a charge upon the county, whilst ordinary prisoners are not so great a charge?—No, I think it is in this way; that if the Government have a man becoming insane, who is a penal servitude man, he is kept at Broadmoor at the cost of Government; but there are certain offences for which they are convicted, and if a man is not tried because he is insane, the county bears it.

2016. The distinction is this; that a prisoner becoming insane after conviction is not a charge upon the county, but a prisoner acquitted upon the ground of insanity is a charge upon the county?—Yes, I think you may say that; because if a prisoner becomes insane in the county prison he does not go to Broadmoor; he goes to one of the county asylums.

2017. Mr. Gregory.] Are both of your asylums confined exclusively to pauper lunatics?—Exclusively.

2018. Do you take in none that pay for their maintenance?—None; they are all pauper lunatics as far as we are concerned. We believe that the parishes get recouped some of them; but at the same time they all come to us from the parishes, and we know nothing about their circumstances; they must come through the parishes.

2019. Mr. Smith.] Were the two asylums of which you speak, erected out of the poor rate?—Yes; they are not confined to Middlesex, but they take in a part of Surrey and a part of Kent.

2020. Mr. Walter.] Can you inform the Committee what sum has been spent upon Colney Hatch altogether in the building?—I believe about 420,000 l.

2021. Was that the original contract price?—No.

2022. I want to know what was spent originally under the contract; what alterations have been made subsequent to that; and whether, through any neglect on the part of the contractor, additional expense has been incurred by the county?—It has been very much enlarged; it was originally built for 1,200, and now it holds 2,060.

2023. Is there any defect in the original building which has entailed expense upon the county?—It is not a very satisfactory building, but perhaps a few thousands might have met the difficulty caused by bad construction.

2024. Mr. Ayrton.] It cost 200 l. per head, did it not, to build the new lunatic asylum?—I believe that is about it.

2025. Colonel Brise.] When was Colney Hatch opened?—It was opened in 1851, and enlarged in 1858.

2026. Has it been necessary to increase it since that time?—Yes.

2027. Chairman.] Mr. Pownall has put in a Paper showing that of your total expenditure, 106,000 l. is under statute, and accordingly beyond the control of quarter sessions, and 65,000 l. is the expenditure over which the quarter sessions are supposed to have control; are you acquainted with that Paper?—I have seen it, but I have not looked at it very lately.

2028. Do you remember whether you agreed to the statement, and whether you took the same view of the principle according to which it was drawn up?—I hardly remember.

2029. Mr. Walter.] In your opinion, is it considered desirable that as large a number of lunatics as 2,000 should be kept under one establishment?—We do not find the least difficulty from it. You must bear in mind that a very large number of our lunatics are quite harmless people, who do not give us much trouble.

2030. Chairman.] In this Paper the whole of the items for lunatics are put down as expended under statute, and, accordingly, as items over which the quarter sessions have no control?—You may say that the only control that they could have would be over the repairs of the building; they could have no other control certainly.

2031. Have you not got the control, practically, over almost every shilling of it, in the sense of controlling it to see whether it is an economical administration or not?—The sum that is down there for lunatics, with the exception of about 8,000 l. a year for repairs, is entirely for debt and interest; therefore that is a matter over which we have no control now.

2032. Then you have control over that part which is not entered into the account, but is charged to the parish?—Not the quarter sessions, but the committee of visitors who are appointed; the quarter sessions have nothing to do with it excepting appointing the committee.

2033. Have not they the control of the accounts?—Not in the least; the accounts are submitted to them annually, and they can find fault with them and not re-appoint the same members as a committee, but that is the only control that they could exercise.

2034. Is that by law or custom?—By law; by the Lunacy Acts.

2035. As regards the appointment of officers, does that rest entirely with the committees?—Entirely with the committees.

2036. So that it is the committees who have got the control, but not the quarter sessions?—Yes, that is so.

2037. So that the quarter sessions have not got much influence?—No control at all, you may say, except as to the appointment of committees.

2038. But the committees have very considerable control over the expenditure, have they not?—Yes, considerable. Of course the quarter sessions could decline to find the money for repairs, but practically that is a very small control.

2039. As regards the repairs the quarter sessions have more control by law, have they not?—Yes, they have to find the money, and therefore they, no doubt, could refuse to do the repairs.

2040. "Repairs," is an elastic item, I presume, in a large establishment?—I think it is very moderate. Upon this building, which cost 420,000 l., the repairs do not average more than 4,000 l. a year, which is only 1 per cent., and when you remember the destructiveness of lunatics, I think it is a very moderate amount.

2041. But it would be very easy to run it up, if there were not vigilance and good order?—Unquestionably; if you have not competent officers no doubt it would be so.

2042. If there were not competent officers, and a vigilant committee, this amount, which is under the control of, and overhauled more or less by the quarter sessions, might be very much increased?—Very likely.

2043. As regards the county bridges, that is a very small item?—A small amount of about 700 l. or 800 l. a year in Middlesex.

2044. It was stated that the quarter sessions had no control over that item; do you concur in that?—They are obliged to keep them in repair; I believe there are 20 bridges, so that there is not much room for extravagance upon that head.

2045. As regards the militia, the item is 3,441 l.; what have you to say with regard to that?—I do not think they have any control over that, excepting keeping the building in repair.

2046. The next item in the memorandum is Incidental Expenses about 3,000 l.; how is that made up?—There are several small items which make up that amount.

2047. Have you considered at all the question of the payment of rate by the owner instead of by the occupier, as regards the county rate?—I think it would be very unfair upon the owner; the owner has let his land at a fixed rate.

2049. If

29 March 1870.

2049. If we were to change the law in the course of this year and put the rate upon the owner, and a new lunatic asylum were to be built two years afterwards, would it make any difference whether the rate is upon the owner or upon the occupier?—I think the owner would charge for it in his agreement with his tenant.

2050. Before he knew whether it would be built?—I think he would take that into consideration; it might be impossible to adjust it exactly.

2051. And he would be able to get so much more from the tenant?—I think so.

2052. Would not that depend on supply and demand?—I think no more than it is now; the tenant gives him a price, fully understanding that he has got to pay the rates.

2053. Take the case of long leases, and an increase in the rate during the existence of a lease, would not it make a great difference as to whether the rates were to be put upon the owner or the occupier?—Yes, but the tenant has by contract undertaken that liability.

2054. Then if the rates have increased to the extent which it is generally alleged they have increased, the tenant made a bad bargain?—No doubt.

2056. And that, on that assumption, it is fair in principle, looking to the fact that all permanent improvements which are spread over a long number of years should be borne by the temporary occupiers whose leases may expire long before the improvement is paid for?—I think if you look at it in this way, those temporary occupiers enjoy all the advantages of their predecessors; their costly buildings and the considerable sums that they have expended, and they only pay during their occupation one-thirtieth; because most of those improvements are spread over 30 years, and therefore they only pay one-thirtieth during each year.

2057. As regards the question of administration, have you heard of any complaints in the county of Middlesex as to the non-representation of the ratepayers?—There has been a little, but I think less in the county of Middlesex probably than in many agricultural counties.

2058. Have you given any attention to the question of the representation of the ratepayers in county matters?—I believe that it would add largely to the expenditure.

2060. You think on the whole that the magistracy is a safer body to trust the expenditure of the rates to, than the representatives of the ratepayers?—Far safer, I think.

2061. Not only as regards liberality of expenditure, but as regards economy?—I think so.

2062. Mr. Ayrton.] Are you aware that if you add the police rate to the county rate, the county rate in Middlesex is higher than in any other county in England?—I think that is the result; but you must bear in mind that no county in England has the same amount of lunatics or prisoners that Middlesex has.

2063. What do you ascribe that to?—It is just this, I believe, that the paupers all flock to London, and criminals in the same way flock to London, and they ultimately get thrown upon the county of Middlesex.

2064. Mr. Rathbone.] Do not you think that if the rates were thrown partially on the owners, and in that way caught the owners of ground rents and others after the expiration of the leases, those parties would look more sharply after the rates, and take more interest in their expenditure than they do now?—I am afraid that they could not do it in the metropolis; they might do it in country places, but I think that representation in the metropolis is really more theoretical than anything else; you cannot in those large districts get any influence to bear.

2065. You do not think that if those men felt increased taxation in case of any extravagance, they would take an interest in preventing that extravagance?—I do not think they would.

2068. That would add nearly one-third to the cost of the lunatics?—Yes.

2069. There is a loss to the county, you may say, as far as foreign lunatics come in question, of about 3 s. per head, is there not?—No, we charge lunatics belonging to other counties, 14 s. a week.

2070. I mean the criminal lunatics that come to you under the Government?—That we cannot help; we have to pay for them; the county loses that.

2071. So that a county ratepayer has to pay the cost of lunatics with whom he may have no local connection whatever?—Yes; the county of Middlesex is at this moment paying 15,000 l. a year on that score only.

2073. Would you be prepared to bring ground-rent and personal property into a category of that sort?—I think that the expenses are just as much for the protection of personal property as where a man gets his income from houses and land.

2075. You would rate the one, and you would rate the other?—Yes, I think so.

2076. Sir James Lawrence.] With regard to the suggestion that the county rate should be placed upon the landowner, your reply was that he would make it up by charging an increased rent; will you tell me how that could possibly be done with a rate of 2¼ d. in the pound; supposing the county rate were to be placed upon the owner instead of the occupier, in what way could the owner recoup himself as to charging an extra rent, taking an average rent of 50 l. a year; how could could a man obtain more rent than that 50 l. if he had to pay the county rate instead of the occupier paying?—He would probably put on another pound to secure himself.

2077. Would he get 51 l. where he has 50 l. now?—Yes.

2079. Mr. Seely.] We have heard a great deal about the control which the magistrates have over those establishments, and you expressed an opinion that they had no control; I suppose the committee of visitors have just the same control as the owner of any other large establishment, and that they exercise that control in exactly the same manner?—The committee of visitors have the entire control.

2080. Mr. Gregory.] Would you have any considerable difficulty in ascertaining what "owner" really meant in respect of metropolitan property?—I should think it very difficult.

2081. You have first the ground landlord, then you have the owner of the improved rent, then you have the lessee under him; then you have the immediate lessor, and then you have the occupier, is not that so?—Yes, I think it would be very difficult indeed.

2082. And you have the mortgagee in many cases?—Yes, very often.

2083. And all those might come under the term owner?—Yes.

2084. Mr. Birley.] You say that the owner of the property would recoup himself by charging an extra rent, but how would that be in the case of a 99 years' lease?—Then, of course, the owner would have to lose.

2085. Mr. Backhouse.] I think you answered the Chairman that you considered it would be very unfair to place the rate half upon the owner and half upon the occupier, on account of previous agreements; what would be your opinion in the case of a rate for an entirely new object, would it not be fair in that case to divide between the occupier and the owner a rate not contemplated at the time of entering into the agreement?—I think if the honourable Member's question as to who was the owner was explained, I could answer better. I will take the case of the Duke of Bedford with 10 l. ground rent, where, perhaps, the premises are worth 150 l. a year, is he to pay one half upon 150 l. a year; he would, perhaps, get only 7 l. out of his 10 l. ground rent.

2086. I am speaking of the ordinary ownership of land, taking an agricultural landlord and tenant?—That hardly applies to Middlesex, because there is so very little agricultural land in it.

2087. Are you able to state how often the assessment is corrected in the county of Middlesex?—It used to be every five years, and I believe it was to be every three years; but I suppose that the new assessment Act will govern it now.

2089. Have you any opinion as to the expenditure upon coroners in the county of Middlesex?—Yes; it is a most serious matter, and it is really a matter that nobody now but the Legislature can help. The coroners used to be paid by fees upon each case, and then the magistrates had the power of disallowing any fees for any unnecessary inquests, but a few years ago that was altered, and they have a fixed sum which was settled then by the Secretary of State; for though the magistrates had the power of settling it, the coroners, on appeal to the Secretary of State, altered it as far as Middlesex was concerned; that is subject to revision every five years. In the case of one coroner, we began with 1,200 l. a-year, and on the revision of five years the inquests had increased so much that he got it up to 1,700 l. I think three years of the next five have gone, and there is every prospect that it will be 2,200 l. at the next revision; therefore it is practically paying him by fees, and there is no control over it.

2090. Does the coroner hold inquests at his own discretion?—Yes, entirely. 13,000 l. last year it cost the county of Middlesex for coroners.

2092. To the effect that useless and unnecessary inquests are held?—They believe so, to a large extent.

2094. Would you be prepared to increase the number of lunatics in Colney Hatch beyond 2,060, which you state to be the number at present?—I do not think that, as regards the management of the lunatics, there would be any difficulty. The great difficulty there would be the disposal of the sewage; but I do not think there would be any difficulty as regards the management of the lunatics.

2095. You are of opinion that the number may be increased with economy, as far as the cost per head is concerned?—I think so.

2096. Does the same remark apply to prisons, as far as you are aware?—I have no doubt it does to a certain extent. The cost of our prison at Coldbath Fields last year was 19 l. 4 s. each prisoner.

2097. Mr. St. Aubyn.] In answer to a question from the Chairman, you said that, in your opinion, more extravagance and jobbery would prevail under the management of a body elected from the ratepayers than under the management of the present irresponsible body; would you have any objection to tell the Committee the grounds upon which you arrive at that conclusion?—It is a difficult question to answer, but that is my experience. I see very strange doings amongst those elected men, if they are not of a class of society to be restrained by the force of public opinion.

2099. Mr. Walter.] Are you a guardian of the poor, as well as a magistrate?—I am an ex officio guardian.

Mr. W. H. Wyatt.

29 March 1870.

2100. Do you happen to know the amount of the poor rate of the county of Middlesex?—No, I do not remember.

2101. Chairman.] What provisions for audit are there as regards the county expenditure?—The county treasurer keeps all the accounts, and then there is a committee appointed, who audit them every quarter.

2102. There is no professional auditor?—No professional auditor. They are published; there is a quarterly account in which every payment is set forth.

2103. You have not an audit by any one who has the power to make surcharges or disallowances; that is to say, there is no similar audit applied to county expenditure like there is to to the poor law expenditure, or to the expenditure of local boards?—No.

2104. As regards the question of administration, you no not think that it would be improved by elected representatives from the occupiers, as I understand you?—No, I think not.

2105. What do you say if the rate were put upon the owner direct, to giving the owner a direct representation, instead of the present system?—I do not think it would be done more economically.

2106. You have not had in your mind any scheme for giving the owner direct representation on county financial boards, or any scheme of that kind?—No.

2107. With regard to the poor rate, the difficulty in the poor rate is to elect representatives to administer it; what would be your view of putting a certain portion of the poor rate upon the owners as well as upon the occupiers?—I think the same remark applies, that it would really be unjust on present contracts. If you make new arrangements, of course that might be done. I may say this, that I think it would be far better that the owners should elect representatives, instead of the magistrates being ex officio guardians.

2109. Why do you hold strongly that, as regards the county finance, it is not necessary to have the elective principle, whereas you think that, as regards the administration of the relief of the poor, it would be advisable to substitute the elected representatives of the owners for the present system of ex officio guardians?—My reply applies entirely to the metropolis; and I think it would do there, because the ex officio guardians have a fresh duty cast upon them, and the magistracy have not taken to it in the same way, perhaps, that they might have done if they had always had the duty to perform.

2110. Do you think also that the representatives of the occupiers would consider that the elected representatives had got more right to interfere in parochial matters than ex officio guardians?—I think if the owners paid a portion of the rate, they would.

2111. Would not that be rather an argument in favour of the owners paying a portion of the rate, that they might then be entitled to a fair share of the representation?—There the difficulty comes in, as to who is to be defined as the owner.

2112. You are aware how the income tax is charged upon the owner, namely, that it is levied upon the occupier, who can deduct it from the owner?—Yes, he deducts as much in the pound as he pays; but if a man has got a house worth 50 l. a year, and the ground-rent is only 5 l., he only deducts income tax upon the 5 l.

2113. Do you see any difficulty in applying a similar arrangement to rates?—No; I think it would be a very beneficial arrangement.

2115. Anyone who had got a house, for which he was paying 200*l.* a year, therefore would deduct, say half his rate in the pound, from his 200*l.* a year?—Yes.

2119. Therefore they would only fall upon the owner in a different shape?—Yes, in the case of a new agreement.

2120. It would be direct, instead of indirect, would it not?—Yes.

2121. And the owner would know that he was paying?—Yes; and I think it would be a great improvement if he was to have a voice in the representation by electing a certain number of representatives.

2122. Do you think that the present system of plurality of votes works well?—I think so.

2123. Do the owners take as much part in the elections as the occupiers?—No.

2124. Would the owners, if they put forth their full strength by their plurality of votes, be any match for the occupiers of the metropolis as regards the number of votes? — The owners would be so scattered that it would be excessively difficult to get at them.

2125. The owners are registered now, I presume, for the purposes of plurality votes?—No, not unless a man claims it; the occupiers only are put on.

2126. Can you state whether the owners generally do make that claim?—No, not one out of 500 makes a claim.

2127. So that the number of those registered altogether must be small, and the total number of owners who take part in those elections is quite infinitesimal?—Yes, quite. I may tell you that last year in St. Pancras the number of owners, I do not think, were 20 who claimed for the whole parish.

2128. How many votes do you happen to know were registered altogether for the election of the guardians of St. Pancras?—There were 19,000 voters.

2129. If the owners were to obtain a direct representation, representation, you would prefer, would you not, that the owners should elect a certain number separately?—Yes, quite separately; it would be no use without.

2130. Do you think that that would be likely to produce antagonism at the board between the representatives of the owners and the occupiers?—No, only inasmuch as they would probably be rather a different class of men, they would take different views.

2131. If the owners of various classes were paying a portion of the rate, there would not be the feeling that exists now, at people interfering without paying?—No, I do not think that there would.

2132. I gather from your evidence, that you see a strong argument in favour of putting a portion of the rate on the owners in that way, for the purpose of giving them more locus standi in the administration of affairs?—I think that would be an advantage.

2135. Mr. Gregory.] It is suggested to you that the rate might be deducted like the income tax; does not that assume that the rating must be upon the full rental?—Yes; or else I suppose there must be some abatement made, which would be very difficult to arrive at.

2137. Then he would have to do a Rule of Three sum in every assessment?—Yes, he would have to do so. But, however, the New Assessment Act will provide for that very much; it lays down the basis upon which all properties are to be assessed, and it will come into operation next November. At present there are certain deductions made for certain classes of property.

2138. Would that apply between the tenant and his immediate landlord?—I think it would.

2141. Chairman.] Supposing that all other income were not rated, would you nevertheless be in favour of rating the owner to the poor rate, on account of the considerations which you have stated to the Committee?—I think there would be so many advantages in direct representation on the part of the owner, that I think it would really be worth some sacrifice on his part to secure it.

2142. If you were to put the rate upon the owner for the future, you would not be putting him in a worse position upon the whole than he is in now, provided you give him free liberty to contract as he likes?—Not in future contracts; I do not think it would hurt him in the least; I think he would rather benefit by it.

2144. That Act I presume, has not reference to all England?—No, only to the metropolis.

Mr. Francis H. N. Glossop, called in; and Examined.

2145. Chairman.] You are Chairman of the Committee of Coldbath Fields Prison, are you not?—Yes, I am.

2146. And you are acquainted with the administration of that portion of the county rate especially which is spent on prisons?—Yes.

2147. Have you been connected with any other House of Correction?—Many years ago I was on the committee of the House of Detention, but not latterly.

2148. Can you state the various establishments in what you may call the criminal part of the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions?—The House of Correction in Coldbath Fields, the Westminster Prison for Women, and the House of Detention at Clerkenwell, which is for prisoners before trial.

2150. Can you state to the Committee what you spend upon the industrial and reformatory schools?—The expenditure on the Industrial School at Feltham was 13,936*l.* in the year 1869, not including the interest of monies borrowed.

2151. Are those what you may call the administrative expenses?—Yes. I should say that there was a payment made by the Lords of the Treasury, which is included in the gross sum I have named.

2153. I see the total expenditure under this head amounts to 22,000*l.*; do you consider that the

29 March 1870.

the whole of that is an optional expenditure?—I do.

2156. I see in this Paper which has been handed in, that, with regard to the industrial and reformatory school, it is said that even over the whole expenditure it is considered that the quarter sessions have but little control; that is not your opinion, as you consider that they have adopted the expenditure voluntarily?—We adopted it voluntarily. The Act only says that the county may establish such schools; it does not say that they shall.

2158. Will you state to the Committee how you stand as regards the maintenance of the prisons, and the contributions from the Government; the allowance from the Treasury for the prosecution and transporting of prisoners will amount to about 38,000*l.*, I think?—I have it entered in this way: the Treasury pay for certain prisoners committed from the sessions, and for prisoners committed under the Criminal Justice Act, 4*s.* a week for each; and the payments from the Treasury in the year 1869 for such prisoners amounted to 23,500*l.* There was a payment of 5,500*l.* for boys in the Middlesex Industrial School, and I have the figure down as 12,000*l.* paid by the Treasury to recoup the county for the prosecution of prisoners.

2159. The Government allow you 4*s.* a week per head for the prisoners; what do they cost?—The cost per annum for diet, clothing, salaries, pensions, and repairs, I have down as 19*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* each prisoner. From the amount which I have stated, I think Mr. Wyatt deducted the cash paid to the county treasurer for receipts from prisoners' labour about 10*s.*

2161. Do you know upon what principle the 4*s.* a week has been fixed upon as the contribution from the Government?—I am under the impression that that is for diet and clothing.

2162. And that they do not contribute to the other charges?—No, I think not.

2163. Are you aware whether that sum of 4*s.* has been always received for some years past?—For as long as I can remember.

2165. Have you ever heard any complaints as to the 4*s.* being an insufficient payment; has that point ever been raised at the quarter sessions?—I think not.

2166. Have you found any inconvenience from the police not being under the jurisdiction of the magistrates of the county of Middlesex?—I am the chairman of the Brentford petty sessions, where we have to perform nearly all the duties of a police court, and, of course, speaking as chairman of that division, I should prefer to have some authority over the police.

2167. But, practically, no great inconvenience has resulted in London from the division of the duties?—No.

2168. You are obliged to make arrangements with the police continually, I presume, as regards the care and protection of the prisoners and the prisons on certain occasions?—No; I only know of one occasion on which that has been necessary.

2169. Colonel Brise.] I think you stated that the expenditure on the industrial schools of 22,000*l.* a year, was entirely under the control of the magistrates; if the ratepayers had elected those who administer that expenditure, do you think that the Act would have been put into operation as it has been?—I believe that the Industrial School at Feltham would never have been built.

2170. And if the administration had been in the hands of owners who had been elected, would it have been in existence?—Possibly it would.

2171. Sir James Lawrence.] What length of time do children remain in that industrial school?—Boys are now sent to us under two Acts of Parliament; those sent under the Middlesex Act are detained for three years; we also now have a certificate under the Industrial Schools Act of 1866, and the boys who are sent to us under that Act are sent to be detained until they are 16 years of age. Therefore, a boy sent at 10 years old may be detained for six years.

2172. What becomes of the boys afterwards?—We take very great pains to prepare them to earn an honest living. A great many of them are trained in music and are enlisted into the regimental bands; many are trained for matters relating to the sea, and are sent to sea in merchant ships, and some few we have trained in agriculture and sent to Canada. We are sending, at the present moment, two a week to Canada.

2173. And some to Australia?—We find the expense of emigration to Australia too great. We have sent a few to Australia, but we can send three boys to Canada for the same expense as one to Australia.

Out

29 March 1870.

Out of 12 boys concerning whom we had reports some time ago, I think 11 were reported to be doing very well, and of the twelfth it was merely said that he had left his situation, and was a restless boy.

2176. Mr. Birley.] You have said that there is no inconvenience, in your opinion, in the police not being under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates in Middlesex; does that remark apply as well to the rural districts as to the urban districts?—Yes, to the rural districts of Middlesex. I know nothing of the administration of the police in London proper.

2177. You think that there is no inconvenience in the police in the rural districts being removed from the control of the county magistrates?—I think not.

2179. Mr. W. H. Smith.] You mentioned that there were three Middlesex prisons, the House of Correction, the Westminster Prison for Women, and the House of Detention; the Industrial Reformatory School is very much in the nature of a prison charge upon the county, is it not?—Yes.

2180. In addition to those four prisons, there are the City prisons maintained by the City, are there not?—Yes.

2181. Do the City contribute to the county rate?—We have nothing to do with the City prisons.

2182. Then the City does not contribute to the prison charges of the county?—No.

2183. You have been called upon to erect an additional prison, have you not?—Yes, I think the Secretary of State did call the attention of the magistrates to the deficient accommodation in the prisons.

2184. But you have not yet incurred that expense?—No.

2186. Whilst you maintain them at 19*l.*?—Yes, and to the 22*l.* per head must be added that they cost us at least 2*l.* for sending and bringing back, and there is the loss of the prisoner's labour during the time he is absent.

2187. But still the contribution from the Government remains the same, namely 4*s.* a week for an ordinary prisoner, or 8*s.* a week for a penal servitude prisoner?—Yes.

2189. So that the Treasury contribute only about one-fourth of the total cost?—That is so; and the great hardship to the county of Middlesex is, that many of those prisoners are not persons belonging to the county; and that applies also to the Industrial School, for the boys in the Industrial School are by no means Middlesex boys; they have drifted towards the metropolis from all parts of the country.

2191. Chairman.] You have heard Mr. Wyatt's evidence upon the rating of the owners, will you state to the Committee your view upon that point?—I am afraid I should get into the same difficulty that Mr. Wyatt did; but I agree with Mr. Wyatt that there would be some advantage in the incidence of the rates upon the owner, certainly, if it was connected with direct representation upon the boards of guardians.

2192. Are you a guardian of the poor?—Ex officio.

2193. Have you attended to parochial work as ex officio guardian?—Not recently; I did a few years ago, and I discontinued it.

2194. Have you formed an opinion as to whether it would be better for elected representatives of the owners to attend at the boards of guardians rather than the present ex officio guardians?—I think so, certainly. At the board which I occasionally attended, I found that there was a prejudice against the attendance of ex officio members of the board; they were looked upon rather as intruders.

2195. On account of their not paying any portion of the rates?—They certainly do pay rates; my experience is that we do pay rates.

Mr. Danby P. Fry, called in; and further Examined.

Mr. D. P. Fry

2196. Chairman.] Can you state to the Committee the present law as regards highway rates?—On the last occasion, I think I stated that the work which I referred to was prepared in 1846. Since that year very important changes have been made in the law relating to the highway rates.

2197. Will you state briefly the changes in the law with regard to the highway rate?—In 1844, in consequence of the Rebecca Riots in 1840 and 1841, the South Wales Highway Act was passed, which established a county roads board in each of the six counties of South Wales, which was to manage the turnpike roads in each of those counties, and with power to supplement the reduced tolls by a county road rate; that was the first important change in the highway rate; that was limited to the six counties of South Wales, and formed the model upon which the subsequent general law was made. The rate was to be levied like an ordinary county rate, but there was an express provision empowering the occupier to deduct the amount of the annual rate from his rent.

2198. And that was the first allowance of deduction of rate from the owner as regards highways?—Yes; of course it was under very peculiar circumstances; it entirely arose out of the dissatisfaction with turnpikes, and it was to set the turnpike question right that it was established.

2199. Is that Act still in force?—It is substantially in force; but in 1851 and in 1860 amending Acts were passed, by which highway districts and highway boards were formed in the six counties of South Wales. The first Act in 1844 established a county roads board for the whole county; in 1851 highway districts were formed in each county, and a highway board for each district, and that Act was amended in 1860, and those are the two Acts which are now in force.

2200. Did the amendment of the law change the state of things as regards the deduction of the rate from the owner?—Yes; in those districts in which the highway boards were thus formed certain districts have been taken out of the operation of these Acts and placed under the Local Government Act; but those are special exceptions, and so far those particular districts of course are not under the operation of these general Acts, but are under the Local Government Act of 1858; but as regards the rest of the country the boards are to manage the highways and to take also the turnpike roads. For that purpose each board is to call for the money which it requires, from the overseers of the several parishes which are wholly or partly within the district. Then the overseers are to raise that money by a separate rate on the parish or part of the parish, and that rate is to be levied in the following way: it is to be levied on the persons, and in respect of the property by law rateable to the relief of the poor, and it is also to be assessed upon the net annual value of such property ascertained by the rate for the time being for the relief of the poor.

2201. To what portion of the country does that Act apply?—To the six counties in South Wales; but though it is to be levied in respect of property rateable to the poor rate, and the value was to be ascertained in the same manner, there is a proviso "that the rate shall also extend to such woods, mines, and quarries of stone, or other hereditaments, as were, before the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, usually rated to the highways;" so that it is really a highway rate. There is no provision as to the occupier deducting it from the owner.

2202. As regards the rest of the country, will you state to the Committee what changes have occurred since 1844?—In 1862 this plan, which had been adopted in South Wales, was virtually extended to the rest of the country. A similar system of boards and districts was extended permissively to the rest of England and Wales. That is, of course, subject to certain exceptions where there are other authorities acting. Perhaps I had better state what those exceptions are, because in those districts this Highway District Act is not in force.

2203. Before you do that, will you state the constitution of the highway board that administer the rate?—Each highway board, after the district is formed, is to consist of waywardens, who are elected in the several places within the district, and of justices acting for the county and residing within the district.

2204. How are the waywardens themselves appointed?—In every parish forming part of a highway district, there shall be elected every year, for the year next ensuing, a waywarden, or such a number of waywardens as may be determined by order of the justices. They are to be elected in every parish.

2205. By whom are they elected?—"Such waywarden or waywardens shall be elected in every parish forming part of a highway district, at the meeting and time and in the manner and subject to the same qualification, and the same power of appointment in the justices, in the event of no election taking place, or in the event of a vacancy, at in and subject to which a person or persons to serve the office of surveyor would have been chosen or appointed if this Act had not passed." They are to be elected in the same way as the surveyors, under the old Highway Act.

2207. Then the waywarden practically represents the elective element, and the justices represent the ex officio element?—Yes, quite so; it is similar to the constitution of the board of guardians.

2208. Do you happen to know how far the number of waywardens would depend upon the number of parishes included in the district?—The number of waywardens is to be determined by order of the justices, but upon what principle they proceed in determining it I do not know.

2209. Therefore the justices practically determine how many of them are to sit with them as waywardens, subject to having at least one from each parish?—Yes, subject to having one from each parish, they may determine the rest.

2210. Mr. Fielden.] Is there any qualification for a waywarden?—No, I do not think that there is any specific qualification in the Act; he must be elected in the same manner as the surveyor; I do not think there is any further qualification.

2211. Chairman.] Are the justices residing in the adjoining parish also qualified to act in certain cases?—The Act says, "the justices acting for the county, and residing within the district;" I do not think that there is any alteration in that; there is a provision as to ex officio waywardens.

2212. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Ex officio waywardens are justices residing in the neighbourhood; what is their exact qualification?—The 27 & 28 Vic. c. 101, s. 29, states the qualification of ex officio waywardens:—"A justice of the peace acting for the county in which a highway district is situate, if he is resident in any place which is prohibited, either altogether or without the consent of the local authority, from being included in a highway district, by the 7th section of the Highway Act of 1862, and which is surrounded by or adjoins in any part such highway district, shall, by virtue of his office, be a member of the highway board of such district, subject to the qualification, that if in pursuance of this section any justice of the peace would be entitled to be a member of two or more highway boards in the same county, he shall by letter under his hand addressed to the clerk of the highway board for which he elects to act, and by him to be transmitted to the clerk of the peace of the county declare of which of the said highway boards he elects to be a member, and having made the election he shall be bound thereby, and shall not be entitled, by virtue of his office of justice, to be a member of any other of the said boards."

2213. It comes to this, that if a justice of the peace lives in a parish which is under the management of a local board, and is not within a highway district, and which parish adjoins a highway district already formed, the justice is qualified to act as ex officio waywarden of the board of such district?—Yes; I suppose that is the result.

2214. Chairman.] Will you go on with your statement as to how the Act had been adopted for the country generally, after having been tried in six counties in Wales?—Those places were excepted cepted by the Act which were already, in fact, provided for. I am speaking of the Highway Act of 1862, and it was not to apply to any of the following places:—First of all South Wales itself, then the Isle of Wight, which was provided for by a local Act; then any district under the Public Health Act, or Local Government Act; then any parish or place, the highways of which were at the time of the passing of this Act, or might be within six months afterwards under the superintendence of a board, established in pursuance of section 18 of the principal Act, that is, the Highway Act of 1835, unless with the consent of such board. Under the Highway Act of 1835, highway boards might be elected under particular circumstances, and where they existed at the time of the passing of this Act they would continue to exist, unless with their own consent abolished.

2215. Did some doubt arise as to whether those highway boards could levy a highway rate in the old way?—The provision of the Act of 1862 was subsequently altered, and a new provision was made in the Highway Act of 1864.

2217. Under the new series of Highway Acts, has the effect been that the highway rate is not levied separately under these highway boards as it was before, but it is paid out of the poor rate?—It is paid out of the poor rate, generally speaking; in fact, with two exceptions; in one case, if the highway parish is not conterminus with the poor law parish, then the precept is to be sent to the waywarden, who makes a separate rate in the highway parish—in the other case, where the highway rate was formerly levied upon a particular class of property—that is, woods and mines, or quarries, under the Highway Act of 1835—then that is to be continued, and the precept is to be sent to the waywarden, although the highway parish and the poor law parish may be conterminus.

2218. Those are exceptions, but the great bulk is raised now by precept, through the board of guardians or the overseers?—Yes; a very large proportion, no doubt, is so.

2219. Are you aware that in the Poor Law Returns every year there has been, since the introduction of those Acts, an item beginning at about half a million, and now considerably beyond that, stating the payments to the highway boards out of the poor rate?—Yes; to the highway boards out of the poor rate levied by the overseers.

2220. Those represent sums, do they not, which were formerly paid out of the highway rate?—Yes.

2221. Formerly there was a separate rate levied as highway rate, but since this Act was passed that large sum has been put upon the poor rate, which is nominally increased by that amount?—Yes; but which has been decided by the Court of Queen's Bench to be still really a highway rate.

2222. It is so far really a highway rate, that in a case where any owner is exempt from the highway rate, when the amount is paid out of the poor rate, an allowance is made to him in respect of that portion of the poor rate which goes to the highway board?—That was the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of the Queen v. Heath, in which the question came before them upon a claim of exemption.

2223. The state of the law is this, is it not, that although, generally speaking, the highway rate covers the same ground as the poor rate, there is certain property which is exempt from poor rate which is liable to highway rate, and certain property which is exempt from highway rate which is liable to poor rate?—Quite so, in both ways.

2224. Are you aware of any audit which is applied to those funds after they have been paid over from the poor rate to the district board?—That is not a matter which has come within my cognizance at all. Of course, the payments by the overseers are audited by the poor law auditors.

2225. Mr. Gregory.] That South Wales Act that you spoke of was more for the satisfaction of the lady called Rebecca, was it not?—It was in consequence of the Rebecca Riots.

2226. And it only embraced certain portions of South Wales?—It embraced the whole of the six counties of South Wales.

2227. Do I understand you that there was a subsequent Act passed amending that one?—There was.

2228. Was it under that subsequent Act that the turnpike roads were thrown into the highway districts?—No, that was under the first Act. The first Act was passed, and the county roads board was established, in order to settle the question of turnpikes, and they were to get rid of it.

2229. By that Act you say that the turnpike roads were thrown upon the county roads board; what arrangement was made to provide for the debt and repairs?—The tolls were to be continued to be levied as fixed by the Act.

2230. Were the tolls to be taken at the turnpikes?—They still continued, I believe; I am not aware that there were any abolished.

2231. As I understand, the object of the Act was to get rid of turnpikes?—No; I do not know that it was to get rid of them; it was to place them under the management of the county roads board.

2232. Did it lower the tolls?—Yes, it lowered the tolls.

2233. I presume there was a certain amount of liability that was covered by the toll previously, which was thrown upon the highway boards?—I really do not know what the practical working was, but I presume it was so; it was done for that purpose.

2237. Did the Act of 1844, after the Rebecca Riots, deal with the basis of assessment at all?—It

29 March 1870.

It was to be collected like a county rate, but the occupier was to deduct it from his rent, and the owner was to pay it.

2238. Then the highway rate assesses mines and minerals, which in the poor law assessment are excluded, except coal mines and quarries?—In certain cases it does. It is only in those cases, i.e., in those particular parishes in which those properties, mines and woods, were by custom assessed to the highway rate previously to the passing of the Act of 1835. It is not uniform to that extent; for where mines and woods had been rated prior to the Act of 1835, they continued to be rated, and they still continue to be rated to the highway rate under the general law; but to what extent that prevails I do not know as a matter of fact.

2240. That is, provided he had been liable before the Act?—No, the two things are quite distinct, as I understand. The rating of the occupier of the land in the shape of ore, to the poor rate, would extend to the highway rate, in so far as the highway rate is assessed in the same manner as the poor rate; but in addition to that, prior to the passing of the Act of 1835, occupiers of woods and mines generally were rated to the highway rate by custom in particular parishes; and in those particular parishes the custom was preserved and, in fact, enacted by law; but that would be a different thing from the rating of the occupier of the land in the shape of ore.

2241. Therefore, it depends upon what the custom was before the Act, whether such mines are now rated to the highway rate or not?—Quite so. There is an express decision of the Court of Queen's Bench that it does not go beyond that. The Act of 1835 did not have the effect of rendering woods and mines rateable generally to the highway rate; but it only continued the custom in the particular parishes in which it had previously existed.

2242. Can you state what case that was?—It is Regina v. Rose, in 13 Law Journal, which was decided shortly after the passing of the Act of 1835. The words "usually rated" have been held by the courts to refer to such woods, &c. as had usually been rated, in point of fact, in the particular parish in which the rate is made; not to such as were generally rateable before the passing of the Act.

2243. Mr. Corrance.] You observe that the turnpike toll had become more distinctly a tax upon the person; it being a tax upon the person under the original Act only to a limited extent; do you see any reason why it should be a tax upon the person as well as upon the property?—The turnpike toll is a tax upon the person who uses the road; but it is not a personal tax, it is a payment for service rendered.

2244. Then do you recognise this principle, that use should determine the tax?—No; I did not say I thought so; it is so, as a matter of fact, in the case of the turnpikes; but whether it should be so is another question.

2245. You adopt the principle that those who use the roads should pay for them?—I think that the turnpike toll is the most equitable tax that you can possibly levy; but at the same time it is a most impracticable one. It is one that never has been levied without dissatisfaction.

2246. Are you aware that the highway rate, on its present basis, falls upon quite the poorer class of householders?—It falls, in common, upon the poor and the rich.

2249. In its present form, falling as it does, do you consider that it falls upon town and country in equal proportions?—That is not a question which I have at all examined, whether it is in equal proportions.

2250. Does the occupier of a house pay so much upon his income as the occupier of landed property?—That depends entirely upon what his income is, or rather what the two incomes are; income is not at all in the ratio of the house that a man occupies.

2251. Are you aware that under the original Act even now, for there has been no Act exempting it, stock-in-trade in towns is distinctly liable for highway rate?—I fancy that is the law; but it has never been so decided.

2253. Are you also aware that that assessment has never been enforced in practice?—On personal property as far as regards highways: I am not sure that it has never been enforced anywhere in practice. There are places in which personal property is still rated to the poor rate under local Acts; and it may be in those places that it is rated equally to the highways. Most likely it is, I should think.

2256. You prefer that to placing the county rate in the poor rate series?—Yes; since 1846 the law has been altogether altered with regard to these rates; and the classification, which I then made, is really not so applicable now as it was then, the modification of the law having put it to some extent upon a different principle. The poor rate itself has come to be very much a rate for an aggregate district virtually, because it is raised for a union in which the whole expenditure

ture is in common, and it is contributed by the several parishes. It is, therefore, quite analagous to the mode in which the county rate is levied, and in the highway districts the highway rate seems to me to rest upon the same footing, being contributed by the several units, the different parishes or places, as a common fund out of which the expenditure is to be paid.

2257. Do you know whether the expenses have generally increased in those districts which are under highway boards?—I am not able to make a comparison between the area which is within the districts and the rest of the country; but as far as I can judge from the statistics which I prepared in 1846, there does not seem to be any very material increase.

2258. Does not a good deal depend upon the surveyor?—I dare say it does in particular districts; but looking at the country as a whole, the amount of the highway rate in 1846 was not much less than it is now.

2260. Does not it usually happen that a well-informed official can influence his ostensible employer?—No doubt.

2261. Mr. Walter.] You stated, in answer to the honourable Member for East Suffolk, that you considered the system of turnpikes particularly equitable; may I ask upon what grounds you form that opinion?—It appears to me that nothing could be more equitable than that the persons who use the road should pay for the use of it; provided, of course, that the tolls are assessed upon an equitable basis.

2262. Can you state what class of persons use the roads?—Both those who ride on horses and those who drive in carriages, and also those who use them for traffic and goods.

2263. Then it is not in your knowledge that the persons who walk on foot ever use the roads?—I should not think that they do much damage to what is called the carriage road.

2264. Is it then simply upon the question of damage that you consider a tax on roads justifiable, and not on the use?—Yes, the damage done by the use. The toll, as I apprehend, is levied for the purpose of repairing the road, and the repair is rendered necessary by the use.

2265. Does not the weather affect the road as well as use; do not rain, snow, and other causes of that kind affect the roads?—No doubt.

2266. Then it is possible that the persons who walk, and neither ride nor drive, may derive considerable benefit from the use of the roads as well as those who ride and drive?—If that could be shown it would be a ground, no doubt, for charging them a proportion of the toll.

2267. Do they pay anything under the turnpike system?—Not that I am aware of.

2269. Is not a good footpath of some value to a person who uses it for walking?—Certainly.

2270. As far, then, as a hard road is better than a soft and muddy one for a pedestrian, so far he derives use from that road, and ought to be liable to contribute towards its repair, ought he not?—That would be a very good ground for imposing upon him a portion of the toll.

2271. Under the turnpike system he contributes nothing?—I believe not.

2272. Is not that class by far the larger class of the community that uses the roads?—I should think that they are not the class that do the greatest damage to a road, although they may be the largest in point of numbers that use the road.

2273. Under the system of the highway rate, is it not likely that some proportion of the class of persons who walk, but do not use the roads for riding or driving, will contribute something towards their repairs?—I think it is very likely that, under the highway rate, a great many people would contribute who never use the road at all, and, therefore, I think it is by no means so equitable.

2274. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] In some parts of England is it not the township and not the parish that elect the way-wardens?—Yes, those are highway parishes; but that has to be fixed by the justices. They have to determine what places are to be included within the district.

2275. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Are you aware of any instances in which the highway rate has been levied on stock-in-trade in towns?—I am not aware of any instance in which the highway rate separately has been so levied; but there are still existing places in which, under Local Acts, personal property is rateable to the poor rates, stock-in-trade and shipping, and property of that kind, and I should apprehend that in those places it would be equally rateable and actually rated to the highway rate. If it is rated to the poor rate I should think it is rated to the highway rate, as a matter of course.

2276. But you cannot mention any specific instance?—I cannot mention any instance in which I know as a fact that it is rated to the highway rate. I merely infer from the fact of its being rated to the poor rate, that it would be also rated to the highway rate, but I do not know that it is so positively.

2277. Mr. Walter.] Where are those places?—Sunderland is one, and I believe there are some others; but it is done under local Acts.

2278. Mr. Birley.] Do you know how they carry it out; how they get at the rating?—I do not know exactly how they get at it. I think it is probably a compromise,—very much like the case of coal mines.

2279. Mr. George Gregory.] Did I rightly understand you to say that the theory of the turnpikes is, that those who have the benefit of the roads should pay for them?—Yes.

2280. Do not the whole community have the benefit of the turnpike roads?—Only those who use them.

2281. Chairman.] Will you enumerate once more all the various sewers rates that are levied. There are two classes of sewers rates, are there not; those that touch the sewering of land, and those that touch the sewering of houses?—Yes. They are distinct from each other, and the legislation with regard to them is also quite distinct.

2282. As regards the sewering of lands, there are two chief Acts, are there not, which deal with that subject?—Yes.

2283. There is the old Act of Henry the Eighth, which is still in force, is it not?—Yes; but at the same time, I should say, with regard to that, that in the Drainage of Land Act of 1861, all the then existing commissions of sewers were rendered permanent, and no new commissions have been issued since that time, except in some rare instances.

29 March 1870.

2284. What is the name of the rate that is levied under the Act of Henry the Eighth?—The sewers rate.

2285. That is administered by the Commissioners of Sewers, who are practically irresponsible, are they not?—Quite irresponsible, I should say; they render account to nobody, and they are not liable to any proceedings whatever.

2286. By whom are they appointed?—They are appointed by a commission in which either the Lord Chancellor and the two chief justices must concur, or the Lord Chancellor, one of the chief justices, and the Lord High Treasurer, who is represented by the Treasury now.

2287. Are they paid for their services, or are they honorary?—I think they are not paid, but I am not sure. I cannot tell whether they pay themselves.

2288. Are their accounts audited as far as you are aware?—No.

2289. They levy rates without being responsible to the ratepayers or to anyone?—Just so.

2290. In the Local Taxation Returns some of their accounts are published, are they not?—Yes, but those are obtained direct from the commissioners in each case by application from the Home Office.

2291. Are the proceeds of the rates that are levied chiefly used in paying off debt, or are they applied to the current expenditure?—The current expenditure is provided for by a separate tax, called the general sewers tax, which I referred to on my previous examination; that is for the annual ordinary contingent expenses.

2292. There is one Act under which they levy the sewers rate for permanent works, and there is another Act, is there not, under which they levy the rate for current expenses?—Yes.

2293. So far as you know, there is no Government department that overhauls them in any way?—Not at all, I believe. I am not aware of any public functionary or public department which has any knowledge of the proceedings of the commissioners or to whom they make any report in any way.

2294. There are no more of those commissioners appointed, are there?—I have been informed that there have been only one or two appointed since the Drainage Act of 1861, which rendered all existing commissions permanent, and I suppose that at that time the greater part of the country had been provided with commissions since the time of Henry the Eighth. The commissions formerly were granted for 10 years, and were renewed at the end of that time.

2295. Do you know when any commissioner dies how his successor is appointed?—He is appointed in the same way by the Lord Chancellor, and so on.

2296. And they continue to be appointed?—Yes, the vacancies are filled up.

2297. You mean that the commissions are made permanent, but any vacancies are filled up?—Yes, the vacancies are filled up upon the recommendation of the Home Office.

2299. But you are not aware that they are responsible to the Home Secretary in any way?—I believe not in any way whatever, so for as I know.

2300. Their duties are sometimes connected with the drainage of land, and sometimes with protection against the sea?—Yes, their duties are really to guard against the inroads of the sea and inundations of all kinds, from fresh water as well as the sea, and also to provide for the drainage of land, and especially of marsh lands. But, as I understand the Act of Henry the Eighth, the object was public drainage, and the protection of lands generally from inundations of all sorts, and not private drainage for the benefit of individual estates.

2301. Do you know whether the rates which they levy are called in the Local Taxation Returns, rates levied for drainage, embankment, &c.?—I think in that Return which you have before you, there are two columns, one for the sewers rates, and the other for drainage and embankment rates, and they are put together into one column in the summary; but I think they were intended to refer to different bodies. The sewers rate was a rate levied by the Sewers Commissioners, but the drainage and embankment rates were rates levied under local Acts.

2302. There are rates under Act of Parliament, and there are rates by charter, usage, and custom; the rates under Act of Parliament would be mostly those of Commissioners of Sewers, would they not?—Yes, I should fancy so.

2303. Are you aware that the rates levied for drainage and embankment purposes, according to the Local Taxation Returns for 1867, amount to about 161,000 l. as far as they are returned, exclusive, of course, of the drainage and embankment rates in the Metropolis?—Yes

2304. Having dealt with the sewers rate and the general sewers tax, what others are there under the head of the sewering of lands?—There is the Land Drainage Act of 1861.

2305. Which is a special rate, is it not?—In the Land Drainage Act of 1861, there are provisions for assessing a special rate upon the owner; at least not assessing it upon the owner, but rendering him liable to pay it.

2306. That Drainage of Land Act was a consolidation, was it not, to a certain extent, of a number of private Acts, and regulating private Acts?—No, it was a continuation of the Sewers Commissions; it was the Act which provided that the existing Commissions of Sewers should be permanent; and then it gave them those larger powers for the drainage of land at the instance of the Enclosure Commissioners.

2307. There is a drainage and enclosure rate; under what Act is that levied?—I should say that although the drainage and enclosure rate appears in this series (in my work of 1846), as a separate rate, it was not exactly so. There was a special Act of Parliament providing for the recovery of drainage and enclosure rates, which were themselves leviable under local Acts, for the enclosure, drainage, and improvement of divers lands, commons, and waste grounds, wherein Commissioners were empowered to set out and make private roads and drains, banks, bridges, sluices, and other works.

2308. The drainage and enclosure rate really was to regulate a number of rates that were levied under local Acts?—Yes, and to enable them to be levied and to give power to enforce them.

2309. Those rates are probably accounted for and levied in various ways, to which it would be be difficult to apply any general rule?—Yes, if they came under any head in the Local Taxation Return at all, they would come under the drainage and embankment rates, I have no doubt.

2310. What is the inclosure rate as differing from the drainage and inclosure rate?—It is quite a distinct rate; the inclosure rate was a rate to defray the expense where inclosures were effected under the provisions of the General Inclosure Act, the Act for the inclosure and improvement of commons and lands. This rate was to pay for the expenses of the inclosure.

2311. Do you know how that rate is accounted for?—My remark, in the work I have alluded to, is, that the statute seems to be silent upon the subject as regards accounts.

2312. Are there any other rates connected with this branch of the sewers that you have to say anything about?—I think not; the regulated pasture rate is not connected with sewers at all; it is under the Inclosurse Act, but it is a small affair, and I do not know that it is ever levied.

2313. Do you know anything of the sea beach rate collected from the tenants, but paid by the owners, which was mentioned by Mr. Read as existing in Norfolk; that would be a kind of embankment rate, I presume?—I cannot say that it has ever come across my knowledge; I should think it must be either under a local custom or a local Act; it is, probably, one of those levied by charter, usage, or local custom, and, no doubt, there are many of that sort.

2314. There is no Government department that you know of that has brought in those Acts who could give information upon this subject?—None that I know of.

2315. What are the rates levied in respect of the sewering of houses?—Perhaps the most general statement would refer to the sewer authorities, which have been established under the Sewage Utilisation Act of 1865, extended by a subsequent Act. It is provided that the sewer authority in boroughs shall be the town council; and in a district under an Improvement Act, the Improvement Commissioners; and, elsewhere, the parish vestry; and in a subsequent Act, the districts under local boards of health are also brought under the same provisions. The local board had, under the Local Government Act, power to act to a certain extent; but by a subsequent Act they are brought under the provisions of the Sewage Utilisation Act of 1865, so that they can act in the same manner as town councils in boroughs with regard to the distribution of sewage.

2316. Is there anything that you have to say about the sewage utilisation rate?—Yes; that rate is levied like the poor rate, but the scale of contribution is to be the same as that of the general district rate, making a difference between houses, which are to pay the full amount, and tithes, arable lands, railways, canals, and so on, which are to pay one-fourth.

2317. Under the Sewer Authorities Act, is the rate for sewering houses levied separately or not?—It is to be levied as a separate rate, and not paid out of the poor rate, because there is a different scale of contribution.

2318. Except in the metropolis, I think you have stated the whole of the chief Acts regulating sewers rates?—Yes, except that there is one point, which I think I should mention, that under the Nuisances Removal Act, the guardians of a union have the power of making a sewer under certain circumstances: if they find that an old sewer wants reconstructing, they can, under the special provisions of the Nuisances Removal Act, proceed to do the work.

2319. That is practically where there is no other authority; no town council, and no local board?—Yes; in the absence of any of the other authorities specified in the Nuisances Removal Act, the guardians of the union act as the nuisance authority; and where they do so act as the nuisance authority, they have the power of making sewers in certain cases.

2320. Do they pay for the work out of the poor rate?—No; that is a defect of the Act; they can only make an assessment upon the property.

2321. Do you mean upon the owner?—The Act does not say so; the Act says that the assessment shall be made upon the premises; it does not mention either owner or occupier, or anybody else.

2322. It is upon the premises from which they remove the nuisance practically?—The premises which have the benefit of the sewer.

2323. Does your experience at the Poor Law Board enable you to say that the working of this Act has been attended with very great difficulty?—Yes; owing to the fact that it does not provide any resources out of which the guardians can pay for the work in the first instance; they are not authorised to pay for it out of the poor rate, and they have no other funds at their command.

2324. Mr. Pell.] With regard to the sewage rate, as applied by the guardians, they have the power, have they not, to levy it over naked land if the parish consent to it, upon a different scale to that on houses in the parish under the Act of 1865?—As I understand, it applies to the whole parish.

2325. But upon a different scale upon naked land to house property?—There are only two scales, arable land, meadow land, pasture ground, canals, railways, and tithes on one side, and houses on the other side.

2326. Mr. Gregory.] Is there much of the country, to your knowledge, under that Act of Henry the Eighth, the old Sewer Act?—I believe there is a very considerable portion of it. I have never seen any specific return on the subject; but I should judge so from the Local Taxation Returns.

2327. Are such districts as Romney and Pevensey Marsh under that Act, or under a local Act?—I should suppose that they are under the Act of Henry the Eighth. In that Act Romney is particularly mentioned by name. It says that the customs of Romney Marsh are to be applied to the rest of the country.

2328. Are the Essex Marshes under that Act?—Yes, they are; all those commissions are still in force, and they are the most despotic authority in the country.

2329. They levy scots as they commonly call it, do they not?—Yes.

2330. Mr. St. Aubyn.] With regard to those commissioners under the Act of Henry the Eighth, is there much labour attached to the office; is it an office which entails much work?—I can only judge from the nature of the duty that they have to do; I should think some must do the work, and I suppose they appoint a surveyor.

2331. What is the inducement to any gentleman to accept the office, because they are not paid as you tell us?—I do not know whether there is any personal inducement; they have very extensive powers, and of course it is very important portant to their property, at least large landowners might find it very important.

2332. Do they receive fees at all?—I do not know whether they do individually.

2333. Is their number limited?—Not by the Act; it is in the discretion of the Crown.

2334. Then it is the fact, is it not, that persons wishing to protect their own property may apply to become commissioners of sewers under the Act?—Yes, no doubt.

2335. Is that frequently done?—I do not know how that is done; it has not come within my cognisance at all. I think that the gentleman in the Crown Office who has the management of it, would be able to give the Committee much more information upon it than I can do.

2336. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] In the area of the Commission of Sewers authority, would the Crown or the Admiralty, or the Woods and Forests, claim jurisdiction?—The Commissioners of Sewers have jurisdiction over the property of the Crown; it is expressly included in the Act; the Crown contributes to the rate; and there is express provision to that effect.

Mr. John Lambert, called in; and further Examined.

2337. Chairman.] The Committee would be glad if you could give them some information upon the law in Scotland; you are acquainted, are you not, with the law regulating rating in Scotland?—Yes, I have made inquiry upon the subject upon several occasions.

2339. What latitude have they as regards the mode of raising those funds?—The Act gives them the power to raise the money in three different ways. First of all they may resolve that half the rate be imposed on the owners, and half on the occupiers of all lands and heritages. The second mode enables them to assess half on the owners according to the value of their lands, and half on the whole of the inhabitants according to their means and substance, other than lands and tenements; or, thirdly, they may raise the money by assessment as an equal per-centage upon the annual value of all lands and heritages, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole of the inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages.

2340. Is that Act still in force?—That Act is still in force; but, practically speaking, the assessment now is always raised by assessing half the rate upon the owners, and the other half upon the occupiers.

2341. The two other alternatives of raising it are not acted upon: I mean either by raising it on the whole of the inhabitants according to their means and substance, or raising it upon the estimated annual income of the whole of the inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages?—They are not acted upon at the present time. I am speaking generally, and I say that the general mode in which the rate is raised now, is by assessing one-half on the owners of lands and heritages, and the other half on the occupiers of lands and heritages.

2342. Will you state how the parochial boards are made up; they are made up of the poorrate-payers?—The parochial boards are constituted in two different ways. In what are called burghal parishes, that is to say, parishes within the Royal burghs, the managers are elected by the owners and by the occupiers; and in parishes which are non-burghal the board is constituted, first of all, of the owners of lands and heritages of the yearly value of 20 l. and upwards, or of any agent or mandatory appointed in writing by an heritor who is entitled to be a member of the board; secondly, of the provost and bailies of any Royal burgh, if any, in the parish, and who are assessed for the poor; thirdly, of the members of the kirk session of the parish, and if the kirk session consists of more than six, six members must be nominated from among their own number, no elder being entitled to act who is not assessed; and, fourthly, of certain members to be elected by the ratepayers who are not otherwise entitled to act. I should add that, as to those members who are elected by the ratepayers, the owners of land under 20 l. have a right to participate in their election. It will thus be seen that the owners of all property above 20 l. are in virtue of being owners; whilst those owners who possess property of less value than 20 l. have merely a right to vote with the ratepayers for the elected members of the board.

2343. When a parish is partly in and partly out of a borough, are you aware of what is done?—I am not aware of the provisions in such a case; I am not aware of any instance of that kind.

2344. When half the assessment is put upon the owners, and the other half upon the occupiers, may the collector levy the whole from the occupier, who again may deduct the owner's half from the rent?—Yes, it is provided by sect. 43 of the Act, "that where the one-half of any assessment is imposed on the owners, and the other half on the tenants or occupants of lands and heritages, it shall be competent for the collector of such assessment to levy the whole thereof from the tenants or occupants, who shall be entitled to recover one-half thereof from the owners, or to retain the same out of their rents on production of a receipt granted by the collector of such assessment."

2345. We have had evidence from a gentleman from Aberdeen, but your statement is as to the general law, and not as to any local law?—Of the general law. It is precisely what the collectors are empowered to do if they think proper to avail themselves of that provision.

2346. The county rate is raised by the Commissioners of Supply in counties, is it not?—It is.

2347. How is it levied as regards owners and occupiers?—At the present time the county rate, by virtue of the 31st and 32nd of Victoria, c. 82, is levied from the owners. By section 4 of that Act it is provided that, "It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Supply of every county in Scotland once in each year to impose an assessment for the purposes of this Act, to be called the county general assessment, upon all lands and heritages within such county, according to the yearly value thereof, as established by the valuation roll for the year (commencing at Whit Sunday) in which such assessment is imposed, subject to the provision in the 6th section hereof, and that at such rate in each year as the said commissioners commissioners shall deem necessary in order to provide sufficient funds for all the purposes of this Act, including such sum as may be requisite to cover the expenses of assessment, collection, and management, and any arrears of preceding years; and the said assessment so laid on in each year shall be payable as for the period from Whit Sunday then last to Whit Sunday then next, and shall be due at such date as the commissioners shall determine, and may be levied either on the proprietor or tenant of all such lands and heritages; but such tenant, in case of his paying such assessment, shall be entitled to deduct the amount from the rent payable by him, unless under existing special agreement with the landlord to the contrary."

2348. Then, except by special agreement, the whole rate is put upon the owner, either directly or by deduction from the rent?—It is so by the provisions of this Act.

2349. Do you happen to know how it was before that Act was passed?—No, I am not certain what the state of the law was before. I know that the owner was liable for some portion. I am not sure whether it was the half or the whole.

2350. Have you got the 17th & 18th Vict. c. 91 before you?—No, I have not; I have merely an extract from the Act.

2351. Does that Act of 1854 deal with county rate?—It only deals with the county rate as far as it provides that the county rate shall be levied upon the basis of the valuation made under the Scotch Valuation Act.

2352. Can you state when the practice of rating means and substance ceased?—No, I cannot. Great difficulties were experienced in rating inhabitants upon means and substance, and a great many disputes arose. I am aware of that, but I am not certain as to the time when the practice was discontinued. I believe the late Lord Campbell had a residence in Scotland, and when he went down on one occasion they assessed him upon his salary as Lord Chancellor, as forming a part of his means and substance.

2353. Can you tell us how the commissioners of supply are appointed?—All the proprietors who own a life rent in lands, or who have a life rent in lands of the yearly value of 100 l., or who are owners in fee to that value, also the eldest son and the heir apparent of the proprietor in fee of rents to the amount of 400 l., and the factor of any proprietor in fee in the absence of the proprietor who posesses lands of the yearly value of 800 l.; these constitute the commissioners of supply for the county.

2354. Are you aware of any other rates in Scotland besides the county rate and the poor rate?—I have not inquired into any other rate except the county rate and the poor rate.

2355. You are not aware of the borough rates?—I know that there are borough rates, or what would be equivalent to borough rates, but I am not aware of the amount.

2356. You are aware probably that there have been no local taxation returns from Scotland which bring together the total expenditure, such as exist in England and Ireland?—I have not seen any.

2357. Have you anything to add to what you have told the Committee as regards the deductions from the owners in Scotland and the rating of the owners; would you give a definition of the owner?—Yes. By the Poor Law Act of 1845 the word owner "shall apply to life renters as well as fiars and tutors, curators, commissioners, trustees, adjudgers, wad setters, or other persons who shall be in the actual receipt of the rents and profits of lands and heritages. All these come under the designation of owner, according to that definition.

2358. Are you aware of the difficulties which have arisen from this system of the collector rating the owner in Scotland?—No; I never heard of any.

2359. Are you aware that there is not that multiplicity of rates in Scotland that we have here, which renders our administration so difficult?—Yes; no doubt there are fewer rates in Scotland.

2360. Are you aware whether the highway rate is ever a separate rate in Scotland, or whether there is anything analogous in it?—I am not able to speak as to the highway rate.

2361. Colonel Brise.] Who makes the assessment in Scotland?—The assessment is made by an assessor appointed by the commissioners of supply, but they can employ an Inland Revenue officer for that purpose, and if they do so, then the valuation which they make is conclusive for the purposes of income tax, as well as for the purposes of the local rates.

2362. How often is that made?—Every year.

2363. Chairman.] In Scotland there is the system of a special Government officer, who assesses property for local purposes, to a certain extent?—Certainly. Generally speaking, in practice they avail themselves, particularly in towns, of the services of the Government surveyor.

2364. Mr. Corrance.] It comes to this, that the incidence of local taxation is determined by the action of the local body?—Yes, as regards the three modes in which the poor rate may be charged.

2365. I see that those three are absolutely different; in some cases the rate is charged upon income, in others upon the inhabitants, according to their means, and in the third case upon their property?—Yes; but I say that practically now it is only charged upon property.

2366. But the way was open to local boards to determine the incidence of their own taxation?—Yes, certainly it was.

2367. Do you approve of that?—I think it is better that a general rule should be laid down.

2368. I suppose each rate would be determined by the majority of the interests represented?—Yes.

2369. Might not that lead to very great injustice locally; where there was a preponderance of farmers, is it not likely that they would lay a larger burthen upon all the other classes, and vice versâ?—I have no doubt that they would if they could.

2370. Does the school rate come out of this general rate now?—I do not know how the school rate is apportioned.

2371. You are aware that it fell originally upon the heritors that were concerned?—Yes, I believe it did.

2372. Has there been any change in that?—I am not certain.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY GENGE ANDREWS, called in; and Examined.

1 April 1870.

2373. Chairman.] ARE you an owner of land in Somersetshire?—I am.

2374. Do you farm your own land?—I do.

2375. Have you given some attention to the subject of rating?—I have.

2376. Will you state the parish and the union in which your property is situated?—The parish of Rimpton, in the Sherborne union.

2377. Is there any considerable increase in the rates upon your land, and the land in your neighbourhood now, as compared with 20 or 30 years ago?—Certainly.

2378. What is the aggregate rate that falls upon land in your union?—I think it is about 2 s. 6 d. or 2 s. 8 d.

2379. What would you consider to have been the rate, say 20 or 30 years ago?—I came into the parish in which I live about 30 years ago, and I think the increase has been altogether something like 100 per cent.

2380. Mr. Hunt.] Were the rates then as low as 1 s. 3 d.?—I mean that the additions to the rate, and the increase on the rate, have something like doubled it during the last 32 years.

2381. Chairman.] With regard to the question put by the Right honourable Member, do you think that the rates 30 years ago were only 1 s. 3 d. or 1 s. 6 d. in the pound?—I cannot tell you the rate in the pound; I am only referring to the amount levied on the parish.

2382. But do you mean to say that there has been an increase in the value of property, and that the increase in the value of property, and the increase in the rate together, have really augmented the rate?—I am a letter of land myself to a certain extent, and I am not aware of an increase in the value of land in my parish very materially.

2383. But you say that there is an increase in the rateable value of the parish?—By the Union Chargeability Act there is an increase, but not a very material one.

2384. The Union Chargeability Act did not affect the rating of the parish, did it?—Yes, it added something considerable to the general rate of the parish to make it equal with other parishes in the union, and it also increased it upon some particular properties.

2385. It did not increase the rateable value?—Yes, it did increase the rateable value.

2386. Will you explain to the Committee how it increased the rateable value?—By the addition, I think, of about 20 l. a year, to make it an equal union rate, and also by an increase on the actual value of property.

2387. By what was the increase in the actual value of property brought about?—By the re-assessment.

2388. But the re-assessment is under the Union Assessment Act?—Yes.

2389. Then it was not as you said, under the Union Chargeability Act?—I do not exactly remember the distinction.

2390. I am speaking now of the Assessment Act, which raised the assessment in many places that were under-assessed previously?—It was about the time of the Union Chargeability Act, I believe; but if you wish to make a distinction, it may be under the Union Assessment Act.

2391. Mr. Hunt.] What you mean is this, that under the Union Chargeability Act there is a greater burden upon your parish in the way of rating?—About 20 l.

2392. What we want to know is this, whether the assessment of your parish had been raised in the last 30 years?—It was raised when the Union Assessment Act was passed, but at no other time.

2393. Chairman.] And there has not been any considerable increase in the rateable value of your parish through the Union Assessment Act?—No very great increase; I mean increase in the net rate.

2394. Therefore the chief increase must have arisen from an increase on the rate in the pound that is levied?—Yes.

2395. And you are under the impression that 30 years ago it was something like 1 s. 6 d. or 1 s. 7 d.?—I cannot tell what it was in the pound; all all I can say is, that the amount levied was then not more than half what it is now.

2396. Have you looked into that, or are you speaking from a general impression?—I am speaking from a general impression.

2397. Can you give the Committee your opinion as to whether that increase has been chiefly borne by the owner, or by the occupier?—By the occupier entirely.

2398. Whether there have been leases, or whether there have been no leases?—I am not aware of any leases existing in my parish.

2399. What has been the effect upon the rents; if it has been borne by the occupier, has he had any allowance in consequence from the owner?—Not that I have ever heard of.

2400. Whilst a further burden has been placed upon the occupier, he has continued to pay the same rent to the owner?—Yes, certainly.

2401. Have the rents risen, or have they remained pretty much the same?—My own impression is, that there may have been a slight advance, but it has been very little indeed.

2402. Do you think that the advance of rents would have been greater if there had been no increase in the rates?—No, I should not consider that there would have been any advance; it would not have been taken into consideration at all.

2403. You consider, as I understand from your evidence, that there has been at least an increase of 1 s. in the pound?—I consider, as I said before, that it has doubled the rate; I cannot say precisely what it was in the pound.

2404. If it is now 2 s. 8 d., and if it was doubled, it would then be 1 s. 8 d., but it would be safe to take 1 s., upon your evidence?—Yes; only the increase which was made in the valuation of the parish under the Assessment Act, and the addition under the Union Chargeability Act, have altered the rate in the pound on the same area of land as a matter of course.

2405. What proportion do your rates bear to the rent?—I really cannot say; I do not know the rents of every ratepayer in the parish.

2406. In studying the rating question, you have not gone into it as regards your neighbourhood or the county of Somerset as to what burden the rates imposed, as compared with the rent, or as compared with the farming profits?—It is impossible that I can ascertain what the rent is; even if I did not farm my own land, I could not ascertain what the rents of the county of Somerset are.

2407. We have had many witnesses who have expressed different opinions upon the subject as to the amount that is generally borne by local taxation in proportion to what may be called the average rent, but you have not turned your attention to that part of the question?—I think it would be utterly impossible to arrive at any conclusion in such a county as Somerset as to what the rents are, or as to the proportion between rents and rates; I could ascertain the proportion without ascertaining the rent.

2408. Then I may take it that the evidence which is offered by farmers or owners to this Committee, complaining of the large proportion which is borne by rates to rents and to profits, really must not be considered as accurate, because it is impossible to ascertain what the rent is?—An individual may ascertain with reference to his own position, but I do not see how any individual could ascertain with any truth as to the extent of a county.

2409. Have you formed any general opinion as to the burden that is cast upon land by those rates or taxes, as compared with the farmers' profits?—A farmer's profits by the income tax are taken at half his rent; that is the only basis which we could assume.

2410. Do you consider that the rate in the pound, as affecting the farmers' profits, is a considerable burden?—Certainly. I can tell you my own case. Making up the balance sheet of my farming accounts, now within a few days, I pay an aggregate rate of 180 l. per annum, and my profits are about 65 l. for the year. A valuation of the whole of the stock on the farm is annually made.

2411. The gross amount of rate is 180 l., and the net profits are 65 l.?—Yes, in the present year.

2412. What is the extent of your farm?—About 700 acres.

2413. Can you state what is the rateable value of your farm; how it is entered in the rate book?—I cannot precisely say how it is rated; that is the gross rate, but I pay about 180 l. a year, and the average rate is about 2 s. 6 d. in the pound.

2414. Mr. Pell.] Do you know what you are assessed at?—I cannot say off-hand.

2415. Do you never calculate the amount in the pound when the collector asks you for the rate?—I know that as a matter of fact. I do not go into it every year; having once ascertained that the matter is right, I take it as a matter of course. You can easily get at it if you divide it by 2 s. 6 d., it would be about 2 l. an acre; it may be 1,400 l. or 1,500 l. a year probably. I am speaking of the net sum after deductions are made for repairs, which may be taken as the net rental.

2416. Chairman.] I understand that the proportions on your farm may be stated as follows: that the profit is 65 l. and the rate 180 l.?—Yes.

2417. Then even half the rate is more than the profits?—Certainly, that is clear.

2418. Would you give 65 l. as a fair average?—No.

2419. Do you mean that it is exceptional?—I am speaking of the present year.

2420. The Committee do not care to hear of any special year, but can you state to the Committee what the average profit is?—I can tell you what it was last year. I cannot give the amount of the average profits of my farm for 30 years, but I can recollect what it was last year. It was 550 l. last year.

2421. I gather from your evidence that you think it is difficult to convey to the Committee what might be considered the fair profits to which you would look over a series of years?—I should have no difficulty whatever if I could refer to my books; I could refer for the last 32 years, and could give it precisely.

2422. Supposing you were to let your farm, what would a tenant give?—About 40 s. an acre net, I should suppose, taking the whole.

2423. And he would be rated to the income tax upon 40 s. an acre, would he?—I am not precise as to its being rated at 1,400 l. a year; it may be 1,500 l., but it is just thereabouts.

2424. The point which it would interest the Committee to know is this: what a tenant bidding for your land, or what you yourself would consider to be the average proportion of the 180 l. in rates to the profits upon the farm in one year, you have stated that, in one particular year, it was much more than the profits, and in another year it was much below it?—But the 550 l. would not be half 1,500 l.; it would still be below, and I may say safely that the average of 30 years has been considerably below what it is assessed to the income tax, which would be at half the rent under Schedule (B.), only I could not say with precision, because I should have to refer back to 32 years' accounts, and put them altogether and divide them by 32.

1 April 1870.

2425. But it is below the 700 l. which you would be assessed to the income tax?—Yes, with all the effort that I could use to make it myself, as a farmer, without any reference to housekeeping, or any account whatever mixing in with the farming account; I have taken stock every year.

2426. Do you think it would be fair to say over a course of 30 years that the rates represent 30 per cent., or one-third of the profits?—It would be quite that, I should think.

2427. Therefore it is a very important item in calculating the profits which you get from your farm?—Certainly.

2428. And still you hold that if you paid only 90 l. instead of 180 l., you would not be able to get more rent from anyone bidding for the farm?—Certainly, I should; I should get 90 l. a year more; that is very clear.

2430. It comes to this, that it is generally being borne by the occupier in those cases where the tenancy has been continuous, but in the new agreements which have been made during this time, have the owners taken less money in consequence?—I do not think that the matter has generally been taken into consideration; the competition for land is such that a great many men take a farm without reference to whether the poor rates have increased or not.

2431. Surely if the rates are such an important element as regards the profits, it is a matter that must be taken into consideration, though a man may nevertheless offer to pay a high rent; do you think if there were two farms in two adjoining parishes, the rates of the one being 1 s. 3 d., and the other 2 s. 6 d., the land being the same, there would not be a difference in the rent to correspond with that difference?—No doubt of it, if he was a calculating man.

2432. Is this a fair way to state your opinion, that the owner does not reduce the rent in consequence of the rise in the rates?—Certainly he does not; I believe this, that during the last 30 years, when the rate has nearly doubled, nearly the whole of the increase has been paid by the occupier.

2434. If the rates had not risen, do you think that the rents would have risen more?—Certainly not, as a rule; there may be exceptional cases.

2435. Then you have this curious result, that though a farmer's profits must be enormously affected by a rise in the rates, which you have described as 100 per cent., nevertheless it has had little influence upon the rent?—Very little indeed.

2436. Mr. Pell.] But it has had a very large influence upon the profits, has it not?—It has diminished the profits in proportion, and many a man has gone down to ruin quietly, through the increased burthen of the poor rate.

2437. Sir J. Lawrence.] Though he is going to ruin, he does not ask his landlord to lessen the rent?—The increase of the rate has been slow and progressive from year to year, and additional charges have been put on; if he had had them put on at once at any time, he would have gone to the landlord and said, "I cannot pay it;" but the increase of the rate having gone on steadily, very little notice has been taken of it. I could give one instance in Dorsetshire; Mr. Sherridan voted for the Union Chargeability Act, and that put on 100 l a year to the rates upon one of his farms, but he did not make the slightest difference in the rent, and it therefore came out of the farmer's pocket.

2438. Mr. Hunt.] What was the rent of that farm?—I really do not know the rent; it was 100 l. a year added to the rent of the tenant, whatever the amount of the rent of the farm was.

2439. Chairman.] £. 100 a year was in addition to the actual amount of the rates?—Yes, he paid 100 l. a year more in consequence of that Act; Mr. Sherridan made no alteration whatever.

2440. You could not tell us whether it was so great as to seriously affect his profits, because that would depend upon the size of his farm?—You know what the amount of 100 l. a year would be to any man; I cannot tell you what percentage it was upon the farm profits, because I do not know the rent of the farm, and I do not know the acreage of the farm.

2441. If it were a 1,000 l. a year farm, it would be 10 l. per cent.; and if it were 500 l., it would be 20 per cent.?—Yes.

2442. Mr. Pell.] Did he occupy the whole parish; was it a farm of that extent?—No, I think not.

2443. Chairman.] Do you know whether he left the farm in consequence?—Certainly not.

2444. Although it diminished his profits, his profits were so good before that it was still worth his while to continue the farm?—It is a very serious matter for a man to change a farm, and people would frequently rather pay 100 l. a year than remove at that time; he may move at a later time.

2445. Have the farmers' profits diminished generally in your neighbourhood?—No, I think not.

2446. I understood you to say that they were going to ruin in consequence of the higher rating?—No, I have not said so. I have said that many a man had gone down to ruin in consequence of the increased amount that he paid for poor rates out of his profits during the last 30 years.

2447. Have the farmers gone to ruin in your neighbourhood, or not?—Some have diminished their means, and others have not.

2448. Generally, have the farmers' profits increased at the same time whilst they have to pay heavier heavier burdens?—I think not, judging from my own experience.

2449. Earlier in the century the owner was able to get the same rent, and the farmer had higher profits, but now the farmer has been obliged to part with a certain portion of his profits through the increase in the rates?—If you go back to the beginning of the century for 15 years to the close of the war, of course very large profits were made; then for 15 years after that, after the close of the war, I believe that more than one-half of the farming capital of the country was absorbed and lost.

2450. Partly in consequence of the enormous rates that were imposed upon it at that time?—No doubt; and partly in consequence of the change in the value of produce.

2451. Are you aware that, before the year 1834, the poor rates was enormously high over the greater portion of England, much higher than is the case now?—No, I am not aware of that; it was not so, I believe.

2452. Was not there more pauperism before the year 1834 than there is now?—I think not, as a rule.

2453. Mr. Smith.] The rate in the pound was much larger, was it not?—Yes. But the diminution of the rate in the pound, in proportion to the increase of pauperism, arises from the enormous increase of buildings, railways, and so on, which have been placed on the soil; the increase of building has kept down the average rate in the pound. That is a very different thing from the average amount levied, but I think that the amount levied under the poor rate assessment was at no period so high as it is now.

2454. Chairman.] Will you undertake to say that before the year 1834 the agricultural portion of England, where there were no buildings and no towns, and where there are no towns now, was not more highly rated than it is now?—Certainly not.

2455. Do you speak with confidence about that?—I do; that is my impression.

2456. Would you be surprised to hear that there were agricultural counties before 1834 where the rate in the pound was 4*s* and 5*s.*, and where now it is only 3*s.*?—No; and I am also aware that many parishes were rated at perhaps one-fourth of their value, so that the rate in the pound at that date is no criterion whatever as to the value of rateable property at that time.

2457. According to that you would hold that the agricultural land generally in England must have been doubled in assessment?—I am not speaking generally, but I know instances in my own knowledge where parishes were assessed at one-fourth of their value, and it made no difference to the ratepayers when it was a parochial rate whether the standard was taken at one-fourth or one-half, but that would give you no criterion whatever of the rateable value at that period.

2458. Would you be surprised to hear that the rateable value over the whole of the country, as regards the agricultural lands, had not increased more than 25 per cent.?—I should not be surprised at all, because the former rate was no criterion whatever of the value.

2459. Was it ever too high?—I should think not.

2460. Therefore it is so far a criterion that, at all events, the real value was not less than the rateable value?—I cannot see that it is any criterion at all, because some parishes might be rated at one-half of their value, and some at three-quarters their value; there was an infinite variety.

2461. I understand you to say that, generally speaking, it is impossible to ascertain the rent, and that general statistics, as regards the increase of rate in the pound, are not very valuable?—Certainly not; I consider them of no value whatever previous to 1834.

2462. Have you examined it from the point of view of actual expenditure on poor relief before 1834, and at present?—No, I cannot say precisely what it is; but I believe it is considerably more now than then.

2464. Your impression is that it is more?—Yes, I am speaking as a whole; I cannot speak of my county, or any particular county. My attention has been drawn to the amount generally rather than particularly. I know that the rating of our county now is about 280,000 l. a year, levied under the poor rate assessment.

2465. But in all those matters it would be necessary, would it not, to keep the increase in the towns entirely apart from the increase in the country?—There is great confusion in the Local Taxation Returns as to the rate in towns and the rate in the country; the town rate is classed with the poor rate, and the town rate only stretches over the circuit of the town property, whereas the poor rate stretches over the whole parish and union, so that you cannot draw any conclusion as comparing town and country by the Local Taxation Returns.

2466. What you have to deal with in your neighbourhood are mainly the county rate and poor rate, are they not?—Country parishes have nothing to do with town rate.

2467. And therefore in your case, it is the relief of the poor, the highways, and the county charges that are the chief items?—Yes, certainly. The expenditure under the poor rate divides itself into 25 heads, all of an Imperial character.

2468. Has there been any increase in the county rate with you?—I cannot say particularly as to my own county. I know from the returns that there is an increase of about 500,000 l. for the three or four years ending 1868, in matters unconnected with the relief of the poor.

2469. What is the total amount of the county rate now?—I cannot say precisely what the increase of the county rate may be, but the charges are about one-third of the whole poor rate; that is to say, the charges that are not specially for the relief of the poor.

2470. It includes the borough rate, does it not?—The borough rate is a very small proportion of the levy, and the highway rate also.

2471. Is the borough rate small as compared with the county rate?—I think so.

2472. What is your impression?—I do not know the proportion at all.

2473. Do you think it is one-half?—I do not know at all. I have not turned my attention to it.

2474. To go back to the point, as regards the burden upon land, would you think that it would be a wise proposal that the burdens should be divided between the owner and the occupier?—I think it would be a most absurd proposal. I take it that the owner and the occupier are one with regard to the tax.

2475. Are they the same, in fact?—Yes, I should

1 April 1870.

should say so, except as to the increase, and new charges.

2476. That is to say, except as to the 100 per cent. increase which has taken place in the rates?—Yes, in the 30 years.

2477. Then they are not the same?—With that exception, they are.

2478. The exception is one-half of the whole?—Exactly; it is a very large exception.

2479. Although it would be an absurd proposal to put part of the rate upon the owner, the difference would have been in those 30 years, if it had been on the owner, that he would have paid the 100 per cent. increase instead of the occupier?—No, he would have paid one-half of it.

2480. That would have made a difference as regards the poor rate?—Yes.

2481. And yet you think it would be absurd to relieve the occupier from those conditions?—I rather think the poor rate has got to its extent, and that an alteration in that respect would not be of much advantage now. I should prefer putting the whole upon the owner.

2482. And that, you think, would not be absurd?—No, not so absurd, because I think the owner would understand the nature of the tax better than he does now.

2483. But it would not be so absurd as if he were to pay one-half?—Yes, it would now; and not only that, but it would cause a great confusion and difficulty dividing it every year in making it a matter of account.

2484. Are you aware that in Scotland the owner pays one-half?—No, I am not.

2485. Are you aware that in Ireland he pays one-half?—No, I am not.

2486. So that the absurdity would be shared by the two sister countries?—Exactly, but I do not think that would lessen it.

2487. As regards the owner, you would not object to the whole rate being put upon him?—Certainly not, although I am an owner myself.

2488. What would you say to the administration of the poor law by the owners?—I should think it would be a very wise proceeding.

2489. Do you think that they would administer it better?—I would make them collect, administer, and pay.

2490. If the occupiers were relieved from the pressure of the poor rate, and the pressure fell only upon the owners, in case of an increase, the owners being a comparatively small class, would you not be afraid of the pressure that might be put upon them, either by public opinion, or by any other power, as regards the enormous sums that are spent on the poor rate?—Certainly not; the occupier at present, under the Union Chargeability Act, has no interest in reducing it at present; he has no very material interest in any particular question at the board of guardians.

2491. I undeestand you to say that it is practically the same, whether you put it upon the owner or upon the occupier in the long run?—Yes, certainly; it comes out of the gross produce of the estate.

2492. If the poor rates were put upon the owner, would he increase the rent to the occupier?—No doubt he would to the extent of the rate.

2493. Then, indirectly, the occupier would pay a portion of the rates, would he not?—Supposing it was a re-entry, and the rent was adjusted according to the rates, I take it that the tax is really entirely upon the owner, with the exception that I have named, of the future increase.

2494. I think, at the beginning of your evidence, you said that it was upon the occupier?—I think not; at least I have never intended to say so; I have always stated rather that the tax is upon the owner, except the increase.

2495. You think that, by putting the rate upon the owner, it would be ultimately possible to relieve the occupier?—It would relieve the occupier from the increase, and nothing more, if there was a re-adjustment of the rent in proportion.

2496. Would the landlords raise their rents in consequence?—I have no doubt that as a rule, that would be the case. For instance, supposing that I pay 180*l.* a year poor rates, if I let my estate, I should not let it without charging the 180*l.* a year in the rent; that is clear enough.

2497. What I wish to know is this, whether, in your opinion, the indirect contribution that the occupier might make through an increased rent would or would not entitle him to a share in the administration of the funds?—No; if he paid nothing, of course he need not have any part in the administration.

2498. Do you think that, under the present system, the owners ought to have a share in the administration?—Yes; they have at present.

2499. How?—As ex officio guardians; I am a guardian myself.

2500. Are you an elected guardian or an ex officio guardian?—An elected guardian.

2501. Then, so far as you are an elected member of the board, you are the representative of the ratepayers?—Certainly.

2502. That is to say, of the occupiers?—Yes.

2503. You are not there in your capacity of owner, but as an elected representative of the occupiers?—Yes.

2504. If there were no ex officio guardians, if the ex officio element were omitted, would you hold that the owners were repeesented at all under the present system?—Frequently our guardians are owners as well as occupiers, but the only element, strictly speaking, in which ownership is represented, is the ex officio element. But owners vote for the election of guardians by a cumulative vote, personally, or by proxy.

2505. Is it that satisfactory element; does the system of ex officios work well?—I think, generally, that the country boards of guardians work very well and very satisfactory.

2506. I mean do the ex officio guardians attend regularly?—They do at the board of which I am a member; not all of them, but there are always some of them there; the chairman is an ex officio guardian.

2507. Do they attend as regularly as the elected guardians?—Yes, quite.

2508. And you do not think that they would take more interest if they were elected as owners?—Certainly not; if they paid the rate, it is natural to suppose that more gentlemen would take an interest in the administration.

2509. Do you think that that would be an advantage?—I think it would.

2510. Will you state to the Committee which you would prefer of the three arrangements, that the occupier should pay the whole of the rates, that the owner should pay the whole of the rates, or that they should be divided between them?—I should prefer that the owner paid the whole of the rates.

2511. If such a law were passed that the owne owner should pay the whole of the rates, would not that lead to an immediate readjustment of rents?—So far as the owner paid a charge, which he did not pay before, of course he would add it to the rent.

2512. Do you think it would be a popular and a proper measure, if it was introduced to put the whole charge upon the owner?—I think so; the interest and the power of the occupier to reduce the amount of the rate is now really so small that the guardians of a very large number of the distant parishes very rarely attend the board at all. The administration is really by the town guardians and the ex officio guardians at present; I am speaking of country districts.

2513. The interest to the pocket of the ratepayer is a very serious interest now, is it not, as the ratepayer pays heavy rates?—He does, but he pays it in respect of the owner; I mean this, that under the Union Chargeability Act, a guardian, the representative of a parish, a farmer has very little interest in an additional 6 d. which may be given to a pauper; it would be so infinitesimally small, his share of it, that it does not matter to him much; but then, as a rule, the board as a whole, administer the law with just the same feeling of equity as they would if they benefited largely.

2514. They act now according to the best of their judgment, instead of feeling that they are taking the money out of their own pocket?—Yes, as a rule; I have been a guardian for 30 years, off and on, and I have never found any very material difference in the action of the board before the Union Chargeability Act, or since.

2515. Do you think that the removal of the stimulous to economy by the Union Chargeability Act was a good result or a bad result?—I think it was a good result; it has done away with the screwing conduct very often prevalent at the board of guardians on the part of the occupiers, when it was a parochial rate.

2516. And you think that the same result, to a certain extent, would follow from putting the rates upon the owners?—Yes, certainly.

2517. You would remove still further that interest which remains now?—No, I do not think so; it is so infinitesimally small now that you cannot remove it any further; I think you have done all that you can do in that direction.

2518. Do you think it an infinitesimal interest when the rates have risen 100 per cent. over a given number of years?—Exactly; but that increase is accomplished. I am speaking of the future.

2519. And you think that it is stopped now?—I should hope so, but that depends entirely upon what is coming.

2520. Mr. Pell.] Do you think that, with respect to the education rate, it is stopped?—I do think that the increase may be stopped.

2521. Mr. Fielden.] You stated, did you not, that guardians from distant parishes seldom attend the meetings of the board?—Yes, that is so.

2522. In your opinion, does that arise from the great extent of the union?—No, I think it arises from the little interest which the guardian has in the business.

2523. Colonel Brise.] When you speak of increased rates to the extent of 100 per cent., can you tell us in what the increase has been; has it been in the county rate, or in the union expenditure, and if so, whether in the out-door relief, in the in-door relief, or in the establishment charges?—The increase has been in the relief to the poor from the administration under the new poor law, and from the new charges added to the rate during the last 30 years.

2525. How much per acre?—About 5*s.* per acre. You will understand that it is mostly pasture, and the rentcharge on arable is very much heavier than on pasture land.

2526. You have spoken of the profits of your farm as being only 65*l.* last year; do you speak of the year including the harvest of the year 1869?—I speak of the year ending the 25th of March 1870.

2528. Do you think that the occupiers would have some interest in keeping men off the rates?—I consider that the occupier at present has no interest and no power that you can measure in keeping down the expenditure of the poor law; his interest is so small that it cannot be called an interest at all.

2529. Mr. Fielden.] But he has to pay rates, and therefore he must have an interest surely?—He has to pay rates; but taking the readjustment of the rates at this present time with the rent, he has no interest, except in any increase which may be added to the rates.

2530. Still, if he pays the rate out of his pocket, and he can save something by reducing the rate, he has to pay so much less?—Yes, I say that any saving that he gets effected by his attendance at the Board, or any attention to the matter is so small, that it is not a matter which would at all induce him to take any trouble about it, because the saving is spread over the whole union.

2531. Sir James Lawrence.] Reference was made in your evidence to the difference of rating at the present time, and previous to the year 1834; if I understood you rightly, you made the remark that you did not see the analogy between the two ratings, and that you did not admit that people were more highly rated then, because the assessment was lower?—Yes, exactly.

2532. Was not there another element besides the low assessment, at the period before 1834, which has to be taken into consideration?—The period between 1815 and 1834 was one of very great trial to the agricultural districts, and the consequence was that the poor rate, as you are aware, pressed exceedingly heavy on the parishes; when that period expired the thing righted itself.

2533. What was the rate of wages at that time, in the year 1832, for example?—My experience of wages has been that my wages have increased about 33 per cent. since 1838.

2534. I am speaking of the period when the poor rate was 3*s.* and 4*s.* in the pound; was it not a fact that a large portion of that sum was employed in supplementing wages?—Certainly not.

2535. In the years 1830 and 1831, was it not so?—No, not in our district; wages are always settled by the competition for labour.

1 April 1870.

2536. Were not agricultural lobourers in the receipt at that time of much lower wages than they have now, and did not the parish supplement the wages by an advance from the poor rate?—Certainly not.

2537. Mr. Pell.] Did not labourers go the round, as it was regularly called, before the change in the law?—Never in my place.

2538. Mr. Seely.] In making out the balance in which you have shown a profit of 65 l., could you tell us what you charged yourself for rent?—I cannot exactly, the profit would depend upon putting it at a fair rent; I have always endeavoured to put it at about the same as it was rated, that is to say, the gross rate; the actual rent that would go into the account would be the net rent that is taxed, for instance; but I have always a carpenter, and very frequently a mason, employed for which I would make a deduction.

2539. On that profit you charge about the same rent as you could let it at?—Yes, I have endeavoured to acertain for myself what profit is made.

2540. The profits seem so extremely small as compared with the rates; would you mind telling us what interest you charged, upon your capital?—Five per cent.

2541. Mr. Smith.] When you recommend that the owner should pay the whole of the rates, has it occurred to you that the effect of charging the owner with the whole of the rates would be an immediate readjustment of rent as between owner and tenant in every case?—I expect so.

2542. Do you think that that would be to the advantage of the tenant?—It would be neither advantageous nor disadvantageous; it would be the same thing.

2543. But I think you mentioned that it was very common in Somersetshire for rents to remain at the same amount for one or two lives together, and that they are not readjusted very often; would not the introduction of the payment of the rates by the owner suggest a necessity for readjusting rents generally?—Yes; the amount which the owner would pay, and which he had not paid before, he would, as a matter of course, add to the rent, and the tenant would be in the same position as he was before.

2544. Do you suppose that he would be content with simply adding the amount which he would be called upon to pay, or the amount he might estimate he might be called upon to pay, because, as you are aware, the rate is not always the same?—Yes; he would take it at what it is at present.

2545. He would simply add it to the rent?—I should say so.

2546. But you think that he would not add anything more to the rent?—I should suppose not. That question would very much depend upon the state of agricultural prosperity at the time.

2547. There is great competition for land, is there not, in Somersetshire?—There is in every county.

2548. Mr. St. Aubyn.] When you say that you would transfer the whole burden of the rate to the owner, do you intend that to apply to all rates, the poor rate and the county rate?—I am speaking altogether of the amount levied under the poor rate assessment, exclusive of the local taxation proper, which I take to be the town rate.

2549. In that case you would not think it advisable to make any distinction as between the poor rate and the county rate?—Certainly not.

2550. Your opinion is, in fact, that the whole rates should be bodily transferred from the occupier to the owner?—Yes, certainly.

2551. Mr. Corrance.] You have spoken of increase of rent, but you have not told us yet fully upon what that increase depends; I am going to ask you several questions, and perhaps you will answer me yes or no; in the first place, you would assume, would you not, that increase of rent is consequent upon competition?—Yes.

2552. And, secondly, upon the permanent application of capital, as for instance, if you have a farm of a certain value, with certain applied capital for the improvements?—Yes.

2553. The rent is computed not only on the sterling value of the land, but upon the accessories upon the farm in that respect?—The rate would be, and also the rent.

2554. You have good roads, farm buildings, and fences, all of which add to the value of the farm, and the value of the farm for which you would levy the rent, is the interest of the money. That would lead to increase of rent, would it not?—I do not quite understand you.

2555. The landlord, as you are aware, builds the farm buildings upon the farm with a charge of five or six per cent?—Yes.

2556. That is rent, is it not; that is to say, it constitutes the increase of rent?—Yes, as an outlay if made by the owner.

2557. Is not a considerable amount of the present increase of rent due to such a cause in England?—I have not the slightest doubt about it.

2558. And rent will rise in respect also to the price of produce, will it not?—Certainly; only you will observe that the rent does not vary according to the price of the produce, because readjustments, as I said before, do not often take place.

2559. But looking at it as a broad principle, if the price of the produce upon the farm materially increased permanently, do you not believe that there would be a progressive and gradual increase to the rent?—Yes, certainly.

2560. The tenant would no doubt enjoy the profit of that for a time, but, ultimately, by the law of competition, the landlord would get his fair quota?—Yes, certainly.

2561. If the price of wages were raised, that would tend to depreciate the rent, would it not?—Yes, unless the increased price of produce was corresponding.

2562. Has the price of your wages been raised?—Yes; 33 per cent. since 1838.

2563. That would go, therefore, in abatement of the rent?—Exactly.

2564. Do you think the depreciation of the gold standard has had no effect upon the rise of rent?—My opinion with regard to gold is this, that it has tended to raise the price of labour and of all other things which a farmer expends in his cultivation, as, for instance, artificial manure. We used to buy cake at 8 l. a ton; now we give 12 l.; and the same with all kinds of articles, so that I believe that on arable districts the rent has not so very materially increased as it has in pasture districts.

2565. Are you aware that the value of gold may be said to be thoroughly tested by the value of an article of absolute necessity like corn, and that if there is much gold and only the same proportionate amount of corn, the influence that that would would have upon the price of corn would be that the money value would be raised?—I cannot go very deeply into the gold question, but my opinion is that but for the influx of gold, the price of wheat would have been very much lower than it is now.

2566. Would not such an increase of the money value of the corn be represented in the rent by an increase of rent?—Less the extra outlay for artificial manures and the increase of the cost of labour.

2567. Has the amount of produce increased generally in your county?—No doubt it has.

2568. In consequence of the increased application of capital?—In consequence of increased capital applied to the soil in the shape of artificial manures, in draining, and in various investments by landlord and tenant.

2569. In consequence of the increased capital those rates fall as an increasing burden, do they not?—Yes, I can give an instance. In the Taunton Union, where a man took a farm on a lease, he expended a very large amount of capital, and he was immediately, within a year or two, brought before the assessment committee, and a very large increase was put on his rate in consequence of the capital which he had invested, and which he intended to take out during his lease.

2570. All this amount of capital, whether applied by the landlord or the tenant, comes under this heavy amount of taxation?—Certainly it does eventually.

2571. Do you not think that upon such an assumption the desire by the landlord or the tenant to improve will be so far diminished?—It is a direct bar to extending the cultivation of land, because, if you take a piece of land, we will say of 1,000 acres, which produces no rent now, if you lay out capital upon the surface of that land and make it worth 20 s. per acre, it will immediately be rated at 20 s. per acre, although it is on personal estate which was invested in the improvement of the soil.

2572. Then that acts directly to discourage the application of capital, does it not?—Surely it must; and so it does to the building of houses in precisely the same way.

2573. You think, then, that the increase of rates does fall both upon landlord and upon tenant?—Certainly, according as one or the other makes the investment.

2574. And so far it also diminishes the desire to employ labour?—Certainly; a tax of 12 per cent. must be a bar to production.

2575. You have stated that at the period when a farm is re-let, it would be no longer a burden on the tenant?—Except the future increase.

2576. Supposing the assessment were increased, do you imagine that if a farm is re-let at this moment the tenant would escape, and it would fall entirely upon the owner?—So long as the rate remains at the same amount where it is now.

2577. You have also stated that it would be in the landlord's power, through competition, to at once recoup himself to that amount?—Certainly.

2578. Then it must fall upon the tenant, must it not?—How does it fall upon the tenant if he is relieved of what he pays to the overseers for poor rates?

2579. Then your reasoning conducts us to this point; you say yourself that where a farm is re-let the landlord has the power to exact not only an increase of rent, but the whole increase of rates from the tenant?—I did not say the increase of rent; I said the amount of rate.

2580. The result would be this, would it not, that the tenant would give it, because he would prefer that to losing his occupation?—The tenant would be no worse off, and there would be no difference whether he pays to the landlord or to the overseer.

2581. The tenant would be worse off if the increase of the rate was added to the rent of his farm?—No; if the landlord is willing to allow the rent to continue as it was before, and he charges the tenant with the amount which he pays for rates which he (the owner) did not pay before, the tenant is in the same position as he was before, when he paid it himself.

2582. But his position is a worse one, because there has been an increase of rate upon him in either case?—No; I am speaking of the rate as it stands at the present time.

2583. In any case, this increase of rates would fall upon the tenant, would it not?—Not after the rate is wholly charged on the owner.

2584. You say that by competition the landlord can recoup himself for the increased charge upon him, supposing it fell upon him?—No, not by competition, but by simply readjustment, if he paid that which he did not pay before; the competition would be the same in all cases.

2585. You say that you would not divide those two rates between the owner and occupier?—Certainly not.

2586. Why not?—Because I think it is a much more simple, and plain, and direct course to place the charge that is said to be a charge upon the owner, and let him pay it entirely.

2587. With respect to the county rate charges, you would see no particular reason why the occupier should pay them?—I see no particular reason why the occupier should pay either the county rate or the poor rate.

2588. Looking through the items of the county rate, there is nothing particularly, you think, which interest the occupier very greatly?—I think not.

2589. Not the police rate?—No.

2590. Has he no interest in the gaol?—No more than any other person.

2591. Has he no interest in the pauper lunatics?—No, not more than any other capitalist; I take the farmer to be in precisely the same position as a tradesman; he is employing capital in a business; he does not pay anything to the rate on his capital.

2592. With respect to the county rate, it is your opinion, is it, that it might entirely fall upon the owner without any loss to the occupier?—Yes, certainly.

2593. Now, as to the poor rate, do you think that the poor rate stands upon exactly the same footing as the county rate?—Yes, I do; and the highway rate also.

2594. Is it not in the power of the occupier to reduce the amount of the poor rate by employment very materially?—I think it would be a most absurd doctrine that any employer of capital should be expected to employ labour which he did not otherwise want for the purpose of reducing a tax which he only bears indirectly.

2595. Then you would prefer throwing into the poorhouse a labourer who, perhaps, could hardly be called a whole man; that is, a man who is only able to do half a day's work?—I answer that question in the same way as I answered it before, that it is perfectly absurd that you should expect that an employer of capital in cultivation, or in any business, should employ an inefficient labourer and pay him more than he is worth.

1 April 1870.

2596. As an alternative, you would send him to the poorhouse, would you?—I would have nothing to do with him. I am an employer of labour, and I get the best man, and an inferior man, at a rate according as they are worth to me.

2597. Admitting that that is the feeling of occupiers of labour, supposing the owner paid the whole rate, and they were to throw off every inefficient man who did not produce to him an adequate profit, would not that tend to increase pauperism enormously?—Certainly not; no man does it now; why should he?

2598. I think you have told us that it is in the power of the occupier to reduce the rate?—No, I have not told you so.

2599. Not by the employment of labour?—No, not by the employment of more than he requires for his business. As a matter of charity, I may employ a man and give him half-a-crown a week when he is not worth one shilling; but that would not be a sound principle of commerce.

2600. And you would keep him off the rates?—Yes; but it would be an act of charity, not an act of business.

2601. Economically speaking, is it not better that a man should produce something than nothing?—Economically speaking, he does produce nothing beyond what he is worth to me.

2602. He produces enough to keep himself perhaps, though he does not produce a profit to you?—Exactly; but then it is out of my pocket as charity if I do not want him.

2603. But for the sake of the community it is surely better that he should produce something than nothing, and if he is in the workhouse he produces nothing?—No doubt, for the sake of the community; but what have I to do with the community, as a business man, except as a matter of business.

2604. You say, do you not, that the Union Chargeability Act having raised the rates, the occupier's interest has induced him to cast many of those men upon the rates?—No, I have not said so; and I do not think it has; as a general rule an agricultural labourer is pretty fully employed, and the matter goes on pretty much the same; but supposing there was a great pressure upon agriculture by low prices, and so on, the occupier has no interest whatever in employing men that he does not want.

2605. Of course that would be the case where there were no rates?—He does not require them anywhere, and he has nothing to do with them. He is in the same position as any other employer of capital.

2606. You think, do you not, that the administration of the poor rates by the owners would be equally efficient to the present system?—No doubt of it.

2607. You think that there would be increased attention to the expenditure?—Yes; if it was necessary they could send an assistant Poor Law Commissioner to sit at every board.

2608. You think that the understanding principally lies in the breeches pocket?—Certainly; it is a commercial matter, the employment of labour; you have no right to call upon a man to employ labourers, and to give them more than they are worth to him. I take farming to be a business precisely the same as manufacturing cotton or anything else, and I take the owner and the occupier to be one in the process.

2609. Mr. Acland.] I do not quite understand how you make out that the rates have increased 100 per cent.; will you be kind enough just shortly to answer my question; has the county rate in Somersetshire increased in your parish?—I have never taken the trouble to divide the county rate from the other rates; the charge is brought by the overseer for so much money to be paid.

2610. Have you not a county ratepayers' association in Somersetshire, and have you taken a leading part in the county of Somerset on the whole question of local taxation?—Yes, certainly; or rather, on the question of poor rate assessment.

2611. You are not able to state whether the county rate in your own parish has increased or not?—I can state this, that since about 1745 the aggregate rates have increased 1,400 per cent.

2612. We are talking now about what is actually going on in the country; from the active part which you have taken in this matter, you must have some knowledge of what the county rate has been in your own county; has it increased, or has it not increased?—There is no doubt whatever it has very largely increased.

2613. Has it increased a penny in the pound in Kimpton?—I cannot tell you.

2614. You do not know at all what rate you are paying for county rate?—No, I do not.

2615. Are you paying 6*d.* in the pound?—I do not know.

2616. Can you tell me whether the highway rate has increased?—The highway rate has not materially increased; not within perhaps 20 years.

2618. Chairman.] Is it to go down on the notes that you pay now twice as much aggregate sum in your parish for poor relief as what you did previous to the new poor law?—Yes, certainly.

2619. Mr. Ayrton.] Does that result from the Union Chargeability Act, or from the increased charge for the poor?—It results from the increased charge for the relief of the poor, from the machinery which the new poor law adopted for carrying out the new poor law, and from the additions to the rate; the police and many other things.

2620. Mr. Acland.] I presume you consider the police to be one element in the increase of rate?—Yes.

2621. That is not more than 2 d. or 2⅓ d. in the pound, is it?—I do not know what the police rate is in the pound.

2622. Chairman.] You state that the sum expended for poor relief has increased by 100 per cent., has that been brought about by your having twice as many paupers, or by your giving the paupers twice as much money as they had before?—The increase has arisen from the new charges for for the administration of the Poor Law, the additions to the rate, and some increase in the amount of relief, not perhaps individual amounts, but the increase in the number of paupers.

2623. I believe you have taken an interest in the general question of taxation; do you know what was the amount spent on poor relief only prior to 1834?—No, I cannot speak out of book; I have often referred to it in the Poor Law Returns; it is seen there, but I cannot speak out of book.

2624. But are you aware that the sum spent on poor relief only, in 1834 or thereabouts, was the same within 1,000,000 l. of that spent in the year 1868?—I do not know that it is so, but very probably it may be so; but as I have said before, the great charge on the poor rates after the close of the war arose from the great distress in agricultural districts which followed the close of the war in 1815.

2625. I am not speaking of that time, but of the time previous to 1834?—Between 1815 and 1834, I take to be the period that you allude to.

2626. Mr. Ayrton.] Are you aware that the increase in the poor rate did not arise from the close of the war, but that the great famine which took place subsequently was the great cause of the mounting up of the poor rate in England?—I do not understand what you mean when you speak of the great famine.

2627. Do not you know that the poor rates made the first great start in the great famine in the beginning of the century when they doubled, and that they made another great start when the great famine occurred after the war?—Certainly I do, and know that the state of the poor in agricultural parishes was very similar after the close of the war for seven years to what it is now in London, and other great places.

2628. Do you know that the cause of the increase was the great famine which occurred at the beginning of the century?—No doubt; during the war prices went up to 100 s. a quarter for wheat, and there was great distress in consequence.

2629. But you are aware that the cause of the rise of the rates was the great famine at the beginning of the century, and after the close of the war, and that the poor rates did not recede in either case?—They did not recede from the lowering of prices at the close of the war, at the time that you speak of; no doubt it was partly from the high price of food.

2630. Was not it on account of the great famine which raised the rates above 2,000,000 l., and after that they did not recede any more than they did not recede in the beginning of the century, when they rose about 2,000,000 l. in consequence of the famine?—Yes.

2631. Mr. Fielden.] When you stated that the increase in the rate was owing to new charges, to what did you allude?—For instance, when the Poor Law Act of 1832 was passed, there was an immense outlay to be repaid in 25 years for purchasing land for building unions, for the purchase of land, and for the erection of buildings. There was also an expensive establishment set up for the administration of the law, and there were many other things: there was the police force, and immense improvements have been made in militia stores, buildings, in gaols, in lunatic asylums, in county courts. I believe there is a county court for the county of Somerset which cost 100,000 l., which had all to be paid for out of the farmer's profits.

2632. Mr. Acland.] Are you aware that, notwithstanding all that you have named, the county rate in Somersetshire is 2¾ d. in the pound, including all those different expenses which you now speak of?—Exactly; but it does not follow that it is just because it is small. You must be aware that Somersetshire is a very large and a very rich county, and that is the cause of the lowness of the amount in the pound of our county rate.

2633. Mr. Ayrton.] Can you tell how much your rate in the pound has been affected by the Union Chargeability Act, one way or the other?—No, I cannot.

2634. Mr. Pell.] With reference to the effect of the Union Assessment Act, you gave us an instance of a farm in which the rates had been raised 100 l. a year; was that farm, or the land or parish where that farm was situated, devoid of labourers before?—Not that I am aware of.

2635. Then there must have been no paupers before?—I do not know anything about that.

2636. You told us, did you not, that you were a guardian?—Yes; but that parish is not in the union of which I am guardian; it is an estate of Mr. Sheridan's, near Dorchester.

Mr. Thomas Rogers, called in; and Examined.

2637. Chairman.] You are the clerk, are you not, to the local board in Reading?—Yes, and also town clerk.

Mr. T. Rogers.

2638. Reading is a borough, is it not?—Yes.

2639. As such you are the town clerk to the borough?—Yes, I am town clerk to the borough, and I am clerk to the Board of Health, not necessarily as town clerk.

2640. Will you state to the Committee the separate functions of the two bodies which you represent, and then the separate rates which are levied by both; have you a borough rate in Reading?—Yes; a borough rate is levied as part of the poor rate, and I will explain how the borough rate is raised.

2641. Does the Local Board raise funds also?—Yes.

2642. Have you a general district rate?—Yes.

2643. Will you state first the separate purposes to which the amount which you receive out of the poor rate as borough rate is applied, and to which the general district rate is applied?—The amount which we raise by the borough rate is to supply the deficiency of the borough fund, which is the primary fund from which all the corporate expenses are paid, and the deficiency, whatever it may be, upon the general expenditure, is made up by a borough rate. It is not raised for any specific purposes, but all the corporate expenses are chargeable upon the borough fund, and the amount required to meet the expenditure in case of deficiency in that fund is raised by a borough rate.

2644. Then with regard to the general district rate, to what is that applicable?—The general district rate is applicable to the various purposes of the Public Health Acts, the Local Government Acts, and all the Sanitary Acts; and those are by far the most important matters.

2645. Will you state how far the area of the borough, and the Local Board of Health overlap, or are they the same areas?—They are identical.

2646. Then you have two bodies, having an administration over the same area, but with different names?—They are not two bodies in fact, although they have different names. It is rather a stupid way of expressing it in the Public Health Act, in which the provision is that where the district of a Local Board is conterminous with the borough, then the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall be the Local Board. In point of fact, it was simply an addition of extra duties to the corporation, and it would have been very much better if it had simply said the corporation, because it does create a confusion of idea, as they are not two bodies.

2647. Do you keep two entirely different sets of books?—Yes.

2648. And do you levy two entirely different sets of rates?—Yes.

2649. Have you the same treasurer?—No; many of the officers are in fact the same, and it is very desirable to make them all so. We are tending very much in all our appointments to make them one.

2650. At present you have two separate administrations, though the people composing them are mainly the same?—Yes, it is a separate administration, I think, more in form than in substance; we keep separate minute books and separate accounts.

2651. Have you separate offices?—We have no public offices now, the meetings are held at the council chamber.

2652. Could you state the aggregate rate levied for borough purposes?—The borough rate is nominally said to be about 4 d. or 5 d. in the pound on the gross estimated value; that is the amount which we require twice a year to supplement the necessities of the corporation out of the borough fund.

2653. What would the general district rate be?—About 2 s. 8 d. in the pound on the net rateable value.

2654. What is the total sum that you receive from it?—Somewhere about 10,000 l. or 11,000 l. a year.

2655. In the Local Taxation Returns I do not find a return of the Local Board of Health of Reading; local boards of health have all to make returns to the Home Office of their expenditure, and I find that Reading has not made a return?—We have made a great many returns; I cannot say as to any particular return; I have brought with me a printed copy of last year's accounts.

2656. Are you aware that a fine is imposed by Act of Parliament upon those local boards that do not make annual returns?—I daresay there is, but I think we have made all returns required; I think it must be a mistake. These are printed copies of the accounts of the last three years (handing the same to the Chairman).

2658. What income have you got for your borough fund except property?—Very little indeed; and the amount is mainly raised by a borough rate.

2659. Can you state to the Committee how the police are managed?—The police are managed by the watch committee of the corporation.

2660. How do you pay for the police?—We pay for them out of the borough fund, and we get an allowance back from the Government.

2661. Do you pay for them by a special rate, or are they paid out of the borough fund?—It is paid out of the borough fund.

2662. Generally speaking, I believe, in the many boroughs where the police are paid for out of the borough fund, there are no separate receipts, except repayments from the Treasury?—That is all; in fact, we make no borough rate of any kind whatever, but in order to supplement what we want, we make an estimate every half year under the Municipal Corporations Act of the amount which will be required, and then we order the overseers under a clause in that Act to pay us what is called the borough rate, but in truth it is ordering them to send us a certain sum of money; that is what it comes to.

2663. Speaking of the borough, are there any other rates except the borough rate?—None whatever.

2664. There are boroughs, are there not, which have other rates besides?—Perhaps so; but we have no other rate except the general district rate.

2665. Have you the same collector for the borough rate and the general district rate?—The borough rate is not collected separately; it is collected as part of the poor rate.

2666. Have you a separate collector for the general district rate?—They are separately appointed, but we appoint the same person; we find that convenient.

2667. Do they collect both rates at the same time?—They may do so.

2668. On what assessment?—The basis of assessment for the general district rate is the poor rate.

2669. Do you levy the same rate in the pound of 2 s. 8 d. over the whole of the district?—Yes; the district is confined to the borough.

2670. Have you no portion of the district where they only pay one-fourth?—Yes; the basis of that is the rateable value for the poor rate, and there are some few exceptions under the Local Government Act, such as railways and tithes, which are assessed only to the amount of one-fourth of their value.

2671. Would it be difficult to collect the general district rate with the poor rate on that account?—I do not think it is; but inasmuch as the rates are applied to separate purposes, they ought to be kept distinct.

2672. How do you manage to get your assessment for the general district rate; do you apply to the clerk of the union?—We get a copy of the poor rate book, and we simply copy it.

2673. Without examining it, are you bound by Act of Parliament to take that assessment?—The Local Government Act provides that the general district rate shall be made upon the net rateable value, as ascertained by the poor rate.

2674. You have no option, have you?—No option whatever; the only variation that we make is to meet the special exemptions which are provided by the statute, such as railways, tithes, and a few matters of that sort, which are very unimportant.

2675. They do not appear to be important in Reading,

Reading, but they might be important, might they not, in some districts?—I think they might be; I do not think the exemption is altogether quite fair respecting railways; they are only assessed on one-fourth, but seeing that we include the highway rate, and such like, in the general district rate, which is required under recent legislation, and that the expense of maintaining the roads is thus included in the general district rate, the exemption seems unreasonable.

2676. How do you manage about lighting and paving?—The whole of the paving of the town, in fact the whole of the external management of the town lighting, paving, roads, and everything, is in the hands of the corporation, as the Local Board of Health; the Highway Acts have been merged in the Public Health Act, and the local board are appointed surveyors of highways to execute all the duties of surveyors of highways within the borough; we do not make a separate highway rate, but it is included in the general district rate.

2677. How do you manage in the rural portion with railways, and so on, as regards the highway rate; are they let off for that portion of the sum which is raised for highway purposes?—That is practically the result of their being assessed to the general district rate, and getting the benefit of the exemption, and I think it is an unfair one; it might probably have been a reasonable one as respects general sanitary arrangements, which I suppose was the ground of the exemption, but it has always seemed to me an unfair thing that they should not pay their full proportion for the highways, because they use them more than any one.

2678. Have you power to levy a separate rate for the highways, if you choose?—We had at one time, but I think it was taken away by statute some six or seven years ago; that is my impression, or I think we should have made the rate separately if it had not been so.

2679. You would wish to levy it separately, because at present the exemption which was made to cover certain purposes which affect the town only is made to extend to purposes in which the rural parts are frequently interested?—That is so; land is also entitled to the same exemption.

2680. Have you any parishes which are partly in and partly out of the borough of Reading?—Ecclesiastically we have, there are two hamlets without the municipal borough and the Parliamentary borough.

2681. Have you any poor law parishes that are partly in and partly out of the borough?—We have the two hamlets that I speak of.

2682. Have you any union which is partly in and partly out of the borough?—Yes, the union is composed of the three Reading parishes, including those hamlets.

2683. Can you explain how you levy the borough rate on the union where the parishes are partly in and partly out of the borough, if it is paid out of the poor rate?—We levy it on the parishes, excluding that portion of the parish which is beyond the borough; the poor rate contains a separate assessment for the hamlets, at the end of the general rate-book, so that it works very satisfactorily.

2684. But where a hamlet is partly in and partly out, do not you levy the borough rate separately?—That does not occur; the hamlet in each case is entirely beyond the municipal borough, although it is partly within the parish forming the borough. We have three parishes, St. Mary's, St. Giles', and St. Lawrence, and the parish of St. Giles includes the parish within the borough, and the hamlet of Whitley; but we never interfere with that, it has a separate assessment, and they do appoint a separate overseer.

2685. Has there been any conflict at all between town and country as regards the exemptions under the general district rate?—Now-a-days no difficulty has been raised about that; it is only two or three farms and gardens, and land used for agricultural purposes in the outskirts of the town, which become entitled to exemption, or rather, diminished rating.

2686. Is there any compounding; that is to say, payment of the rates by the owners as regards the general district rate?—Yes; we levy the general district rate on the owners under the powers of the Act directly; it is not a composition; we assess the owners at a reduced value.

2687. Under what Act?—Under the Local Government Act.

2688. Will you read the Clause of the Act to the Committee?—It is the 55th section of the Local Government Act of 1858. It repeals the rating clauses of the Public Health Act of 1848, and then enacts "That the general district rates shall be made and levied upon the occupier of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor, and shall be assessed upon the full net annual value of such property, ascertained by the rate (if any) for the relief of the poor made next before the making of the assessments under this Act, subject, however, to the following exceptions, regulations, and conditions, namely: The owner, instead of the occupier, may, at the option of the local board, be rated in cases where the rateable value of any premises liable to assessment under this Act does not exceed the sum of 10 l.; or, where any premises liable to an assessment are let to weekly or monthly tenants; or, where any premises so liable as aforesaid are let in separate apartments, or where the rents become payable or are collected at any shorter period than quarterly, subject to this proviso, that in cases where the owner is rated instead of the occupier, he shall be assessed upon such reduced estimate as the local board deems reasonable of the net annual value, not being less than two-thirds nor more than four-fifths of such annual value; and where such reduced estimate is in respect of tenements, whether occupied or unoccupied, then such assessment may be made on one-half of the amount at which such tenements would be liable to be rated if the same were occupied, and the rate were levied on the occupiers." Then it goes on, "The owner of any tithes or of any tithe commutation rent-charge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water or used only as a canal or towing-path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof; provided, nevertheless, that if within any district, or part of a district, any kind of property be exempted from rating by any local Act," then the exemptions shall be continued.

Mr. T. Rogers. 1 April 1870.

2689. Are you in this position, that while you have one law of compounding for the general district rate, you have another as regards poor rate, from which you pay your borough rate?—That would be so,

2690. From which there would be another difficulty, unless there were further legislation with regard to putting the general district rate and the poor rate together?—They could not go together without altering the law.

2691. As regards the election of the town council, will you state briefly to the Committee what are the qualifications for voting?—It is a rating qualification.

2692. Have you a plurality of votes?—No.

2693. Have the owners any votes?—No.

2694. So that you have this position, that the owners paying the rates in certain cases have no voice at all in the representation?—That is so, certainly, except that being, generally speaking, residents in the town they would be almost sure to be qualified in some other way.

2696. But not rated as such?—No; the qualification used to be a property qualification, but under the recent Act, I think any one who is rated at 15 l. a year is entitled to be elected a councillor.

2697. The qualification for electing is an occupation franchise, and the qualification for being elected is also an occupation franchise, is it not?—It is a rating occupation franchise; it is not an occupation without the rating.

2698. Will you state how far the ex-officio element enters as regards town councils?—There is no ex-officio element.

2699. Therefore the owners have not the representation on town councils that they have at boards of guardians?—No, they have not.

2700. Neither in the plurality of votes, nor in the ex-officio element?—There is no ex-officio element, and no plurality of votes.

2701. Have you turned your attention at all to the desirability of dividing the rates between owners and occupiers?—I have not thought very much about it; but I should be happy to answer any question that you put to me. But although I have not considered it very much, I should not agree with the evidence which I have heard here to-day, that it would be advisable to put them entirely upon the owner; I should think that that would be a great mistake.

2702. If you were to place the rates entirely upon the owner, at all events you think, do you not, that it would be necessary to re-consider the election of those who have to administer them?—Yes, certainly; I was surprised to hear anyone give such an opinion, because obviously the owners of property could never administer them, and would not, from their position and circumstances, especially in agricultural districts; they would not attend to the detailed management. My opinion would be that the management of the rate should be very much in the hands of persons who are locally present, and would give practical attention to it; otherwise you would inevitably get a very large and wasteful expenditure.

2703. Could you state to the Committee whether, amongst the purposes for which the general district rate is levied, there are any that may be called of a permanent character?—Yes' certainly, all our improvements are, and we have done a great deal in that way in Reading; we have constructed public pleasure-grounds, formed new streets, and improved the old streets. We borrow the money, and we can only borrow the money in case it is for a permanent improvement.

2704. Will you state what is the annual sum that you pay for interest and repayment of loans out of the total expenditure of the local board?—There is at the end of the account a tabulated statement showing the entire borrowed money of the local board, and it also gives the total amount of interest. I should say that our mode of borrowing money now, and we intend to adhere to it in future, is by getting it from insurance offices who are willing to make this arrangement, that we repay an equal sum, of principal and interest, annually, during a period of 30 years; so that we save the necessity of making a sinking fund which, under the old Acts, was necessary. The old practice was to borrow, paying the interest upon the loan, and setting apart a certain sum as a sinking fund, which was invested in various ways, but that is not so good a plan as borrowing it on a fixed footing and paying it off yearly, by equal sums, during a fixed period.

2705. What is your annual payment for interest and repayment of capital at present?—£. 1,625. 9 s. is the amount of the annual instalment, principal and interest, on borrowed money, that is to say, of those loans which are repaid by equal annual instalments; upon the other loans, which are the earlier ones, the interest at the present time is 180 l. a year, and the sinking fund is 159 l. 15 l. 2 d.; those three figures put together make the total annual payment on that score.

2706. You do not separate the borrowed money from your rate, do you?—Those sums are all included in the general district rate.

2707. Out of the 2 s. 8 d., which you have mentioned, how much in the pound represents the repayment of interest and debt?—Those amounts come to a few pounds under 2,000 l.

2708. Is that for half a year or for a year?—That is for a year; a penny rate in Reading produces something under 400 l., so that a fivepenny rate would about represent the borrowed money.

2709. The total district rate is about 10,000 l. a year, is it not?—Roughly, you might put it at that.

2710. Of the 10,000 l., one-fifth goes for repayment of debt and for the interest on it, which may be considered to be a permanent expenditure?—That is so; we consider that it is the wisest way to make improvements to borrow money for them, and we do this on a large scale, thinking that the present generation should benefit from them as well as those that come afterwards.

2711. May the Committee assume that most of the remainder is for city purposes?—It includes the public lighting of the town, which is a very large sum, and it includes the paving of the town.

2712. Could you state quite roughly the various items?—Yes; the first item of expenditure is highways, footways, scavenging, watering the streets, 1,687 l. 2 s. 6 d. for one half year, and 1,903 l. for the next half year, making a total of 3,590 l. 2 s. 6 d. The next item is public lights, the first half year being 835 l. 7 s. 5 d., and the second half year 1,043 l. 11 s. 2 d., that is about about 1,870 l. The third item is miscellaneous public works, and in one half year it is 140 l., and in the second half year 375 l., making about 500 l. Then we have public pleasure-grounds, public bathing-place, paving, and so on; paving is a large item; in the first half year it was 461 l., and in the second 1,178 l., making a sum of 1,500 l. or 1,600 l. The others are all small items; those are the three great items. We have done very little in our sewerage, I am sorry to say.

2713. The three great items are the highway rates, paving, lighting, and the interest?—Yes.

2714. Mr. Fielden.] What is the rateable value of Reading?—It is about 108,000 l. a year.

2715. Mr. Walter.] Do you know the amount of the poor rate in the borough of Reading; how much in the pound it is?—There are two rates, about 3 s. 4 d. in the year.

2716. Are they collected in the form of an equal charge, upon an equal assessment, upon the parishes constituting the union, or does it differ in the different parishes?—The present year they are precisely the same; it never varies very much. There has been a slight difference in one parish, St. Lawrence, it has been slightly less. In the other two parishes, why I cannot explain, but in the present year they are precisely the same.

2717. Previous to the Union Chargeability Act, was there no difference between the two?—Yes, the difference then arose very much from the difference in their mode of assessment. In some of the parishes they insisted on deducting a larger amount from the gross annual value, before they got to the net rateable value, whereas now they get uniformity.

2718. Can you state the difference between the deductions in the different parishes previous to the Union Chargeability Act?—Some of them deducted 20 per cent., and some of them 25 per cent. I could not state the rate in the pound. It would not be a very large amount; I think it would be about 2 d. or 3 d. in the pound in some years.

2719. Would it be sufficient at all to affect the value of the rent of houses in either of those parishes?—Yes, it would.

2720. Can you state from your knowledge whether, since the Union Chargeability Act came into operation, there has been practically any readjustments of rent in consequence of the equalization of the rate?—There would be no means of ascertaining that, it is so much a matter of private arrangement with the tenants who take the houses; I have no doubt that it would operate. The first question a man asks is, what is the amount of rates? I believe that is universally asked.

2721. So that the rate ultimately falls upon the owner?—Yes, it must in effect, no doubt; in that sense it would; that is to say, the owner would get certainly so much less rent for a house.

2722. Is it upon the whole union that the rate is as high as 3 s. 4 d. in the pound?—Yes.

2723. Chairman.] Besides the general district rate?—Yes.

2724. In the Local Taxation Returns which have come in from Reading, the total rate from Reading is stated to be under 3 s.?—That must be the poor rate.

2725. No; this is for all the rates?—Then it is inaccurate if it is so; the poor rate is 1 s. 8 d. in the pound twice a year.

2726. Has it been so for some time?—About that; it has varied; sometimes it has been 1 s. 6 d., but it has been within the margin between 1 s. 6 d. and 1 s. 8 d.

2727. Mr. Walter.] Can you state what the rate is in Caversham parish?—I believe at Caversham the rates vary from 9 d. to 10 d., and there is a very curious thing about that; when I first went to Caversham, eight years ago, to live, the rates did not average more than about 8 d. in the pound; the assessable value of the parish has been immensely increased, and, of course, the natural result of that ought to have been a diminution in the amount of the rate, but it has not been so. I have not gone into this very minutely, but I asked the collector why it was not, and he tells me that it arises from the establishment charges being thrown over the whole union districts, and that the assessment of the remote lying parishes away from Reading being so much less in gross than Caversham, we pay in that way; but the practical result is that although the parish has very much increased by the building of houses, it being a suburb of Reading, we do not get a diminution of rate.

2728. Mr. Pell.] Do you mean that you used to pay an eightpenny rate, where you now pay 10 d.?—Yes, but that 8 d. was levied on a lower amount of assessable value.

2729. Colonel Brise.] Is the Assessed Rate Act in operation in Reading?—Yes, the existing poor rates are made under that Act.

2730. Mr. Walter.] In what union is Caversham?—In the Henley Union.

2731. Inasmuch as in your opinion the incidence of the poor rate ultimately falls upon the owner, should you not think it an improvement upon the present system if a portion of that rate were directly paid by the owner, and he had a corresponding share in the administration of the rate?—I certainly think that if the owner is made responsible for the rate, he ought to have a corresponding share in the management, otherwise it would be a most extravagant arrangement, because clearly the tenant farmers particularly would not care about the incidence of the rate.

2733. Therefore, inasmuch as the existence of the poor rate is to that extent a diminution of the rent which the owner would otherwise charge, and so far comes out of his pocket, should you not think it desirable that he should have a certain share in the administration of it?—I should say if the charge is made absolutely on the owner, I do not see what the tenant farmer would have to do with it at all; I think that would be a very bad arrangement to make; I do not think that the owners of property generally would administer the poor rate or could do so (I do not think that their position would admit of it) in a satisfactory way; it would be a very extravagant arrangement.

2734. Do you think that there is any distinction to be drawn between the owners of property in a town and the owners of property in the country, with reference to that?—Yes, I think a very clear distinction, because they are a different class of men; the owners of house property in towns are, generally speaking, men who look very keenly after their own interests, and would do so; in fact, I think the owners of tenement property in towns are a very great nuisance very often, for their excessively niggardly ways, and their obstruction to desirable improvements; they are always present, and nothing would escape their control; practically it is so now.

2735. Then you think that whatever difficulties there might be in conferring upon the owners of property in the country a larger share in the administration of the poor rate, those difficulties would not apply with equal force to the owners of property in towns?—I think not; I think the habits of the two classes of people control that question. I do not think that country gentlemen, who are mainly the owners of land, would administer our local rates and parish rates in the same way as resident persons.

2736. In the borough of Reading is the practice of compounding for poor rates in use?—Yes, the Act of last Session has been brought into action in Reading.

2737. And have the owners, in consequence of that system, any more direct share in the administration of the Poor Law?—No, I think nothing more than they have before; they get their commission, and the system in Reading is being carried out of now giving them the full benefit of the 30 per cent. commission, because they are assessed for the whole year.

2738. And they are content, are they, with that arrangement?—Yes, they like it; the commission is a temptation to contentment; but I meant on other points that the tenement owners in towns are of a class of persons who will look carefully after the matter, but that would not be the case so much with country gentlemen.

2739. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] In Reading, when there is a new street made, are the paving and lighting met out of the rate, or by the owners of the adjoining property?—We have had some little difficulty about that; we adapt it as best we can to the circumstances; but our principle is, that before we take to a new street for the purpose of paving, the owner should place it in a proper state and condition for a road; he avoids it if he can; he tries to get it thrown on the public rates as soon as possible, and we have to watch him in that respect. Say, that a man has got a piece of ground for building; he forms a street, and sells it off into lots of land for building houses, and then he will leave the road to take care of itself.

2740. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Then he endeavours to get you to take to the road and pave it?—Yes.

2741. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] Then the ratepayers have to pay for the paving and lighting of it?—We do not do that; we resist it.

2742. Mr. St. Aubyn.] You generally look out pretty sharp?—We have generally compelled them to do something, or else we let it wait for 10 or 12 years. The principle of the law is to compel the owners to do it before we take to it; they put the road in a right state, and then we take to it. If we go beyond that, we strain the law rather.

2743. Mr. Fielden.] What is the population of the Reading local board district?—I should say about 32,000.

2744. What is the size of the union?—The union is the same as the borough. The Reading Union consists entirely of three parishes, with the addition of those two hamlets which I spoke of, which are mainly agricultural districts.

2745. Have you a union workhouse?—Yes; that is one of the reasons why the rates have increased. There has been a heavy expenditure lately in building a new workhouse infirmary, which has added, I believe, something like 3 d. or 4 d. to the poor rate.

2746. What have they spent on the workhouse?—I cannot tell the exact sum; it is several thousands. I believe it was done under the order of the Poor Law Board.

2748. Mr. Pell.] You stated that the rates levied under the Public Health Act are 2 s. 8 d. in the pound, and the rates under the poor rate 3 s. 4 d.; does the poor rate include the police rate?—Yes, so far as it is applied to the borough fund; it does not include any special police rate. If I made myself understood at the commencement, the borough rate is about 4 d. or 5 d. in the pound, paid from the poor rate, and that goes, not to any specific purpose, but to make up the deficiency in the borough fund. It includes prosecutions, police, the administration of justice, and the salary of the recorder; all those matters are paid for out of the borough fund.

2749. Mr. Ayrton.] Will you take in your hand this Return, made by the borough, of the borough fund, ending the 1st March 1868 (handing the Municipal Boroughs Return to the Witness); did you make that Return?—I do not think I made such a return as that; I have already handed in the accounts for 1868, which I know are accurate.

2750. Mr. Pell.] Under the Public Health Act of 1848 there is a certain method of assessing property and hereditaments, putting agricultural land upon a different footing, as you said, to the town land, and there are certain opportunities of compounding with regard to the owners of property?—That is so.

2751. There is a latitude given in the Act with regard to that composition; will you tell me exactly how you have applied that composition in Reading; upon what terms do the owners of house property in Reading stand with respect to assessment under the Public Health Act?—We allow them to deduct one-third, and we assess them upon the reduced estimate, that is to say, two-thirds of the rateable value.

2752. There is another General Act which you apply also in Reading, namely, the Assessed Rates Act; and that again would give the governing power a certain latitude with regard to the assessment of owners; how have you applied that, and what precise terms have you come to with the owners there?—That is the Act of last year as to property not exceeding 8 l. rateable value; and that is a question of commission.

2753. Upon

2753. Upon what terms do you allow the owners to compound with you in Reading under the Assessed Rates Act of last year?—If I understand, the owner is assessed on that amount, and he gets his commission; that constitutes the difference.

2754. What is the commission?—Fifteen per cent.; and if he goes for the whole year he is entitled, under some other section of the Act, to another 15 per cent. That has practically been carried out, and that would be, no doubt, the practical result.

2755. It comes to this; that upon the same property in Reading the local board allow an owner, if he compounds, a different reduction from what he might receive under the application of the Assessed Rates Act?—It is different, no doubt, but the difference is not very large.

2756. It comes to this, does it not; that an application might be made for two rates in Reading from the owner, or the owner's agent, on the same day, both being upon different assessments?—Yes, there is no doubt about that.

2757. Coming to the owner of property in the borough of Reading, how many different assessments might there be applied to the same property; we have had two, are there any others?—No; there are only two general rates, the poor-rate and the district rate.

2758. How many different receipts might be tendered to the owner of a property in Reading?—The poor-rate is collected twice a year, and the general district rate also; there would be one form for each rate.

2759. There would be the Board of Health receipt, would there not?—Yes, but that includes all local taxation except poor rate; there is nothing else; there may be a little confusion. I think I have heard, now and then, some individual ratepayer speaking of the difference between the two; I have heard that remark made, but not extensively; there is the difference, no doubt, which you point out.

2760. Then it really resolves itself into only two assessments, and two forms of receipt?—That is all.

2761. Mr. Ayrton.] Do any local authorities supply gas or water to the inhabitants, or are those supplies made by joint-stock companies?—The honourable Member is aware that under the Public Health Act there is power given to local boards to supply water, with the restriction that they should not do so where there was a company. We had a company in Reading, but in the year 1868 we succeeded in passing an Act of Parliament, by which the water supply was transferred from that company to the local board, in consideration of the payment of an annuity, so that we now have the entire water supply.

2762. Is the rate for the water included in the expense that you have mentioned?—No, there will be a profit upon that, we hope, because we continue to make the same charges as the company made. The working of the waterworks undertaking is a separate matter from the general rate, and in the last year there was a surplus of profit upon it.

2763. You treat that as the charge, as if you were the company, in fact?—Yes, we keep an account for that purpose, because we pay the annuity out of the profits of the waterworks; but it is a remunerative thing, and will be remunerative.

2764. There is a gas company that supplies gas, is there not?—Yes; there is a gas company that supplies gas; we tried to get it some years ago, but we did not succeed.

2765. Chairman.] Will you turn to page 18 of your Municipal Corporations Act Account from the 1st of September 1867 to the 1st of September 1868, you find there three items for the three parishes of Reading for the borough rates, amounting together to upwards of 5,000 l.?—Yes.

2766. That is much more than 4 d. in the pound, is it not?—I looked at it this morning, and I calculated that the rating produces about 400 l. for a penny. The amount which would be entered in this account would be the amount actually received; it might not represent the amount of a particular rate.

2767. Mr. Ayrton.] You must evidently have made a mistake, because it would be 10 d., and the 5 d. that you spoke of would be the half year's rate?—That is so; we make it twice a year. But, as I said, those figures may not represent the particular amount of rate. I presume that the treasurer would have to put into this account what he receives and pays between the 1st of March one year and the 1st of March the other year. I remember, two years ago, the old treasurer died, and there was a debt due to him, and I know that they made an extra rate; and that, very probably, is the one you put your finger on.

2768. I see, in the account, that there was a balance due to treasurer of 2,000 l., which was reduced to 1,300 l. at the end of the year?—Yes; we made an extra rate for the purpose, and I have no doubt the expense and the difference between that explains the difference between our general course of action and this particular case.

2769. Would you think it an improvement that the general district rate and the poor rate should be levied together, collected together, and audited together, if possible?—No, I think not.

2770. Why not?—The present system acts well, and I do not like changes unless they are improvements.

2771. Would you think it better that you should continue, as the honourable Member pointed out, levying rates upon different principles and different rates of composition, and collected at different times, rather than that they should all be put on one system?—You would have great difficulty in making the assessment the same, unless you got rid of the whole of those exemptions; your form of rate-book would not admit of it.

2772. Who audits the municipal accounts?—Elected auditors.

2773. By whom are they appointed?—By the ratepayers; two are elected by the ratepayers, and the mayor for the time being nominates a third.

2774. Are they professional auditors?—No.

2775. Is it a real audit?—Yes, it is now, and has been for some years past.

2776. I suppose that depends very much upon whom the ratepayers elect; you have no guarantee for professional proficiency?—None whatever.

2777. As regards the general district rate, who audits it?—The Local Government Act provides that where the district local board is the same as the municipal corporation, the accounts are to be audited by the borough auditors.

2778. Can you state how it is done where it is not

1 April 1870.

not the same as the borough?—By the Poor Law auditor.

2779. Therefore, where there is no municipal council, you have an independent auditor appointed by a different body, who audits the accounts of the local board of health?—Yes, because the municipal régime does not exist; that is the reason, I presume.

2780. Where the municipal régime exists, you have elected auditors who are not professional at all?—Yes, the auditors of the borough are the auditors in that case; that is the theory of the Public Health Act, that where there is a municipal body, it is an addition to the duties of that municipal body.

2781. Parliament has trusted municipal boroughs with that duty, but it has not trusted local boards of health?—They have not made the same provision as to auditing, and I presume that where there is an old-established corporation, there is some guarantee from their long experience of public business.

2782. But you do not have a professional audit?—No, we do not; our accounts are audited in the way I describe.

2783. Mr. Pell.] How many collections in the course of the year for the district rate have you now?—Two.

2784. And how many under the Assessed Rates Act?—Two, also.

2785. I understand you to say that the difference between the two assessments, as you have worked them out in Reading, by applying the two Acts, is a very trifling one?—Very trifling.

2786. Just enough to cause confusion, and not enough to produce any benefit?—I do not think it causes confusion; I would rather keep the general district rate separate from the other for this reason, that the whole of the purposes to which it is applied are distinct and separate from the poor rate, and they have no connection whatever; and they are not administered by the same body, which again, I think, would be an objection to the rates being collected by one person or made by one body.

2787. But looking at it from the ratepayers' point of view, to a careful man is it not rather puzzling that a 1 s. rate asked for on Monday should raise a different sum upon the same hereditament to a 1 s. rate asked for on Tuesday, the amount being only raised by, perhaps, a few pence upon a small property, and a 1 d. upon 2 s. on a larger one?—Yes; but what makes the difference there is the Act of Parliament; you see, the objects not being identical, you cannot get a uniformity of rate unless you alter the legislation.

2788. But the objects to which they are applied are not identical; the relief of the poor in a country village and the roads are not identical, but still you raise the rates in the country under the same assessment?—The highway rate is a very unimportant rate as compared to the district rate.

2789. Mr. Ayrton.] Is there much property rated at one-fourth in your district?—There would be the railways and the land; I cannot give the exact figure, but we have several railways in Reading, and the tithes also of the town are subject to exemption, and I think it is a fair exemption as far as sanitary purposes are concerned, but I think railways ought not to be exempt from that portion which relates to roads.

2790. Chairman.] Have you a borough lunatic asylum?—We unite with the county of Berkshire in providing an asylum for Reading.

2791. How do you pay your contribution?—We have just borrowed money for the purpose; we are erecting a new asylum; till a very recent period the borough of Reading was in union with the county of Oxford and the county of Berks; but the asylum at Littlemore, in consequence of the increased demand by Oxford, has been transferred almost wholly to Oxford with some small exception; and Berkshire, acting in union with Reading and another town in Berkshire, is building an asylum.

THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY CHRISTIE BELOE, called in; and Examined.

5 April 1870.

2792. Chairman.] YOU are a Justice of the Peace at Liverpool, are you not?—I am.

2793. Have you been a member of the town council at Liverpool?—Yes, for many years; 12 years, I think it is.

2794. Have you been chairman of the water committee of the council?—Yes, about 10 years.

2795. In what capacity are you a member of the town council?—It is an elective body triennially; I have been several times elected; under the Municipal Act one-third go out of office every year.

2796. Are you also a considerable owner of property in Liverpool?—I am.

2797. Have you given your attention at all to the subject of local taxation?—The whole subject was very prominently brought before me about 10 years since, when, in consequence of the reports of various sanitary commissioners, the subject of sanitary improvement, more especially with regard to water supply, forced itself upon all the town councils of the kingdom; and among the rest, Liverpool and Manchester spent very enormous sums of money in improving the supply of water; the consequence of that was that we went to Parliament for power to spend money; but we did not at the same time go to Parliament for the proper powers to raise the revenue to meet the debt; that was in 1846 to 1848.

2798. Are you speaking of the outlay required for the first establishment of waterworks?—For the first establishment, and then their subsequent enlargement.

2799. I presume that the consumers of the water pay for the current expenses of the water supply?—Up to that time they did; but the principle was enunciated in the Act of 1862 that such a supply of water to a town like Liverpool could not help benefiting the owner of every yard of land within its radius, and that therefore it was unjust to levy all the expenses of that water account upon the mere ratepayers and shopkeepers that happened to use the water; the consequence was that I was instructed, or rather the committee were instructed by the council, to apply for an Act in 1862, the preamble of which Act recites, that the value of all property within the borough has been materially increased, and property improved and benefited; and then in a subsequent clause it gave the town council power to levy a 6*d.* rate in aid of the expenses of the improvement of Liverpool upon all property assessed to the poor; and that rate was divisible, half payable by the landlord and half by the tenant; the net consequence of which was that the landlords of Liverpool submitted to a property tax in perpetuity of 1¼ per cent., which represents 3*d.* in the pound.

2800. Is that limited by the Act to 6*d.* now?—Yes, and it is always leviable; we can neither raise more nor less; we always levy a 6*d.* rate.

2801. I believe that that rate in the mode of its apportionment is peculiar to Liverpool?—Yes, when you go to its apportionment, it is; but since then, both Dublin and Manchester and Glasgow have, I think, adopted the principle, and considered it just.

2802. What was, in round numbers, the amount of the revenue of your water trust?—In 1860 we had spent about two millions of money, and we have now spent somewhere about 100,000 l. more; but the rental of the water trust is now about 148,000 l. a year, and it is going on increasing yearly with the increase of the inhabitants of the place.

2804. And the remainder, therefore, is the receipt from the water supply?—From the tenants who pay 6¾ d. in the pound, and from some miscellaneous charges of various kinds, as also for water supplied to the shipping.

2805. How is it collected from the owners?—It is collected in connection with our municipal rates; the same collector gathers them all.

2806. Is it collected through the tenant?—Yes, always through the tenant; we have nothing to do with the landlord.

2807. Is it levied, as far as regards the landlord, in a mode similar to the property tax?—Probably you may call it so, like the sewerage rate; the sewerage rate is in a similar way divided between the landlord and the tenant, and the man, when he pays his rent, deducts what he has paid for either one or the other.

5 April 1870.

2808. Have you any clause in your Act preventing landlords agreeing with their tenants that the tenant should pay this water rate?—No; on the contrary, we have a clause protecting any agreement then existing from the effect of that Act.

2809. When the tax was imposed in the first instance, under the then existing agreements, the tenants were unable to deduct it from the landlord?—Certainly, because the usual run was that the tenant paid all municipal rates. Now, although it might be supposed to be habit to insert that, it is not so in reality. I have a great deal to do with property, and I know very few cases where such a thing is attempted now. In the present day the usual covenant is to pay all municipal rates, except a proportion of the sewage and the water rate.

2810. Are you able to state to the Committee with some authority, from your experience, that as a matter of fact, the landlords do not generally exact the rate from their tenants?—I never did myself; I know a great many landlords, and I do not know, with one or two exceptions, that they ever do.

2811. Does that apply to small properties as well as large properties?—With regard to small properties, the case does not apply. We have, what I consider to be, a good system; the landlords pay all the rates on small property, and they get their benefit in this way: supposing I own half a street of houses, which we call a small property, the rent is 16 l. or 17 l a year, and if I will undertake with the authorities to pay the rates of that property, they give me a considerable discount. The consequence is, that I pay the rates, whether the houses are occupied or not; but, as a rule, I feel that I get my rents better from only my own collector going there, and no other collector of rates whatever.

2812. Is it the fact, that owners of property have very considerable influence on the town council of Liverpool?—There is Mr. Robertson Gladstone, and other gentlemen, who own largely of property in Liverpool.

2813. Are there a good many owners of property in the town council?—I should think nearly all of them are, more or less, owners of property.

2814. Do they represent the occupiers more than the owners?—Generally, a gentleman who is in the position of a town councillor has acquired something like means, and in Liverpool those means generally consist of house property.

2815. So that we may take it that, at all events, the owners are not overweighted in the town council?—No, I do not consider that they are.

2816. You would not be able to say that this property rate or tax of 3 d. was forced upon the owners against their will by the majority of the ratepayers?—Quite the reverse. The bodies interested in the matter met in my office, and the town council themselves did not object; in fact, there was no division at all upon the question of levying a rate; the only division was whether the rate should be 4 d., 5 d., 6 d., or 9 d.; it was the amount and not the principle that was objected to.

2817. From whom did the proposal come?—I believe I originated it.

2818. And you being an owner of property yourself?—Yes? it cost me a great deal of money.

2819. Was it objected to as unfair to the owners or not?—I have no recollection. Mr. Gladstone was the chief witness before the Committee of the House of Commons upon the subject; and, as I said before, he is one of the largest owners of property in Liverpool; and I was another witness.

2820. Do you think that this 3 d. in the pound property tax, or, as you called it, 1¼ per cent., induced the landlords to raise their rents proportionately?—I never did.

2821. Do you think it has had that effect?—Certainly not; some landlords privately complained to me that I had done them a very ill turn, but they submitted.

2822. How do you manage with persons who live without the borough, but who still enjoy the water?—We had this clause put in the Act, that insomuch as we could not levy the rate upon them, and inasmuch as we levy the water rent, we will say for Liverpool, at 6 d. in the pound; those living out of the borough were to pay 50 per cent. more than we paid in the borough, because of our rate; therefore they would pay 9 d. where we should pay 6 d.; but then in addition to our 6 d. we pay the rate, so that it makes it quite equal in the long run, because the 3 d. was paid by the landlord and 3 d. by ourselves, and 6 d. by ourselves.

2823. Was the question raised as to whether the whole rate ought to be charged upon the owner?—Some thought the whole, and some thought 25 per cent.; but, as I said before, the principle of the rate was unanimously adopted, only the amount differed.

2824. Will you state the circumstances of the application, by the borough of Liverpool, to bring in the Improvement Bill of 1867 in its bearing upon this question?—The borough of Liverpool had had Improvement Bills in the years 1858, 1864, 1865, and 1866, whereby they had sought to borrow money to the extent of 1,300,000 l. In 1867 the improvement committee again came before the council, with a Bill to spend 1,200,000 l. more, both for creating parks, and also for general improvements. The rate payers, recollecting the mess that they had been brought into by the Water Bills, began to think that the charges upon them would be very onerous indeed.

2825. To what do you now particularly refer?—The rates for water were 16 d. in the pound to the consumer, and we used to charge a 3 d. rate on all property; for sanitary purposes the rate has been 1 s. 0¾ d. subsequently, and it has been as low as 10½ d.

2826. Was it customary for the 3 d. to be paid by the occupier?—Only by the occupier; but it applied to him whether he was a tenant using the water or not; for instance, a warehouse had to pay that 3 d. rate.

2827. And now that warehouse has to pay the 6 d. rate?—Yes, 6 d. is the rate at which the tenant pays half, and the landlord half.

2828. On whom was the 1 s. 7 d. laid?—Upon the shopkeepers and other parties using the water.

2829. How was that 1 s. 7 d. made up?—It was 1 s. 4 d. in the pound for the use of the water, and a 3 d. rate for sanitary purposes; that is to say, for watering the streets, putting out fires, and so on; so that each individual paid 1 s. 4 d.

as a consumer of water, and 3 d. as the occupier of the house.

2830. What is the case now?—At this present moment we pay 6¾ d. as tenant for water, and a 6 d. rate, of which 3 d. is deductable from the landlord.

2831. Then a part of the charge was taken off from the consumer of the water, and put upon the owner of the property?—That is so.

2832. The occupier remaining very much in the same position?—Yes, very much; and by means of the rate we were enabled to supply water at a much cheaper rate, because the Act of Parliament gives us direction to estimate our expenditure, and therefore we calculate it in this way; first, say, what your rate is to be, and how much it will yield you, say, 50,000 l. a year; secondly, say what you expect from shipping and miscellaneous charges, and put it down at 20,000 l.; that would be 70,000 l.; your requirments are 140,000 l., and therefore you must levy such a water rent as will yield you the other 70,000 l.; it may be 6 d., it may be 9 d., and it has been 4½ d.

2833. You assume then that the water will be consumed very much in proportion to the payment of rate?—That is a large question; I am not prepared to say that.

2834. I mean that the charge imposed would not be by consumption, but by a rate in the pound?—It is always by a rate, irrespective of consumption.

2835. And I presume, therefore, that the transfer of the rate to the owners of large property, was a very great relief to the occupiers of the poorer class of property?—No doubt at all about it.

2836. To go back to the improvement rate, I understood you to say that the occupiers remembering this heavy charge, and how they had been relieved of a portion of it by the transfer of a portion of the rate to the owner, that precedent came into their heads in 1867, when the question arose of spending 1,300,000 l.?—Yes; the part that I took in it was simply this; that when the council resolved to put notices in the paper to apply for the Act of 1867, I moved and carried that the principle of the rate should be a division between landlord and tenant. I did not say in what proportions, whether it should be in equal moieties or otherwise, and that was carried; but in January 1867, when the Bill itself was brought before the council to be discussed clause by clause, I happened unfortunately to be absent at the time, and I was not able to state to the council my experience of the 10 years previous; and the thing was thrown out by the council, but only by the casting vote of the mayor, some of the most prominent owners of property upon the council voting for the principle, and for this simple reason, that it is impossible to spend two or three millions of money in a circumscribed space like Liverpool without improving very considerably the land in every direction.

2837. Mr. Hunt.] Can you tell us what has been the argument used against that principle?—The argument used against it is in this way; that the owners residing at the east end of the town would be taxed for improvements being carried out at the north and south; but then that same argument applied to the tenant; the tenant is taxed now, wherever the improvements are.

2838. Chairman.] It was equally unfair, was it not, to the tenant in the north to tax him for improvements in the south as it was to tax the owner in the north?—Yes, quite so.

2839. Then the result of the whole was, that that clause was thrown out?—Yes; and the result has been this, that the Act itself has been virtually never carried out, except with regard to parks, from a dread of the taxation which would have followed it, and which compelled them to abandon more than two-thirds of the whole scheme.

2840. Will you state to the Committee whether, in your opinion, having given attention to this matter, if that rate had been imposed, it would have been paid eventually by the owners or by the occupiers?—I know very well the theory, and it is a fair question that if the landlord has to pay it, he puts it upon the rent; but it is not so: there is great competition in Liverpool for letting houses, and people cannot go and force rents down their tenants' throats beyond a certain amount.

2841. We have had a good deal of evidence before the Committee to a contrary effect, namely, that the landlords are always able to manage to put any increase of charge upon their tenants; do you dissent to that doctrine as far as Liverpool is concerned?—I entirely dissent from it, because there is considerable competition; I had to reduce latterly many of my rents, simply from the weight of taxation upon them, which falls upon the tenants; the tenants virtually do not pay the rates now, because I have had to reduce my rents.

2842. Of what kind of tenancies are you speaking?—Small warehouses and shops; the local taxation in Liverpool has been exceedingly heavy, as you will see, when I tell you that one shopkeeper in Liverpool is rated to the extent of 6,000 l. a year, and having to pay perhaps 1,000 l. a year local taxation it becomes a very large charge.

2843. Under what kind of tenancy would that be held?—I am afraid in the case that I refer to the person is his own landlord, so that it does not much matter; but, however, there are many other properties where the taxation is very onerous, and in my own experience I have had to reduce the rents of my tenants, because they could not afford to pay me those rents with the increased taxation which has latterly come upon the town.

2844. So that, as a matter of fact, a great proportion of the increase of taxation in Liverpool has come from the pockets of the owners?—That is my opinion; it has come from mine I know.

2845. Speaking generally, in Liverpool you have spent very large sums of money, have you not, upon the improvement of the town and public works?—Enormous sums; we have spent upwards of 600,000 l. in the creation of two parks.

2846. That duty is not imposed upon you by Parliament, but by your local public spirit?—I cannot excuse Parliament altogether, for I think the reports of Sanitary Commissioners, and so on, have always told us that parks were highly necessary for the health of the people, and that they have been very much pressed upon us by Parliament, who have never objected to our spending any amount of money in such ways.

2847. But a great portion of the taxation has been levied under local Acts of which you have been the promoters youselves, and not under any general Act of Parliament?—Yes, certainly.

2848. And a portion of that taxation, I presume, has fallen upon the occupier, but a very considerable considerable portion in your opinion has fallen upon the owner?—Indirectly, but in the case of the Improvement Bill and of the Parks Bill, I cannot conceive but what it must add most largely to the value of property held by the various land owners. I can understand a gentleman owning a belt of land round one of those parks which has been quadrupled in value by the erection of the park itself. Take Park-lane in London, or Prince's Gate, and all those houses which command a view of the park, see what rents they have, and what value they have. So with ourselves 50 years hence, those lands will become immensely valuable for gentlemen's residences.

2849. Then you do not assent to the argument that the taxation is borne necessarily by the person who pays it in the first instance?—No; and moreover, I think that the principle of taxation that we adopt does not touch the parties that really ought to pay it.

2850. Do you mean to say that the owners of property ought not to pay?—I do not say that; what I mean to say is this, that if I, like a certain gentleman that I happen to have in my mind's eye, could earn 100,000 l. a year in Liverpool, he may, by residing five miles out of the town, and living out of the borough, escape all local taxation whatever, except the taxation upon his counting house.

2851. I understood you to say you had paid the rates as owner?—But what I mean to say is this, the gentleman who really earned the money, the tenant, did not pay the rate.

2852. But who does pay it; it is, as I understand you to say, the owner of the property?—Virtually, eventually the owners pay it.

2853. It is not the poor shopkeeper, or the man who pays his 6 s. a week who pays it, but the owner of the property?—With regard to small property, none of the poor people pay rates at all; the landlords, as a rule, pay everything, and if they can get anything back in the way of rent they do, but it is a mere trifle.

2854. Could you state the circumstances of the sewer rate in Liverpool?—It is a very old rate. I never knew it anything but what it is, and it has always been leviable upon the landlord and the tenant. I do not know the Act under which it is levied, or anything about it; I only know that we always deduct it.

2855. And, as a matter of fact, the sewer rate is deducted in Liverpool?—Always.

2856. What is the amount of the sewer rate?—This year it is 2¼ d. in the pound upon Liverpool, but it varies in various places; for instance, large sewage works may be carried out in the out-townships, and the out-townships are kept distinct with regard to the rate. Perhaps if I lived at Kirkdale I might have to pay 4 d. this year; but the sewerage of Liverpool proper in which I reside being completed, of course the expense is merely for keeping it in repair, and now and then making a slight addition to it.

2857. Have you a definition of the owner in your Act?—Yes, we have a definition of the owner; that is to say, if we cannot trace the owner, the agent who collects the rent on the mortgagee who collects the rent is deemed the owner.

2858. Could you put your hand upon that clause?—I shall be happy to hand in a copy of the Act, because I believe it is rather peculiar, and there are none like it (delivering the same). "The word 'owner' shall mean the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of any lands and premises, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent."

2859. Then the ground rent is not reached by that principle?—We have no ground rents in Liverpool; we do not know the principle there.

2860. How is the bulk of the land held in Liverpool?—Two-thirds of the parish of Liverpool belongs to the corporation in fee, and their principle is to let it or sell it out on fines for 75 years' lease, which lease is renewable whenever the party chooses; the principle being to charge about a year's rent every 25 years; so that if I have a house of 100 l. a year that I have paid the corporation 1,600 l. for, which would be about the price; at the end of 25 years, I go and pay my 100 l., and they give me a fresh lease of 75 years for that property. We have the property surveyed and the property may be very greatly increased in value, but we take it by the rental at the time, and not at the time that the lease was originally granted.

2861. When you want land for town improvements you have got it, I presume, easily to your hand?—No; we have to buy it from the tenant just as if it was freehold, with a fine; we have to pay the coporation of Liverpool for it, because the corporation, being trustees for the corporate estate, cannot part with it to the improvement committee without the improvement committee compels them to sell it, and thus re-invest the amount in land.

2862. Are they two separate bodies, the improvement committee and the council?—The one is a committee of the other, but their accounts are kept quite distinct and separate.

2863. As to paving and lighting rates, are they charged upon the occupier in Liverpool?—Entirely.

2864. Has the question ever been raised of putting them on the owner?—I never knew it raised as to either of those rates. It is a singular thing that a gentleman has given notice in the council for to-morrow for a committee to consider the whole question of the incidence of taxation in Liverpool.

2865. In Liverpool you have spent a considerable sum of money, have you not, in pulling down streets and alleys?—Yes.

2866. How have you raised the funds for that purpose?—There were two objects, one was for the improvement of the sanitary condition of the town; and we obtained an Act, some few years ago, authorising us to spend 200,000 l., I think it was, in pulling down an occasional house, which would permit the air to go through a large mass of back property, and in a variety of ways; that is levied by a sanitary rate, and that money is redeemable by a sinking fund in 21 years.

2867. And that is paid by whom?—By the rates; it is part and parcel of the general rate.

2868. Have you got a so-called borough rate, in Liverpool?—No, I am happy to say we have not. The corporation of Liverpool is a very wealthy body, and has a property which yields them about 130,000 l. a-year; and that enables us to pay all the little entertainments that we give, receptions of royalty, expenses of the mayoralty, and a variety of other things.

2869. What audit is there of these somewhat large revenues?—We have a regularly paid auditor, auditor, who receives 500 l. a year, who audits the accounts of every committee; and we have, in addition to that, two ratepayers, elected annually on the 1st of March, as auditors; and in addition to those three, the mayor appoints an alderman as his auditor; so that the accounts are virtually audited twice over, the one an audit by a paid officer, to see to the accuracy of the figures, and the other by the burgesses, to see to the general application of the funds.

2870. Does the committee of the town council act as the local board of health?—We have a health committee; we do not use the ordinary Health Act; we have a local Health Act of our own, which is carried out by the health committee, which is part and parcel of the town council.

2871. Do you keep your accounts entirely separate?—Yes, we keep our accounts entirely separate, both the water and the health, watching, and everything else; and indeed all the accounts are kept entirely separate.

2872. Does the town council levy light dues?—No.

2873. Did they ever do so?—They did at one time, when they were trustees for the Liverpool Docks; but, as you are aware, those were transferred to the dock trust, and now it is entirely a separate body; and when it was tranferred the town dues, which used to belong to our corporation, now belong to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

2874. Did you receive a very large sum for it?—Yes, very; we used to receive 130,000 l. a year, and the dock board now receive 150,000 l., which was our loss; if you mean, did we receive any money for parting with it, we did; we received about one million and a half; in fact, three millions; because in this way, that in addition to the million and a half they had to pay the debt that was due by the corporation of Liverpool at that time; and we were released from certain obligations to complete the Birkenhead Docks, which would have fully made up the other million and a half.

2875. Have you taken any part as an ex officio guardian?—No, I have never had anything to do with the parish matters.

2876. Have you no ex officio guardians?—I do not know; I know nothing whatever upon parish matters; I pay my rates, and that is all.

2877. Could you tell us the amount of the general rate that is levied by the local board of health?—The general rate this year is 5 d. in the pound, and that general rate is levied for these purposes: to pay the salaries of the local surveyor and staff, the road surveyor, the treasurer, the clerk, the collector, the medical officer of health, the inspector of nuisances, the superintendent of scavengers, cleansing ashpits, incidental costs, and the payment of charges and expenses attending the execution of the Act, and the interest upon the outlay upon that very question about which you asked me before, namely, the improvement of courts and alleys, under the Act of 1864.

2978. What does 5 d. in the pound give?—I could not give that. As a rule, 1 d. yields 8,000 l. a year; and supposing it were levied upon the same area, it would be 40,000 l. a year.

2880. Are there any other rates that you levy, besides the general rate, the water rate, and the sewers rate?—Yes; there is the paving, the sewers, the water, the general rate, the lighting, fire, and police; then the various improvement rates, and public parks rate; and, in addition to that, we have not only the poor rate, but the library and museum rate, the parochial rate, which I do not exactly know what it means, and the voluntary rate, which is something connected with the church, I believe.

2881. Is the payment to the police made from the corporate fund equivalent to that which is generally paid by the Government?—No, it is the balance, after deducting what we receive from the Government for each police officer, which I think is 25 per cent. of its cost.

2882. Do you happen to have before you a statement, showing the number of pence in the pound for each of those rates which you have specified?—Yes. The paving rate for this present year is 5¼ d.; the sewage rate is 2¼ d.; the water rate, 6 d.; the general rate, of which I read the particulars just now, 5 d.; the lighting, fire, and police, 2¾ d. Then there is the improvement rate, under the Act of 1858, of ½ d.; under the Act of 1861, of 1 d.; under the Act of 1864, of 3½ d.; under the Act of 1865, of 1 d.; under the Act of 1867, of 1¼ d.; and for public parks under the Act of 1865, 3¼ d. Then, in addition to that, but which can scarcely be called a rate, is the water rent; that is a commodity which we buy, and we do not call it a rate. The total rates amount to 2 s. 7¼ d., exclusive of the charge for the supply of water.

2883. Are all those rates administered by the town council, or by a committee of the town council, which is the local board of health?—No; those connected with the water are administered by the water committee; those connected with the paving, sewer and general, are administered by the health committee; the improvement of the parks rates are levied by the improvement committee; the library rate is, I believe, raised under the parish and not by the corporation, and the library rate, in addition to what I told you before, is 1 d. in the pound, being limited to that by Act of Parliament.

2884. Are all those rates levied over the same area?—They are not; the parish has a different area from the borough.

2885. But with that exception, does the borough levy its rates over the whole area?—Yes; but not in the same proportions. For instance, Toxteth Park, Kirkdale, Everton, and Liverpool, may and do all pay on different proportions; those places are part and parcel of the Parliamentary borough, but are what we call out-townships.

2886. And they do not pay in the same proportion?—No; for instance, the paving rate in an out-township is very frequently a very heavy charge indeed from the making of new roads, whereas the roads have been long since made in Liverpool, and there the paving rate is comparatively small.

2887. Then you do follow to a certain extent the policy of charging rates upon those districts that are benefited by the rates?—That is so.

2888. Has that ever led to much conflict in the town council?—The out-townships have often wished that the whole should be amalgamated in one rate, but the owners and occupiers of property in Liverpool object to pay for the expenses of the out-townships improvements.

Mr. H. C. Beloe. 5 April 1870.

2889. Are there no rates that are more for the benefit for the town itself, than for the out-townships?—I think not.

2890. Have you no part of your borough, not even in the extreme limits, where the land is free and not built upon, where there are market gardens, and so forth?—Liverpool has now so extended itself that the market gardens are all gone, but we have large open spaces in the neighbourhood of Liverpool yet; for instance, Lord Sefton has in the heart of Liverpool about 100 acres which is not built upon.

2891. Is there no portion of the borough of Liverpool where the general rate levied by you as a local board of health is levied in the proportion of only one-fourth on certain portions of property?—Yes; there are exemptions to taxation. There are canals, railroals, the water space of the docks, and a variety of others. I do not think I have the General Act with me, but it limits the rate to 25 per cent., therefore, whether the rateable value is 100 l. a year or 1,000 l. a year, the rate is only levied at 25 per cent. of that value.

2892. Does that apply to the general rate or to all rates?—To all rates. I do not know any exception to it.

2893. You do not levy a highway rate as such, do you?—I think we call it a paving rate; we have no highway rate specially.

2894. Will you state to the Committee how you collect those rates; whether they are collected at the same time, and whether they are all specified in the demand note?—I should observe that we have nothing to do with the parish; the parish is a separate thing, but all the municipal rates are collected at one and the same time, and every article is specified, and if there is any explanation wanted it is printed at the back.

2895. How many times a year do you levy a rate?—They are generally due on demand. The collector, in cases where there is some difficulty, will take a portion and call again, but there is no legalised instalment principle by which a man can offer you a quarer's rates, and say you may come again next quarter for the rest. In the water rent nominally that is so, but it is never carried out.

2896. Then yours is a yearly rate?—Yes; we levy the rates in February for the year 1870, for instance.

2897. And the whole amount is due at once?—Yes.

2898. Are your collectors the same as the collectors for the vestry?—No; I wish they were; but there would be this objection to that, that they have not to collect the same area.

2899. Have you parishes which are situated partly in and partly out of the borough?—Yes; Everton is a parish, and I presume they collect their rates separately.

2900. Are there parishes partly in and partly out of the borough, with boundaries overlapping?—Liverpool itself is only one parish; the whole of Liverpool is in the parish of Liverpool proper; but when you come to an out-township, such as Toxteth Park, that may be another parish; it is within the Parliamentary borough, it is quite true.

2901. Have you a county lunatic asylum?—Not in Liverpool proper, except one small one connected with the workhouse or the infirmary, I think.

2902. Do you contribute to the county lunatic asylum?—We do very largely indeed.

2903. Do you happen to be able to state to the Committee the arrangements with regard to the lunatic asylum?—The arrangement, as far as I can gather, seems to be this, that for all expenditure upon lunatic asylums, and so on, the treasurer of the county is enabled to issue what he calls his precept upon our borough treasurer, and then the quarter sessions, such as Manchester, Wigan, Liverpool, and I do not know whether Bolton is or not, I think Bolton is, and the whole county being assessed to a particular amount, and the proportions of those various towns known, he just orders them to pay so much a year to him without our having, as I may say, any control whatever over the expenditure. Last year our contribution to that fund was 11,000 l.; but an Act in 1856, I think it was, was passed whereby such boroughs as Liverpool, Manchester, Wigan, and Bolton, having a quarter sessions of their own, were allowed to send two justices of the peace from those places to form part and parcel in the committee of justices that meet for carrying out the erection of lunatic asylums; I do not think that any boroughs ever did exercise that power except Liverpool. Last year, when we were called upon to spend 120,000 l. for a new lunatic asylum near Preston, Liverpool did appoint myself and another gentleman to represent their interest.

2904. Do you pay for the building of the lunatic asylum?—Yes, our proportion; it is levied by a rate on the county; Liverpool proper pays one-third of the whole of the county rates.

9905. Do you know how much the county rate amounts to?—No, I do not; I know that the erection of this lunatic asylum will cost Liverpool 40,000 l.; that only applies to the expenses of the lunatic asylum; I do not think that we pay any portion of the other part of the county expenditure.

2906. Mr. Acland.] When you speak of the county, do you mean the whole of Lancashire?—Yes, the whole of Lancashire.

2907. Do you pay one-third of all the county rate?—No; that is our proportion of the expense of the lunatic asylum.

2908. Chairman.] The county rate no doubt is levied with the poor rate?—We charge it to our borough fund.

2909. Then it is not paid out of the poor rate with you?—No, not at all; it is leviable upon the treasurer of the borough fund, and if we had not other means we should have to levy a borough rate to meet that charge.

2910. Then lunatics from the borough probably go to the lunatic asylum exactly on the same terms as county lunatics?—I believe so.

2911. But with that you have nothing to do?—Only as a magistrate, that is all.

2912. I mean that those matters are settled between the vestry and the asylum?—No; the county magistrates settle them themselves, and they issue a precept upon our treasurer to pay our proportion, although we are not consulted at all.

2913. That is as regards the expenditure, but as regards the inmates who go there the charge made per head for each pauper lunatic is charged to the vestry, is it not?—It either goes on the one hand to the vestry, or on the other to the justices. If a prisoner in the goal becomes a lunatic, the justices commit him to the lunatic asylum.

2914. You have in fact only to deal with that portion of the expenditure which is not recoverable from the parish for the support of pauper lunatics?—Quite so.

2915. Mr. Acland.] I think you said with reference to the water rate, that it took some little time for the ratepayers to adapt themselves to the system in the Act, how long was that?—No; it took some little discussion as to the propriety of having such a rate, but not as to the adoption of it. It was a very simple affair, because they found immediately their rents so reduced that they were glad enough to pay the rate.

2916. I understood you to say that at first there were certain covenants reserved in the Act, and that after a certain number of years it worked itself out, and I want to know how long that was?—What I mean is this, that at the time the Act was passed, agreements existed between landlord and tenant to pay all the municipal rates, but so far as my knowledge can guide me, I do not know that now those agreements are made to include this water rate. I do not think that such agreements are made in common, I never made one.

2917. How many years did it take to bring that about?—It may exist yet for all I know, because, supposing I had a lease of 21 years, with such a clause in it 10 years ago, it would be 11 years to last.

2918. Still the general practice is to act upon the intention of the Act?—I think so.

2919. How long ago was that Act passed?—It was passed in 1862.

2920. I understand you to say that in Lancashire, and with reference to Liverpool, there is some approach to the representative system by the different boroughs sending up magistrates to the county board?—To the committee for the construction of lunatic asylum is under the Act of 1856, to amend the Act of 1853, the Lunatic Act, and it is only one clause.

2921. Then that committee is appointed, is it not, by the justices of quarter sessions?—The justices of quarter sessions appoint the committee, and the boroughs can add, by the appointment of the recorder, two members from each of those boroughs to attend that committee.

2922. Is that by a special Act of Parliament?—Yes.

2923. Do you find that it works well?—It never has been acted upon until, as regards myself, a few months ago, we then felt that it was very hard that Liverpool should be called upon to pay such a large sum of money for the erection of this lunatic asylum, and that Liverpool should have virtually no voice in the matter.

2924. What proportion do the borough justices bear to the county justices?—It so happened that the other boroughs forgot, or neglected to make the appointment, and there were only two named from Liverpool, who would be as against 12 county magistrates.

2925. Do you think it desirable, as a general matter of public policy in England, that the rates should, as far as possible, be divided between landlord and tenant?—I think this, that it is almost impossible to spend a large sum of money upon the improvement of a town, upon paving and lighting that town, and bringing a large supply of water to that town, without doing the landlord an inconceivable amount of good; his property becomes insurable at a very much lower risk. I have known insurance rates in Liverpool 30*s.* per cent., and they are now 6*s.* per cent.; and if land, which yielded him 30*l.* a-year will now sell at several hundred pounds an acre, the property must necessarily become so enhanced in value, consequent upon the facilities which you bring for people to come and reside there, and therefore making agricultural into building land.

2926. If I understand you, your view would be that, as a matter of justice, it is right that the landlord who is so benefited should feel the rates?—I think so.

2927. But my question was not an abstract question of justice, but had reference to policy; do you think that, with reference to the intelligence and far-sighted management of our system of local rates, it would be politic and desirable that the owners should feel the pressure of the rates?—I think they do; I am one myself, and I feel the benefit of almost every shilling that is spent, and I escape to a great extent.

2928. I presume you think that, if the rates are so divided, the owners should have some direct representation in return for the rates which they pay?—I think they all have got that except those that happen to live a great way from us.

2929. As I understand you, it is in your case indirect, because the ratepayers happen to elect them?—Yes.

2930. But my question is, supposing that Parliament should pass a law that county rates and poor rates and highway rates (I am speaking now rather of country matters than of town matters) should be divided equally between landlord and tenant; do you think it desirable in that case that the owners should be directly represented on the board of management, and not merely indirectly, as they now are, by the election of the ratepayers?—It may be desirable, but I see that there is a difficulty about it. I will assume a gentleman to have a large property in Liverpool, but residing in London, it is no use in electing him on the town council, because he could not attend.

2931. It has been proposed to this Committee by a very intelligent witness, that all those rates of which I have spoken should be equally divided; and he said that he thought that, as a matter of course, the freeholders should have the power of electing half the members of the board; but it does not follow that they would elect non-resident members; they might elect persons on the spot, might they not?—Certainly; I think the proper principle is that taxation should always go pari passu with the representation.

2932. Then you think that such a plan would work well?—I think so.

2933. Supposing that that same principle were applied to a good many of those local rates in towns, would you apply the same principle to a town?—I am not competent to give an opinion about the country so much; but I really think, taking it as a broad question, that if all the rates in Liverpool were leviable between landlord and tenant, it would be more equitable than it is now, and do no serious harm to anybody.

2934. Then you think that some plan might be devised by which the board should consist one half of owners and one half of occupiers?—Yes.

Mr. H. C. Beloe. 5 April 1870.

2935. To go one step further, and bring country and town together, do you see any primâ facie objection to county boards or provincial boards being formed in which both town and country districts should be jointly represented on reasonable terms?—The principle is accorded by the Act which I have named, the Lunacy Act of 1856; there is a mixture there; and it was evidently felt to be a requirement, otherwise an Act containing one clause would not have been passed. It is an Act of only one clause, to enable ratepaying boroughs to have representation at the county board.

2936. Looking at the course of future legislation on sanitary matters, is it not probable that a great many questions will arise in which both country districts and towns will be very much interested, such as the purification of rivers, the lowering of the water level of large areas of damp districts round towns; are there not points of contract between town and country? — The question arises with respect to the utilisation of sewage; that is one case; but I do not think that towns would like to have to pay the expense of making sewers, and so on, to a farm-house.

2937. That would be a matter of adjustment; my question is whether there are not points of contact in which it is very difficult to separate absolutely the interests of town and country?—So much would depend upon the distance. If you take the village of Wavertree or the village of Everton, then I can quite understand that Liverpool, by enlarging its area, might have done great good; and we asked Parliament to allow us so to enlarge it, but we were refused. Those places are full of dwelling-houses, and we thought that an enlarged district would tend very much to the amelioration of the whole matter; but still that enlargement was of a very limited kind, it was merely extending the radius of Liverpool about a mile and a-half all round.

2938. Mr. Walter.] I think you made some observation which you did not quite carry out fully in your answer, to the effect that you thought that local taxation did not fall upon the right shoulders; with reference to the circumstance that many of the wealthy inhabitants of Liverpool do not reside in the borough, but live at a distance from it, and thereby escape local taxation, would you be good enough to explain more fully your views upon that subject?—What I mean is this: that Liverpool, from its position and its wealth, and the largeness of its inhabitants, forms a great focus for business purposes, and a gentleman comes and hires an office in Liverpool, and pays 100 l. a year for that office, and he may make his 50,000 l. a year in it; but he goes and lives in Cheshire, just across the water, and he pays nothing to the rates of Liverpool beyond the rates that are levied upon his office.

2939. How does he make his 50,000 l. a year?—By purchasing goods in Manchester and shipping them off to India or elsewhere, or by commission businesses in 50 ways.

2940. That is not a mode of making money, is it, which throws upon him any special responsibility for the maintenance, we will say of parks, in Liverpool?—No, it does not; but of course Liverpool has numerous inhabitants that do assist him in making this money. You could not go into an isolated place and open an office, although you could write to Manchester for your goods and send them to Liverpool.

2941. Would not the same argument apply to a wealthy member of the Stock Exchange who resided perhaps in Hertfordshire?—The reason I advance that argument is this: that the true principle of taxation is an income tax or a property tax, and therefore you would rather levy upon the profits of a man than upon the mere rent that he pays.

2942. That would involve the principle of rating personal property, would it not, for local taxation?—Yes, I think so, and we have done it in Liverpool; we have levied a property tax for this water rate of which I have spoken.

2943. Mr. Corrance.] You say that the landlords do not exact from the tenant this amount of rate which they pay, but do they not increase their rents according to the amount of competition, and the amount of rent that they can obtain?—The rental of property is very fluctuating. At times they have to reduce the rents, and at times they see their chance of advancing them; but taking my own experience and that of a good many other landlords, I never put on an extra rent, simply because Parliament has chosen to put on an extra penny on the Income Tax or the Property Tax.

2944. Perhaps you have hardly taken that into consideration in imposing the rent?—I never think of such a thing. I invariably have the agreements drawn out in the usual way, that the tenant shall charge me a portion of the sewage rate and the water rate.

2945. I presume that you do not charge below the average market rate of rents in your district?—I never wish to charge below, but there is sufficient competition to keep rents down.

2946. Like every other property, a landlord's profits rise and fall from various causes?—Yes.

2947. As you say the increased taxation has fallen very heavily upon the tradesmen of Liverpool?—Very heavily.

2948. And also upon all other householders?—Yes; more especially upon the poor lodging-house keepers, and clerks in offices, and surgeons and professional men, who have not large means; they feel the increased taxation greatly.

2949. And even below that I suppose it would fall upon the labouring class?—When you go below an office clerk, the bulk of the rate is paid by the landlord, and it is worth the while of the landlord to pay the rates.

2950. Under composition you mean?—Yes.

2951. But that composition being still upon half the rent, of course is proportionate to the weight of taxation?—The composition under the sanitary rate amounts to 50 per cent.; and under the water rate to 25 per cent. As a rule, looking at the management of property, a landlord, I think, is prudent who owns this small property if he takes care that no rate collector shall ever go near them, because if he does, and a man is in arrear of rates, he just packs up his things and goes away, and there is no rent received and no rate either.

2952. You have a large immigration from Ireland to Liverpool, have you not?—I do not know that it is has been so very great of late years as it used to be.

2953. Under the present law of removal some of them gain a settlement, do they not?—I am quite ignorant on parish matters.

2954. I suppose that all the rates are increased in proportion to the poor's rate in Liverpool; have you found a gradual increase of your rates?—

The

The poor rate fluctuates very materially. The great incubus that we are suffering from now is those various improvement rates which we have, perhaps, hastily gone in for, by improving the town and building works, and creating parks, for which during the next 30 years we shall have to pay.

2955. Mr. Smith.] You have stated that you have been obliged to lower your rents in consequence of the increase of local taxation; would you expect to increase your rents if those burthens became reduced?—Inasmuch as those burthens must last for 30 years, I confess that I have not thought about it.

2956. You mentioned that Lord Sefton had a large tract of land which is not built upon in the centre of Liverpool, upon what system is that land rated?—It is not rated at all, I believe. That very land formed the subject of a very important law suit with the Government upon the subject of the succession duty; Lord Sefton contended that inasmuch as he got no rent from that land, he ought to escape succession duty; and he did so, although it is worth some hundreds of thousands of pounds.

2957. Is it devoted to any purpose?—No; there are a few cows grazing upon it, and I should think that 5 l. a year would be the extreme that he would get for it; certainly not 20 l. It is going to be built upon immediately, so that it will be rated.

2958. Can you tell me what proportion the rateable value bears to the actual net rent received by the owner in Liverpool?—The rating in Liverpool, as a rule, is 10 per cent. below the actual value; a man renting a house at 100 l. a year is rated at 90 l.

2960. To what limit does the composition extend?—The composition extends, if I recollect rightly, to what is called 13 l., but in reality that 13 l. covers 16 l. rent; because the Court of Queen's Bench held that in reckoning 16 l. you were to deduct all the rates that were leviable; therefore, supposing the rate upon a house was 16 l., that 3 l. brought it down to the 13 l., which enabled it to go into composition.

2961. You stated that you paid rates upon that class of property, but you also stated that you escaped rating; did you allude in that case to your more valuable property?—Yes.

2962. There has been a great change in the value of property in Liverpool, has there not, in addition to the fluctuations of trade?—Yes, there has been a great fall at Everton, and a great rise in the centre of Liverpool.

2963. And also at Toxteth?—I do not know that there is much rise in value there.

2964. The Right honourable Chairman asked you whether the municipality of Liverpool was co-extensive with the parishes; is not the parish of Walton a part of the municipality of Liverpool?—The municipality is more extensive than the parishes, and some small portion of Walton may be included, but I think not.

2965-6. Was not Walton the original parish of Liverpool?—It was the original parish; I believe that Liverpool was an offshoot of Walton, but that has been all settled by Act of Parliament.

2967. As regards the water supply; what was the water supply before the Act to which you have referred?—Previous to the Act of 1847 we had nothing but wells under the town.

2968. Then there was no rate, I presume?—No; the supply was in the hands of companies, and then the corporation bought up those water companies, and Parliament compelled them to go for a very extensive reservoir scheme, which reservoirs are situated 30 miles from Liverpool, and which cost them a very large sum of money. They took those reservoirs at Rivington Pike on the one hand, and the pumps on the other; and they bought up the Chorley Waterworks. We are now fairly supplied with water.

2969. Mr. Gregory.] Is not this the effect of the system of local taxation, as it stands at present, that upon trades and professions in which the profits are small it falls very heavily?—Yes, I think so, because a trade, or a profession, has to be very frequently carried on in expensive premises, whereas the profits are comparatively small.

2970. Then, on the other hand, businesses of large profit may be carried on in premises of but a limited extent, a mere flat, and may escape local taxation altogether?—Yes; or comparatively so.

2971. Chairman.] Do they escape taxation if the owners pay?—No, there is no taxation leviable upon them, but the mere rate upon the office; and that brings this to my recollection, if you will turn to clause 48 of the Act of 1862 you will find the very case which you have put to me. There was a very great outcry, and naturally so, that a shopkeeper in Church-street, we will say, paid the whole of the rates, his shop being a very valuable place, it was very heavily rated for the poor, and we followed that rate and charged him equally heavy for water. Perhaps he had a large shop, and lived in only a couple of rooms, or perhaps he only occupies them for his servants. But after great debate it was agreed, and we got that Act to authorise, that what is so called compound premises, that is to say, a shop where the party resides, should only be charged two-thirds of the rate. So again, with regard to my own office; it was very hard for a man, who only wants to wash his hands once a day in his office, to have to pay the whole of the rate upon 100 l. a year, perhaps; and therefore a lock-up shop, where there is no residence in the house, and which is only used as an office, only pays one-third. The consequence is, that whereas my house would pay 6 d., my shop, which I have there, would only pay 4 d., and my office would only pay 2 d. It is a peculiar principle, and I do not think that any other town but Liverpool has it.

2972. Have you a ratepayers' association, at Liverpool?—We generally have such a thing, once every two or three years, when the rates get heavy.

2973. I see that the preamble of your Act of 1862 recites, "Whereas large sums of money have, under the authority of the Waterworks Act, been expended by the corporation for the purpose of affording a supply of water within the said borough, whereby the value of all property within the borough has been materially increased, and such property improved and benefited, and it is expedient that the corporation should be empowered to levy a rate within the said borough in respect of such expenditure;"

5 April 1870.

that, in fact, is the principle of your Act?—Yes.

2974. Having to levy a large sum of money, you considered that the property acquired an increase of value from that expenditure, and might therefore be fairly called upon to recoup the town a certain portion of that expenditure?—Yes.

2975. Therefore that principle only applies where property has been benefited by a large outlay, and would not apply to such expenditure as the poor rate?—No; I do not think it would; we carried it still further in that Act, because we contended that, whereas the corporation of Liverpool themselves were the parties most benefited by this water supply, we were entitled by that Act to charge the borough fund 2,000*l.* a year in aid of our water rent.

2976. Colonel Brise.] You have mentioned that the sanitary rates were 2*s.* 7¼*d.* in the pound when you were giving us the particulars of the different rate under the administration of the municipal council; have the municipal council much control over those rates in so far as they can be either economically or extravagantly administered?—The committee levying those rates is a committee named by the town council, and every member of the town council is amenable to his constituents: and therefore if the health committee are extravagant they are called over the coals by their constituents like other people. That is the only control that I know of. The council itself exercises some control; but it is moral opinion that has the greatest control.

2977. The council, I think you say, are elected from the owners?—From the ratepayers.

2978. But are they the principal ratepayers?—It is the ratepaying that gives that power to vote for the council, but they are mostly gentlemen of some position, and therefore they are sure to be owners.

2979. You complained of the expenditure of the improvement rates, do you think that if there were representation of the occupiers on the municipal council, there would be an equally large expenditure upon those improvement rates?—I think that if they carried out the principle which I sought to introduce into the Bill of 1867, namely, that half the rate should be levied from the owner and half on the occupier, it would have checked the propensity for extreme improvements.

2980. Has not the house property improved a great deal in value owing to this improvement of Liverpool by the improvement rates?—Yes; some of it has in certain localities, but the shopkeepers have benefited very little.

2981. Then the owners have had the benefit of the improvements?—Yes, the owners certainly have; but I think the occupiers have rather suffered by the turning away of the trade from well-known localities during the progress of those improvements. I think the shopkeeping interest has rather suffered than otherwise.

2982. Mr. Pell.] Have you a sanitary rate in Liverpool?—Not properly so-called; what you call the sanitary rate would include paving, sewer, water, light, police, and the improvement rate under several Acts of Parliament.

2983. Those all form a class of rate that has reference to health; but, in addition to that, have you not a literary rate;—Yes; there is a 1*d.* rate for the library and museum which is levied by the parish.

2984. Have you another class which we will call repression of crime and pauperism, which would be your poor rate?—Yes.

2985. The highway rate is included in the general rate, is it not?—Yes.

2986. You appear to have another form of rate which is a voluntary rate, to what does that refer?—That, I apprehend, is something connected with repairing the church.

2987. In addition to that you have an endowment, have you not?—Yes; that is to say, our corporate fund.

2988. Who administers the corporate fund?—The town council, under the finance committee; or rather the finance committee under the council.

2989. Who administers the sanitary rate?—The health committee of the town council.

2990. That is another committee of the town council?—Yes.

2991. Who administers the literary rate?—There is a library and museum committee, also of the town council.

2992. The poor rate and pauperism would come under the vestry, I presume?—Yes.

2993. Where would the voluntary rate come?—The voluntary rate the parish make also.

2994. With regard to assessment, is the assessment the same for the sanitary rate as for the poor rate?—Yes; we always follow the poor-rate assessment by Act of Parliament, and whatever it says we have to abide by.

2995. Then the assessment, with regard to the sanitary rate, is not the same over the whole area; is not it modified by whether it is inside the borough or outside the borough?—The assessment will always follow the poor rate where the house is situated.

2996. But the proportion of the rate varies?—Yes, it is a proportional rate.

2997. With regard to the application of what I call the endowment, how is that distributed in relief of those other objects; does any of it go, for instance, towards the maintenance of the poor?—None whatever; the borough fund is not in any way applied to relieve taxation, except to the extent of 2,000*l.* a year, which it pays towards the water rate, and which was specially provided in this Act of Parliament.

2998. What does it do with the rest of its funds?—It pays the general law and Parliamentary expenses, salaries, and stipends, and various expenses connected with the corporation, which left last year a surplus of 27,000*l.* We received 148,000*l.*, and spent 121,000*l.*, which leaves 27,000*l.* surplus.

2999. Out of that, only 2,000*l.* would go in aid of the rates?—That is all. We pay the county expenses, and we pay the gaol expenses; we pay a great many sums out of the fund which otherwise we should have to levy rates for, if we had not this fund to go upon; we pay all the expenses of gaols and prosecutions, municipal elections, and Parliamentary elections, and all such matters.

3000. Do you contribute to the library?—No, not at all to the library, except in this way, that if the library committee should happen to spend more money than the rate yields them, it is always charged to the borough fund, and, therefore, we do contribute in that way; sometimes it is 1,500*l.* a year, and sometimes it is 1,000*l.*

3001. How is that literary rate raised; is it upon the poor-rate assessment?—The literary rate rate is raised upon the parish assessment like all other rates.

3002. With a separate receipt?—It is collected by the parish in the same bill with the poor rate, which specified what it is for.

3003. How is the sanitary rate collected?—By a body of collectors belonging to the corporation, who collect both the sanitary and the water rates in one bill.

3004. With a separate receipt?—Yes, with a separate receipt and everything separate.

3005. With regard to the sewerage of Liverpool, you said that the sewerage rate varies very much, but there was a separate rate levied outside the old town on the score of new improvements being done there?—Yes, the sewerage rate differs according to the work done in particular localities. The sewerage rate is levied something like we should like to see the improvement rate levied, namely, upon the particular district which is improved by it, and therefore, one district may be heavy and another light.

3006. Do any of them use the old sewers of Liverpool?—Yes, they come into our outfall.

3007. Does the old town make any charge upon the new districts?—No, I think not.

3008. Mr. Seely.] When this land of Lord Sefton's which you spoke of, comes into the market for building purposes, the rates to which it will be liable will form an essential element of its value, of course?—No doubt.

3009. Practically, in that case, the land will bear the whole of the burthen of the rates, will it not?—I do not know that that question is gone into to such an extent as that; it might be so inferred. A very close calculator might say, I will only give you 5*s.* a yard for your land, whereas I would give you 6*s.* 8*d.* if there were no rates to pay out of it; but I do not know that, practically, many people go so minutely into those things as that. Lord Sefton, I understand, is going to sell that land upon the principle of ground rents; of course it amounts to the same thing in the long run.

3010. As a practical man, do you not think that in a case of that sort the whole of the rates eventually are paid by the land which is going to be built upon?—It might be argued so; it might be a very good theory, but I do not think in practice it is so.

3011. But in practice it would be so, would it not; a man who is going to build houses would take into account what he would have to pay, and he would give exactly so much more if the rates were less, and so much less if the rates were more?—If he was about to give 40*l.* as it is, he would give 45*l.* if there were no rates, and therefore he would give more for the land; that is a fair enough logical inference.

3012. Mr. Hunt.] You have told us that in 1866 you proposed in a Bill which was brought forward for levying an improvement rate, there should be a provision that half the rate should be levied upon the landlord and half upon the tenant, but that that clause was struck out afterwards by the town council, by the casting vote of the mayor; have you got a copy of that Improvement Bill here?—No; it would be the draft of the Bill only.

3013. Were the words "landlord and tenant" used in that clause, or the word "owner"?—I rather think the word "owner" would be used; it would follow, no doubt, the verbiage of the clause in the Act of 1862, from whence I borrowed it.

3014. The clause, in fact, was in accordance with your views upon the subject?—Yes.

3015. In that clause, or according to your view, whom do you mean by the owner?—I mean the landlord; the owner in fee of the property.

3016. In the case of there being a ground landlord, a person having an intermediate interest, and an occupier, who, in that case, would pay the half?—Lord Derby has a great property close to us, and he has let his land upon ground rents; supposing I occupied a house there of 100*l.* a-year, of which 10*l.* a-year was payable to Lord Derby, and 90*l.* a-year to my landlord; it is just the same whether it is paid in two payments or one. I should consider that Lord Derby would have to pay upon the 10*l.*, and the other landlord would have to pay upon the 90*l.*

3017. Then the half which you as the tenant had not paid, would be thrown rateably upon the ground landlord and the intermediate landlord?—No doubt; it would be perhaps more an arrangement between the ground landlord and the intermediate landlord themselves; but I should look to the tenant for my rate, leaving him to get his half as best he could, either from the ground landlord or from the owner.

3018. Supposing there is a loan for improvements, you say that the property would be improved by the works that would be executed under that rate?—I think as a general rule you cannot spend two or three millions of money in a small locality without improving the rest of the property.

3019. Would the intermediate landlord, during your tenancy, get anything from the improvement?—Yes; because supposing the improvement to be considerable, that which was a dwelling-house at 100*l.* a year might be turned into a shop worth 300*l.*

3020. What you say is this, that the intermediate landlord would be able to raise the rent in consequence?—I think so; the ground landlord would not, because his is a different case.

3021. The intermediate landlord would be able to raise his rent upon the tenant, and therefore he would get the benefit?—Yes.

3022. With regard to the ground landlord, would the ground landlord be able to get any benefit until the time had expired?—No; but I think you must look at it in this way, that the very fact of those improvements being contemplated would enable the ground landlord to get a much higher rent in the first instance than he otherwise would have done if this money had not been spent. For instance, we have acres and acres of Lord Derby's land at this moment on sale.

3023. That would not be so, would it, if the improvement was to be executed at the expense of the occupier, and not at the expense of the owner, in which case the ground landlord would not get any prospective benefit?—If he has not already executed his lease, he would be able to obtain better terms.

3024. If the ground landlord got a better rent in consequence of the expected improvements, that would be by reason of a part of the rate for the improvement falling upon himself, would it not?—Possibly so; but we have very little to do with people in that position in Liverpool; nearly all all our property is either held as leasehold, which is equivalent to a freehold, in the opinion of Liverpool, or is absolutely freehold; we do not understand ground-rents, as they do in Manchester.

3025. According to your view, the person who had the power of raising the rent upon the tenant would be able to get something out of the improvement?—Yes.

3026. But the person who had not that power would have no option of raising the rent upon the tenant; he would get nothing from the improvement till the term for which he had demised his property had expired?—No. I think, practically, in fairness, it would be the intermediate tenant that ought to pay the rates, without respect to the ground landlord at all; because, as you say, the latter can get no advantage for the 75 years that he has leased his property.

3027. Then it would come to this, would it not, that the only person who had the power of immediately raising the rent ought, in your view, to be subject to the rate?—I think that would be a fair way of putting it, considering the whole subject.

3028. That being so, do you think that it would make any difference to the tenant whether he paid the rate or whether his immediate landlord paid the rate, with the power of raising the rent upon him in consequence?—If such a principle were adopted I think Parliament would be bound to adopt the principle of the property tax, whereby any clause to compel the tenant to pay a portion of the property tax renders the lease void, or renders that part of the lease void.

3029. You would propose that it should be compulsory upon the landlord to allow a deduction?—Yes.

3031. Who would get the benefit of the improvement during the tenancy; would it be the landlord, or would it be the tenant?—The tenant, supposing it was a 75 years' lease.

3032. Supposing you were occupying a house in Liverpool under a landlord, and an improvement is executed benefiting the property, who would get the immediate benefit of the improvement, would it be you or the landlord?—We should jointly get the benefit, but the landlord in the long-run.

3033. The landlord would have the benefit of the improvement, because it would give him the means of raising his rent; but who would have the personal enjoyment of the improvement?—The tenant would, if he paid for it; or he might have to pay an increased rent for it.

3034. Supposing it is the case of a yearly tenancy, the tenant would have the personal enjoyment of the park, for instance, would he not?—He would, no doubt; but then his landlord would increase the rent in proportion to the enjoyment that he got.

3035. So that the tenant would have to pay for the improvement in the shape of increased rent or increased rate?—Yes.

3036. But the personal enjoyment of such improvement as that would appertain to the occupier?—It would.

3037. Would it be unreasonable that he should pay a rate in proportion to his share of the enjoyment?—I think that the equity of the case would be met, as I said before, by dividing the rate between the two. I think very few landlords would extort the whole of the rate from their tenants.

3038. Supposing that I, living in Northamptonshire, and having house property in Liverpool, let that property to you, and there is a park made which you and your family are in enjoyment of, would it not be reasonable to say that as long as you occupy that house you should pay your share of the interest of the money which was expended in the construction of the park, either in the shape of rate or in the shape of rent?—I should say that the owner and the occupier ought to pay; I never sought to put the whole of the rate upon the landlord, but I sought to put half.

3039. Upon what principle would you make me pay anything as long as you occupied the house?—I think upon the principle that all property receives ultimately an increased value.

3040. At the end of your tenancy?—Yes; but property of which you are speaking is not let on lease, it is only let from year to year.

3041. As long as I do not raise the rent upon you, would it not be fair that you should pay the whole rate?—You cannot justify those things to the extreme point, but it is a general principle; I admit that you, as the landlord, should pay a certain proportion of the rate for the improvement which ultimately improves your property to a very great extent; but a bad state of trade may make the house unoccupied, or 50 other things may happen; there may be fluctuations of that kind.

3042. I grant that ultimately it will improve the property, but until the advantage accrues to the owner of the property by reason of his raising the rent, would it not be fair that the occupier of the property should pay the whole of the rate?—I do not think so myself; perhaps I may not be able quite to justify what I say, but I do not think that the occupier should pay the whole of the rate. I think that the ultimate value of the property should pay more, considering the whole question.

3043. Supposing you had a person in the position of a life tenant, and he is interested in a leasehold property; do you think that during a lease that has been granted by him or his predecessor any part of the rate should fall upon him?—I am scarcely prepared to answer that question.

3044. I see that objection was made in the town council to your proposition, because the expression used in the report of the debate is that it would work very awkwardly in the case of existing leases; would you propose that where property is held upon lease, the landlord should pay any part of the rate till the lease was up?—Certainly not. We reserved all such clauses in the Act of 1862, that whenever any agreement existed, nothing in the Act should affect it. I was not present at the debate, and I could not explain all my reasons to the council; otherwise I am convinced that the council would have carried it. As it was, it was only lost in my absence by one vote.

3045. Mr. Ayrton.] Do I understand that it is your opinion that no dealing for the renting of land for building purposes, the landlord obtains what may be called the balance as the value of his land after all considerations of the profitable use of the land have been taken into account?—If

—If I understand rightly the question, it is something like an honourable Member propounded to me just now; assuming that Lord Sefton had a lot of vacant land to sell, if there were no rates payable at all he would get so much more money for his land.

3046. Is it your view that the measure of the value of the land to be let on building leases, is the residue that will remain after taking into account all the circumstances of the profitable use of the land?—If all builders and speculators in land had had good logical educations and made those calculations, I have no doubt that that would be the fact, but practically it is not so, there is a little competition; one man thinks he can make more of the land than another, and the ingredient of the taxation does not come so immediately into his mind as it ought to do, perhaps.

3047. The letting of land, like anything else, is the result, is it not, of haggling in the market between both parties to the bargain, which no person could refer to any positive quantity?—A great deal.

3048. In considering the question of who should bear the burthen of the rates, have you considered the difference between payments that are made for the purchase of freehold property which will be held by the community in perpetuity, and the charge for the annual use of the property, do you see any distinction in the incidence in that respect?—I scarcely follow the question.

3049. In connection with the purchase of parks, or building a workhouse, and various other matters of that kind, there are always two elements, one is the acquisition of the freehold, and the other is the annual charge for the use of the property; do you recognise any distinction between the liability to pay for the freehold acquisition, and the liability to pay for the annual charge?—No; for this reason, that all the charges for acquisition fall on the borrowing powers of the Act for which the rate is levied, including its redemption, so that in 30 years those rates will cease; but in the instance of the maintenance of the park, this will fall upon the borough fund, which is ample to provide for such a contingency.

3050. Does not the acquisition of the permanent freehold rather become an incident upon the owners, the freeholders of the locality, whilst the charge for the annual use of the property is a charge upon those who annually use it?—Yes; and supposing that to be carried out properly, one rate should be levied, half upon the landlord and half upon the tenant; that would only apply to those improvement rates which tend to the acquisition of property; the tenant would also have to pay the further rate for the maintenance of that park; it would not be the landlord at all.

3051. Do you think that the landlord or the owner of the freehold might well be called upon, at all events, whatever your other views may be, to pay for the acquisition of freehold property which would be held by the community in perpetuity?—That would be so; but it can only be held for the benefit of the property, or the residents of that property; it is not divertible to any other thing than a park.

3052. Is not that a reason why the owners of the freehold should pay the charge for acquiring the property?—I think so; I think that you cannot do as we have done, buy a park of 350 acres without largely improving the property of Liverpool.

3053. In your Water Act you define the "owner," do you not, as the person for the time being receiving the rackrent of the land, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any person?—Yes.

3054. So that you do not go into the act of ownership, but you merely have to do with the person receiving the rent?—That is all we care for. Supposing that the property was in the hands of a mortgagee, who received the rent, we should come upon him for the rate.

3055. Therefore, being a poundage rate, into whosesoever hands a portion of the rent would go, there would be a pound per-centage following that rent?—Quite so.

3056. Mr. Gregory.] When you speak of the water rate being thrown partly upon the landlord, I presume that is regarded by them as a sort of income tax?—It is virtually a property tax.

3057. As you are aware, with respect to the property tax, the party paying it deducts it from the mortgagee or from the ground landlord, as the case may be?—Yes.

3058. That principle does not apply here, does it?—It does not quite to the same extent.

3059. From what you said, may I not assume that that would not be an unjust principle?—I have not thought over it to that extent, and I would not like to express an opinion as to whether a mortgagee should be taxed for local improvements.

3060. Would not that follow, upon the principle upon which you tax the owner?—Abstractedly it would; but I have not studied it with that view.

3061. You tax the owner, do you not, because you improve the value of his property?—Yes, but it does not improve the value of his mortgage.

3062. You improve the value of his security, do you not?—Yes, to some extent.

3063. Chairman.] With respect to what you said about improvement rates and the benefiting of property, would you modify your evidence in this way, that there are improvements, so-called, which do not benefit any particular person at all, in the way of giving them an actual tangible benefit?—No, only generally. There are many such improvements; take, for instance, the improvement of Church-street, making it 10 yards wider. Individually, I do not know that that benefited anybody, but it benefited the appearance of the whole town.

3064. But do you think that an occupier, who lived in a part of the town two miles off, would have any more practical benefit from that than the owner of property in the town?—No; except that a town, which has been made handsome from time to time, attracts a greater variety of people to it, and gives it a name and status, which it would not otherwise have. I believe that the parks will be a great benefit to Liverpool in that way. At present, a gentleman who makes his fortune in Liverpool generally goes and lives at Cheltenham or elsewhere, simply because there is nowhere for his wife to show her carriage in Liverpool, and there is no Rotten-row, or any place of that sort, which certainly do, amongst other things, attract people to London, and we hope that by-and-bye there will be those attractions at Liverpool, and that people will not go away.

5 April 1870.

3065. That would not benefit the owners quite as much as the occupiers?—Quite as much.

3066. Generally, what you maintain is, that the owners benefit as much as the occupiers by this outlay that is made upon the town?—Yes, I think so: and I am borne out by much greater evidence than my own, Mr. Gladstone's, and others who have all studied the question.

3067. As regards Lord Sefton's building land, supposing it were divided into two parts; supposing that the boundary of the parish ran through it, and that houses built upon the one part would be subject to rates of 5 s. in the pound, and houses of a precisely similar size and kind built upon the other part would only be subject to rates amounting to 1 s. in the pound, would not the land, subject to the lower rates, be distinctly worth more than the other?—It is a very broad question, and of course it would require a good deal of thought to answer it.

3068. What I mean is, two plots of ground, the one being liable to be rated, when covered with buildings, and the other not liable, would not one let for more than the other?—Doubtless.

3069. That, therefore, would be the exact difference in the rent, would it not?—I think that would be a fair inference.

3070. And in that case, therefore, it would come out of the owner's pocket?—Quite so.

3071. But in starting any building operation, if the difference in the rates on two different pieces of land could be brought out prominently, the taxation would be a distinct element in the price which a builder or a speculator would give for the land?—As I said before, it is a very fair logical proposition. I do not think, practically, it would have an effect to that extent.

3072. If the one were a highly-rated parish, and the other not rated at all, would not a builder without any logical education, take that view?—No doubt.

3073. Mr. Ayrton.] You are of opinion, are you not, that the primary incident of the value of building land is in proportion to the disposition of persons to spend money upon the land?—Yes.

3074. And just in proportion as they will spend a larger amount upon it, does the land become more valuable?—Yes.

3075. Chairman.] Are you aware how they manage the improvement rates in the United States?—I have heard a gentleman state in our town council that the improvement rates are levied in districts; the particular district to be improved pays the rate that is spent upon that particular spot.

3076. Mr. Ayrton.] Could that statement be borne out by the latest improvements in the United States, the New York improvements, for example?—Mr. Rathbone, who is a member of the town council, and brother of the honourable Member for Liverpool, told the council in my hearing that it was so, and mentioned New York as an instance.

3077. Chairman.] No doubt there would be some improvements that might be charged upon the district, but can you not conceive that there are others of such a nature as to make it difficult to fix upon a particular district to charge it on?—Yes, that might be so.

Mr. Elias Pitts Squarey, called in; and Examined.

Mr. E. P. Squarey. 26 April 1870.

3078. Chairman.] You reside in Wiltshire, near Salisbury, do you not?—Yes.

3079. And you have also a place of business in London, I believe?—Yes, as a Land Agent in London, and as a Farmer in Wiltshire.

3080. You are a tenant farmer of 1,100 acres, are you not?—Yes.

3081. And you are also a land agent and valuer?—Yes.

3082. In what counties have you mainly had experience?—Nearly throughout the whole of the south of England; and I have had some experience in Cumberland and Westmoreland as well; but the middle and south of England I know very intimately indeed as a land agent.

3083. Have you been a guardian of the poor also?—Yes; was a guardian of the poor for something like 18 years in the Alderbury Union.

3084. Have you considered the subject of local taxation at all?—It has been forced upon my attention both as a tenant farmer and as a land agent.

3085. Are you of opinion as a tenant farmer, that the poor rates are paid by the owner or by the tenant?—They are paid obviously by the tenant, but they are borne ultimately by the landlord.

3086. Will you explain to the Committee what you mean by saying that they are borne ultimately by the landlord?—I mean that when a tenant farmer is contemplating the occupation of a farm, he seeks to know what the gross outgoings for that farm will be; and seeing that the rates, and possibly the tithes and other payments analogous to them, form part of the outgoings, he calculates what proportion of those would be borne by himself, and he gives his landlord so much the less rent in consequence.

3087. Do you believe that in the case of tenancies not held under lease, but held from year to year, the rents are frequently changed, in consequence of the gradual increase of their local rates?—I do not think that they are frequently changed, but the gradual increase of local rates points to this action, that the tenant observing from time to time the gradual increment of his contribution to the rates generally, ultimately, when it has reached a certain point which he feels to be beyond the average which he ought to bear, and which he contemplated when he took the farm, raises the question with his landlord; but of course, if he thinks that his farm is more cheaply rented than the common market value, he hesitates a long time before raising the question with his landlord under those circumstances.

3088. Do you think that it is generally the case that the raising or lowering of the rent, in consequence of the increase or decrease in the local taxation, is reserved until there is a new tenancy?—I think it is reserved until a new tenancy or some great occasion brings the question to the surface between the landlord and the tenant.

3089. Do I rightly understand you to hold this opinion, that when a rise of rates takes place, subsequent to the date of the tenant taking over the farm, weighs upon the tenant, it very rarely comes out of the pocket of the landlord, so that the additions made to those rates during his tenancy are practically borne by the tenant?—All above the average is practically borne by the tenant.

3090. If the rates were to increase 3 d. or 6 d. in the pound during a certain number of years, he would have to wait some time before he would ask for a re-adjustment of the rent?—Certainly; our experience hitherto has been that other external circumstances have concurred at the same time with the increase of rates; probably there is a gradual rise in the value of the land during the time that the increment of rates has been obtaining, and that has prevented the question cropping up so certainly and so definitely as it would have cropped up supposing that no increase in the value of the lands held had arisen.

3091. Stating the case quite broadly, in your opinion a certain proportion of the increase of local taxation comes out of the pockets of the tenant?—I think most distinctly that is so.

3092. The fact being that although it comes ultimately out of the pocket of the landlord, there is a long course of time during which it comes out of the pockets of the tenants?—Certainly that is so. I am speaking especially with reference to annual tenancies now.

3093. In the case of leases the increase of rates never comes out of the landlord's pocket?—It is bound to come out of the pocket of the tenant until the expiration of the lease, and the re-adjustment takes place.

26 April 1870.

3094. Will you state your opinion to the Committee upon this point; supposing that by Act of Parliament a portion of the rate, or the whole of the rate, was to be put upon the landlord, due regard being had to existing tenancies, would that be any relief to the occupier?—As regards existing tenancies, it would be a relief pro tanto, although not to a very large extent; but I think that the payment of a portion of the rates by the landlord would remove a sense of oppression and fancied wrong on the part of the tenant, that I, for one, should be very glad to see removed.

3095. Mr. Hunt.] Are you speaking now of poor rates only?—Of all rates. I am speaking of local taxation generally.

3096. Chairman.] Do you think that in the mind of the tenant there is a distinction drawn between the county rate, for instance, and the highway rate, and the poor rate?—Not at all; they mix them all up together.

3097. Is there not a feeling of oppression as regards the county rate, that they have no share in the administration of the fund, whereas in the case of the poor rate they have a share in its administration?—I do not think that that feeling exists in the great body of the agricultural mind; I think that it exists in Chambers of Agriculture, and is, to a certain extent, fostered by recent discussions, but I do not think that it is of very much value. As a matter of feeling and justice, I should be disposed to concede the point, that the contributors to the county rate should be represented up to a certain point in the distribution.

3098. I think you said, as regards existing tenancies, that that would remove a sense of oppression?—I would hardly call it by so strong a term as a sense of oppression, but I think it is rather an uneasy feeling. When the rate collector calls on a tenant farmer he finds that his rate is gradually increasing, and he thinks that some one is responsible for it, and that he ought to bear a part of such increase.

3099. Have you seen that argument which is sometimes put forward, showing the way in which local taxation bears upon the farmers' profits?—I have seen it.

3100. How is an argument of that kind compatible with the rate coming out of the pocket of the landlord?—I think that the reasoning on which that argument is based is quite unsound.

3101. If it is true that what may be called the permanent average rate comes out of the pocket of the landlord, it cannot at the same time come out of the pocket of the tenant?—Certainly not; I think that the whole reasoning is unsound in that direction, except that where agreements are made, if there is an excess of taxation plus the average, that is the only item to my mind which is at all to be complained of by the tenant.

3102. Pointing, therefore, to the same result which you have indicated before, that the permanent hereditary burden, so to speak, comes out of the pocket of the landlord, whilst the increase comes out of the pocket of the tenant during his tenancy?—Obviously so.

3103. The grievance of the landlord and the tenant as regards that taxation would be limited to that excess, whatever it may be?—It would be simply limited to that excess.

3104. On the other hand, the decrease would go into the pocket of the tenant?—Obviously. I could give an instance where that is the case under the operation of the Union Chargeability Act.

3105. Would the landlord ask for a higher rent in consequence of a decrease in the local taxation?—I, as a land agent, most distinctly should advise him to do so, and he certainly would obtain it.

3106. But as a matter of fact, are landlords in the habit of doing that with what are called the permanent tenants?—I do not think, with the decrease of rating that would accrue to a tenant under the operation of the Union Chargeability Act, a landlord would ask his tenant at once to contribute the amount in the shape of increase drent, but when any readjustment of the whole question of rent came to arise, if the decrease were 4 d. or 6 d. in the pound, some tangible definite sum, obviously the landlord would gain the benefit in that case of the decrease.

3107. Would you, as a land agent, say that the landlord would not in some way be obliged to decrease his rent if there were an increase in the local taxation?—Yes, certainly; the landlord would be obliged to decrease his rent if there were an increase of local taxation, provided that concurrently with that there had not been an increase in the value of the freehold itself.

3108. As a valuer of land would you say that there has been a gradual increase in value?—Yes, most distinctly so, on the broad average there has been a considerable increase in value.

3109. So far as you are aware, from that additional value, has there been any increase in the farmers' profits?—I am disposed to think not. There are certain classes of farm profits which have increased. I think that the dairy occupant and grazing occupant have increased their profits, but in the average of large agricultural holdings, for instance, the Lincolnshire holdings, which I may take as the largest, I do not think that there has been any increase. I am rather disposed to think, on the other hand, that the per-centage of profit has been diminished.

3110. When you say that, do you take into account the outgoings of the farmer on account of the increase of taxation?—I take the case broadly.

3111. Then you do not say that the profits have decreased as the taxation has increased, but that the amount of profits may have decreased in consequence of the increase of taxation?—I think that the profits have decreased pro tanto by the amount of increased taxation, but that would be a very small element.

3112. Do you draw any distinction between classes of rates, namely, those which are simply a burden and those which may improve the holding?—In valuing land I should not do so, certainly; I should not make any difference in estimating the value of property, but I might say, in dealing with a tenant, "It is quite true that you pay the police rate, but you get increased security for your property and for your family as well, and there is a reflected benefit derived from the burden in that direction." Of course he gets it in common with other people who do not contribute to it at all.

3113. Would you say that there is a general impression abroad in the minds of two classes of people, that each class is itself paying one identical rate, the owners knowing that they pay it ultimately, and the tenants thinking that they pay it, because it is paid by by their hand?—I am sorry to say that I think the impression is very prevalent.

3114. The tenants complain of their being burdened by taxation, and the owners complain of the same taxation as coming out of their pockets?—I do not think that the error is so prevalent in the minds of the landowners as it is in the mind of the tenants, generally speaking.

3115. Is that because, in your opinion, the landlords are right in believing that ultimately it comes out of their own pockets?—Yes, I think that the landlord believes it from his better education; and he sees more clearly the operation of the system of rating, whereas the tenant simply looks upon the rents and the rates; up to a certain point he is educated, but in an unsound way, and he looks upon them as being separate payments. For instance, a tenant will frequently call the tithe a burden upon himself, whereas it is obviously no burden upon him; as regards himself, it does not affect the question in the remotest degree.

3116. Would you be able to state your impression as regards any particular county, as to what increase there has been upon what may be called the average rates?—I do not think that I could mention any particular county; but I have taken what I conceive to be the mathematics of a parish in the Alderbury Union, near me, which I think would be a fair average one, and I find that the expenditure of that parish has increased 24·9 per cent. from the two years 1847 and 1848, as compared with 1868 and 1869; that is to say, the contribution by the parish, in the shape of rates for all purposes, has increased 24·9 per cent. in the 21 years.

3117. Mr. Hunt.] Could you give the Committee the increase under different heads?—No, I could not.

3118. Could you say, roughly, under which head it had increased most?—I should hardly like to commit myself to a statement upon that point as to how the increase has arisen; but I do not think that it has arisen in the administration of the poor law, in the actual relief; it is rather in externals.

3119. Chairman.] Are there any new rates?—The greater increase, I think, is in the shape of police rates, and slightly increased county rates, and in the contributions, which practically are county rates, for the construction of a lunatic asylum, and things of that kind.

3120. You have no lighting or paving rate, I presume?—None at all.

3121. There are no rates for the improvement of the town part?—None at all; this would be an exclusively agricultural parish.

3122. Mr. Gregory.] Are you speaking now of only one parish?—Only of one parish; and I take it simply as being what I conceive to be as fair an average parish as I know.

3123. Chairman.] Can you tell the Committee about the highway rate; have you adopted the Highway Act?—Yes, we have adopted the Highway Act in the union of which this parish forms a part.

3124. Did you pay highway rate previously?—Yes.

3125. But have you abolished the tolls?—There were no turnpikes at all in this particular parish; the roads were entirely maintained by the parish, so that any conclusions as to the increased expenditure under the Highway Act would be very fair.

3126. Has there been an increased expenditure?—Yes, certainly, but with many corresponding advantages.

3127. This all goes to account for the increase, 24·9 per cent?—It is one of the elements of increase.

3128. The highways, the lunatic asylum, and the police rate, are also elements of increase?—Yes, those are the chief elements.

3129. Do you think that if the owner had to pay the rates directly out of his pocket, or a portion of the rates, he would take more interest in their administration?—Theoretically, I think he would; but, practically, I do not think that he would take a great deal more interest. There are some expenditures which occur, for instance, in the general character of buildings, in which he would take an interest; but one of the things which gives occasion to the tenant farmer to complain of more than anything else is the frequent extravagance in the putting up of county buildings, such as lunatic asylums, and things of that kind, in which there is frequently greater attention to architectural display than need be; there are no instances of extravagance on police stations that I know of; but still there might be a feeling that the tenant farmer would disregard all architectural additions to buildings; he would simply ask to get so many cubic feet at the cheapest possible rate.

3130. Do you think it would be a fair arrangement that the landlord should pay one-half of the rates and the tenant pay the other half of the rates?—Yes; I think that one-half the increase beyond the average is an idea that strikes me as being the fairest way of meeting the difficulty.

3131. It would practically come to the same thing, would it not, whether he paid half the excess, or whether he paid half the whole?—It is precisely the same thing; but to simplify the matter it occurs to me that it would be easier to arrange that the tenant, at his audit, should produce to his landlord vouchers for the expenditure of so much in the pound on the property which he holds; and that, with regard to any surplus beyond 2 s. 4 d. or 2 s. 6 d., or whatever the nominal average rating might be, the landlord should contribute one-half of such surplus.

3132. Would it be a part of your plan that the landlord should be recouped by the tenant for any decrease?—Obviously, it follows as a natural law that he should do so.

3133. Then it would be practically recognising this fact, that the whole rate is to come out of the pocket of the landlord, except so far as the tenant is to have an interest in one-half of the variations?—Yes, precisely so; it is part of the original conclusion that the landlord does bear the whole burden ultimately.

3134. You would think it desirable, would you not, that the tenant should retain a certain interest in the increase or decrease of the local expenditure, at all events as long as he has a voice in the administration?—I think it most important that he should retain a certain interest in it, although the interest is diminished by the Union Chargeability Act. I am speaking now of all rates.

3135. Would you prefer the plan by which all rates should be laid in the manner you describe, or one in which you might deal differently with the different rates; for instance, that the parochial rates should remain upon the tenant, whereas the whole of the county rates should remain upon the landlord?—I think it would lead to immense difficulties in the administration if there were a new apportionment of the different rates; I think it is better to deal with the case broadly, and to apportion the difference between the surplus or the decrease, as the case might be, between the landlord and the tenant.

26 April 1870.

3136. You would not go into detail as to the purposes for which those rates are applied?—Most distinctly not.

3137. For the sake of simplicity, I mean, in making the calculations?—I think that as between the two parties, the landowner and the tenant, the directions in which the expenditure may be applied are matters of complete indifference.

3138. Can you tell the Committee anything about the drainage rates of Kent and Sussex?—No; I only refer to them to illustrate the principle which I would apply. In the drainage rates of Kent and Sussex, over the Romney Marshes, and the levels of that district generally, and the estuaries which flow up into Kent and Sussex, the rule usually is that the scots, as they are termed, that is to say the cost of maintaining the banks, cleaning the ditches out, and seeing that the water-way is kept in proper order, are borne up to 2 s. 6 d. per acre by the tenant, and any surplus beyond that is borne by the landlord.

3139. Are there many places where the amount of the drainage rates is 2 s. 6 d. per acre?—It is only over a limited area, the area of the actual marsh itself; it does not apply to the areas of the upland too.

3140. How is that expenditure controlled?—That expenditure is controlled by commissioners who are appointed by the contributors.

3141. Mr. Gregory.] Is not that very exceptional; it is very rarely that the rate does exceed 2 s. 6 d., is it not?—Very rarely; in an experience of some 12 or 14 years, I think we have allowed an excess beyond 2 s. 6 d., about two or three times, and then to a very small extent only.

3142. Chairman.] But the principle is admitted there of the rate being paid by one person and the excess being paid by another?—Yes; the tenant limits his expenditure to 2 s. 6 d. per acre, but it would be really not more than 1 s. in the pound practically.

3143. Could you give any other illustration of your plan?—I do not know that I can give any other illustration. We have three large agencies in the Tisbury Union, and I know that in that union a new workhouse was very seriously demanded by the Poor Law Board. It was obviously a necessity, but still the tenants objected very much indeed to the expenditure, and ultimately, after some discussion, it was arranged that the landowners would pay one-half of the rate which should be levied for the cost of the erection of the new workhouse, and it has given great satisfaction.

3144. With regard to the attendance of ex officio guardians, do you think that the ex officio guardians take the same interest as they would if they were directly elected by the ratepayers?—I do not think that they take quite so large an interest as they would take if they were actually interested in the expenditure; according to my experience of the ex officio guardians, there are some who attend to their duties very properly and very well indeed, and they are most useful members of the board of guardians; but too frequently they only attend when there is an election or any question that involves the service of some friend.

3145. Is the present position of the ex officio guardians at all impaired by the fact that they are supposed to be administering money to which they do not contribute?—I think so; I think it deters many ex officio guardians from attending. Owing to my continued absences on business, I have got my rector appointed a guardian of my parish. He would have a feeling of delicacy about voting for any increased expenditure, because the other guardians may feel, very naturally, that he is a very small contributor to that which he is spending; and I know that that has operated frequently with ex officio guardians, that they have thought that the elected guardians look with some jealousy upon the views which they take as to expenditure, seeing that they contribute in so remote a degree to it.

3146. The foundation of the position of ex officio guardians being that they generally are the owners of property?—Quite so. They are occasionally not owners of property, and it would be in those special cases where it would apply so significantly.

3147. But, broadly, you make the statement generally, that the ex officio guardians more or less represent the owners?—Undoubtedly they do.

3148. But they represent them in an indirect form?—Yes, quite so.

3149. The payment by the owners is indirect, and their representation is indirect?—Quite so.

3150. Do you think that it might be desirable to give them a more direct interest in paying the rates, and a more direct position as administrators?—I think that it would remove any disposition or any feeling of jealousy on the part of the elected guardians, if it was so arranged.

3151. Are you a member of the Highway Board?—Yes.

3153. Has there been any feeling in the counties with which you are acquainted, as regards the county administration, that it is in the hands of persons who are not elected by the ratepayers?—I think there has been a vague undefined sort of feeling of grievance about it; but I do not think that it ever has or that it ever would take any very marked or definite shape; but for the sake of avoiding any question upon the matter, I think that a certain proportion of elected guardians of unions might very properly be imported into the county boards.

3154. Would it recommend itself to your opinion that if there is any change introduced by which a portion of the rates is put upon the owner, the owners and the occupiers should be distinctly represented in the bodies administering those rates?—As a matter of principle, I think so, certainly.

3155. So that you would give the owner a better position as regards the administration of the poor law, and you would give the occupier a better position as regards the administration of the county rate?—Yes; but that would not be a matter which I should contest very greatly. Really it is rather an extension of the principle than any very great occasion for it.

3156. Mr. Hunt.] You stated, did you not, that you would like your plan of debiting the landlord landlord with half the increase of the rates, and crediting him with half the decrease of the rates, to apply to the case of all rates without any distinction?—I think so.

3157. Is there not a great distinction as regards the permanent improvement of property to be derived from the expenditure of the different kinds of rates?—Yes; that applies particularly with regard to the highway rates.

3158. Take the most important rate, the poor rate, it is no permanent improvement of property to spend in a particular period a large sum in the relief of the poor, is it?—I can conceive a permanent improvement to arise.

3159. You are now speaking of buildings, are you not?—Excluding buildings, there is no permanent improvement.

3160. Supposing you gave a large amount of relief to the poor at a particular period, it would be no permanent improvement to the property in which those poor were domiciled?— It would improve the existing administration of the poor law, but would not be a permanent improvement to the property.

3161. Say that there are a certain number of persons to be relieved on a board day, an additional sixpence a week to the allowance in each case would be no permanent improvement, would it, to the property within the area of that union?—No, certainly not.

3162. It would be an increase of charge to the ratepayers who had to pay the difference?—Certainly.

3163. But the landlord could derive no possible benefit from it, either at the present time or hereafter?—None. I should be rather disposed to think it might be ultimately a damage, because it would induce paupers or quasi-paupers to settle in a union where they thought there was unusual liberality in the administration of relief.

3164. In the case of buildings for the purposes of the poor law, there would be an improvement in the value of the property, would there not, supposing that substantial buildings were erected at a particular period, because it would relieve the property from any charge with respect to buildings for some time to come?—Yes; I assent to the extension of that point in this way, as in the case of the Tisbury Union. The Tisbury board of guardians could not comply with what I might call the letter of the law, the dry formula of the application of the powers of the Poor Law Board; but I contend that a rigid carrying out of the law would tend very much to the mitigation of the ultimate pauperism, and consequently would be an ultimate benefit to the whole property.

3165. Who would have the greatest power of controlling the amount of out-door relief that would be required, the owner or the occupier?—That would depend very much upon the number of elected and ex officio guardians who might attend.

3166. Who would have the power of throwing the greatest number of people upon the rates, the owner or the occupier; the occupier is a much larger employer of labour than the owner, is he not?—Yes; but under the Union Chargeability Act I do not think that that feeling operates in the remotest degree with the employer of labour, or with the landowner.

3167. But if the occupier could throw upon the owner half the charge of any temporary increase of rate, would you not expect that the occupier would be less careful about throwing persons out of employment, and so bringing them upon the rates, than he is at present?—That would have operated under the old parochial system, but I do not think it would operate now.

3168. Have you been a guardian since the Union Chargeability Act came into operation?—Yes.

3169. Do you find the same attendance of guardians as before?—Yes; I think our board is as large, and the attention given to individual cases quite as great as it was before.

3170. Have you heard of any other unions where that has not been the case?—I have not, and I have never heard the question raised.

3171. You think that in your own union there is the same attention to economy as there was before that Act passed?—Distinctly there is the same attention to economy; but I should say that there had been a rather more generous treatment of individual cases.

3172. But that generosity of treatment, be it right or wrong, has tended, has it not, to increase the rates?—No doubt it would do so; but I think, on the other hand, the workhouse test has been more rigidly applied than it was before. I think that there has been less individual feeling in the administration of the law under the Union Chargeability Act than there was previously.

3173. With reference to the highway rate, do you consider that the improvement of the roads is a permanent benefit to the properties through which they pass?—Most certainly.

3174. Then, so far as regards the highway rate, the owners would have a more direct interest in the matter than they would with reference to part of the poor rate which is applied to the relief of destitute persons?—Certainly.

3175. As regards the county rate; the county rate is levied for several different purposes, is it not?—Yes.

3176. And part of those purposes may be considered to be a temporary benefit, and part a permanent benefit?—I hardly apprehend the temporary benefit.

3177. For instance, if you take the police rate, with regard to the number of the force, probably that affects the comfort and the security of persons who are living within the county at the time when that force is so employed?—Certainly.

3178. But it does not affect the comfort and security of a future generation?—No, except as showing the impossibility of crime; it would affect it so far as that.

3179. Still that would be to a very small extent?—It affects the value of property to a very serious extent. A locality where there is no theft, and where vagrants do not abound, is much more valuable in the market than where they are frequent.

3180. But as regards the buildings for police stations, and so forth, the increase of rate for the purpose of providing such buildings adds to the value of property by way of relieving property in future time of the burden of repeating the same process?—Certainly.

3181. And the same remark would apply to the case of lunatic asylums?—Obviously; they all come under the same category.

3182. Would not it, in your opinion, be reasonable to make a difference in throwing a part of those rates upon the landlord, between those which are of permanent value to the property and those parts which are of no permanent value to the property?—If the amount were of a very serious character I should say yes; I recognise the principle which you suggest, but I think that the smallness of the amount that would be contributed in that way would not warrant the separation of the two amounts.

26 April 1870.

3183. With regard to the county rate, are you aware that the greater part of the county rate is levied without any discretion on the part of those who administer the rate?—Clearly so.

3184. But is it not the case with regard to the part which is discretionary, that the administrators of the county business have the strongest motive to economy?—I quite think that they have; I think I have recognised that in my replies to the questions of the Right Honourable Chairman; I do not think that the question of the necessity of electing representatives of the expenditure from the guardians is a matter of great importance; I only conceded it as a matter of principle.

3185. Do you think that it would tend in any way to economy, and that the pockets of the ratepayers would be better protected if they had elective representatives on the county boards than they are at present under the administration of the magistrates?—I do not think that that would make any difference at all.

3186. With regard to the county bridges, do you think that there is any unnecessary expenditure upon them by the magistrates in quarter sessions?—No; as I said before, I think that the county funds are most judiciously and economically administered.

3187. There is one point, is there not, in which you think that there might be more economy, namely, in the expenditure with regard to the style of architectural buildings which have been erected during the last few years?—That is a point which I hear canvassed a great deal amongst the tenants with whom I come in contact in the course of my business.

3188. Sir Massey Lopes.] You mentioned to the Committee just now that land had very much increased in value during the last 20 years; is it your opinion that poor land has increased in value in the same proportion as good land?—It is a very difficult question to answer broadly; it depends very much upon the locality, and upon the ground. If you refer to poor light soils, most distinctly that land has increased in value very materially; but if they are poor, thin, wet clays, in bad climatic districts, if I may so term them, I do not think that they have increased in value at all.

3189. Undoubtedly land has increased in value in the neighbourhood of large towns, especially that description of land of which you spoke just now, dairy land; you have been recently in Devonshire, have you not?—Yes.

3190. And you have been over a poor class of country?—Yes.

3191. Is it your opinion that that land has increased in value?—In capital value, certainly; not in annual value.

3192. Will you kindly explain what you mean by capital value?—I mean the value to sell in fee simple as compared with the annual value.

3193. Mr. Hunt.] You mean that purchasers would be content with a less per cent. for their money?—Precisely.

3194. Sir Massey Lopes.] As a matter of fact, all land has increased in value, but has this poor land, if it is brought into the market, increased in the same proportion as good land?—I am disposed to think that it has.

3195. Do not you think that those increasing rates have very much discouraged the reclamation and improvement of that poor land?—I think that the incidence of increased local taxation has not discouraged the application of improvements to land; the proportion in which it falls upon it is so remote and so small, that it really does not greatly affect the application of improvements to it.

3196. Surely there is a great deal of poor land, which, if cultivated, only leaves a very small margin for profit; and if you put high rates upon the land, is not that a discouragement to its cultivation?—I do not think that high rates could necessarily justly fall upon that type of land; the increment of rates, such as those which we are now considering, really and truly could not affect it, in my judgment. I do not see how a man could appreciate it if he were hesitating about improving this poor land, or leaving it in its natural condition. I do not think that any man can appreciate the amount of rates which would fall upon that land in its improved condition. He could not measure accurately the profit which is to result, so as to say that the incidence of increased taxation would deter or would incite him to its cultivation.

3197. I quite agree with you that 1 s. more or less in good land will make no difference whatever; but is it your opinion that 1 s. more or less in poor land does not make a considerable difference in the amount of improvements?—I do not think it would; the improvements of land of that type are undertaken invariably by very sanguine men, and I am sorry to say that my experience is that usually their expectations are disappointed rather than realised; and having regard to my experience, I am disposed to think that a man would not and could not measure the difference between the increase of the local taxation that would be applicable to such land.

3198. Is it your opinion that the high and increasing rates upon land have had the effect of making what was arable land pasture land; that is to say, in order to save expense upon the poor land, the tenants have been induced to turn arable land into pasture?—Arable land has been converted into pasture, most decidedly, and the tendency is in that direction; and the question of rating may have contributed somewhat to it; but it is infinitesimal, and hardly appreciable.

3199. Perhaps it is more a question of the price of land?—I think it is more a question of the cost of labour.

3200. I was about to ask you whether the effect of turning arable land into pasture has not been to drive a great many labouring men of the rural population out of occupation, and inducing the rural population in a great measure to crowd into the towns?—I think that the tendency of turning arable land into pasture has been not to employ fewer hands in the cultivation of other portions of the farms, but rather to induce the farmer to expend a larger proportion of labour on those lands which are still maintained as arable lands. I do not think that as yet the conversion of arable land into pasture has operated at all in the way of throwing labour out of employment.

3201. What would you consider to be the great advantage of carrying out your principle of dividing the rates between the owner and the occupier?—Simply I think that the tenant would feel that if it was conceived to be a right thing by the Government, or by the county board, to expend certain moneys, it would show that he alone did not bear the whole burden of that increase, but that it was shared in by his landlord.

3202. But that would be only an idea, as I understand, because your opinion is that the landlord really does pay the whole rate at present?—It is not an idea merely; it would be a fact so far as the tenancy remained undisturbed.

3203. Chairman.] Does the landlord pay the increase in the rates now?—No. I understood the Honourable Member to say that he was asking me a question as to increase of rate.

3204. Sir Massey Lopes.] I understand you that you do not strongly recommend the principle of the division of rates between the owner and the occupier?—Yes, I do strongly recommend it. I think it is quite the right thing; but what I suggest is that a division might take place beyond the nominal average which might be struck, and that a division of the surplus should be taken instead of taking half of the whole rates; they are practically the same thing.

3205. You simply recommended a division between the owner and the occupier, as a matter of simplicity?—As a matter of simplicity; not only as a matter of simplicity, but certainly it is an arrangement which I think would remove from the mind of the occupier, the payer, the sense of wrong and the sense of injustice that he was paying more than he contemplated paying when he entered into his first arrangement with his landlord.

3206. Would you see any objection to place the whole of the county rate upon the owner instead of half?—I should see no objection to it, but I do not see any advantage in doing so. I know that, as a land agent, I should simply add the whole county rate to the tenant's rent at once.

3207. Supposing this plan was carried out, would it not interfere with all existing arrangements and contracts between landlord and tenant?—It would affect all of them; and I am quite satisfied that on all fairly rented farms there would be no difficulty whatever in coming to an arrangement with the tenant without rescinding the existing arrangements.

3208. In Wiltshire there are a great many yearly tenants, are there not?—A very large number of yearly tenants.

3209. And when the rates have decreased, the tenant has got the benefit of it?—Yes.

3210. And, in the same way, if they have increased, he has had to pay more?—Yes, he has had to pay more.

3211. Have you met with many complaints among the tenants of Wiltshire, and those that you have had most to do with, with regard to the increase of rates?—Yes, I may illustrate my own case particularly. I hold my farm upon a lease for 16 years; the expenditure for rates, until the Union Chargeability Act came into operation, was about 75*l.* a year; I am the sole occupier of the parish, I should tell you, except the clergyman, who has a small portion, and the woods belonging to the landlord. The expenditure, as I have said, was about 75*l.* until the Union Chargeability Act came into operation, and it is now something like from 170*l.* a year to 180*l.* I am paying rather more than 100*l.* a year more than I contemplated when I took my farm, which I took in 1858.

3212. Chairman.] Have you had a reduction of rent in consequence?—I cannot ask my landlord for a reduction of rent, because I hold under a lease of which there are four years unexpired, and until my lease expires it is clear that I cannot make a rearrangement.

3213. If the Act had been passed before you took your lease, that increase beyond a certain amount would have been shared between the occupier and the owner, and you would have been 50*l.* better off?—I should have been quite 50*l.* better off, certainly.

3214. Sir Massey Lopes.] Would not it be an additional reason why you should be a strong advocate for that arrangement, that if the owners pay half, as you would suggest, the administration of the rates would be more economical?—I do not think that that would greatly affect the question. I think that in certain directions there might be greater liberality in the application of the funds; but on the other hand I am satisfied that the presence at the boards of guardians of a larger number of ex officio members would lead to a more rigid application of the workhouse test, and I do not believe that over the whole expenditure there would be an increase.

3215. Do not you think that the occupiers look more after the rates, or would look more after the rates, than the owners?—I do not think that they would; I think that the occupiers, as I have said before, would frequently take a view which the ex officio guardians might overrule as to a particular case; but, on the other hand, I think that the elected guardians do frequently take a loose view of a case, or a personal view of a case, instead of applying the workhouse test so rigidly as they should, and would let a pauper have a certain amount of out-door relief.

3216. Are there many large proprietors in Wiltshire?—Yes, they are large proprietors in Wiltshire, as a rule.

3217. Do you expect that any one of those owners would attend the meetings of the board of guardians?—I think some of them would.

3218. Would they not be exceptions?—There would be many exceptions, certainly; I should suggest that the landowners of large property should have the right of nominating a person to represent them.

3219. Are not the rates in Salisbury very high; in fact, are they not almost higher than any other place in the kingdom?—I am afraid I can give you very little information as to the rates in Salisbury, but certainly they are not higher than any in the kingdom; I think that they are about 6*s.* in the pound, including an unlimited supply of water.

3220. When the rates, as in Salisbury, are very high, is not it a great hardship to the poor there; do they not feel it perhaps more than any other class?—I think it is the owner of the property that feels it.

3221. I thought you said that you did not think that the tenant felt it at all?—I have no doubt that the owners of small house property in Salisbury make stern arrangements with their tenants, and perhaps insist upon a higher rental; if there is a question of 3*d.* a week one way or the other, the owners in Salisbury, or any other town where the rates might be exceptionally high, would insist upon putting that 3 d. on those tenants to meet the increased expenditure.

3222. Do not you think that the effect of high rates in a town is very much to make the accommodation for the poor worse than it otherwise would be, and crowding them in small rooms?—There can be no doubt about that; the profit on investment in building is diminished pro tanto by it.

3223. The county rate in Wiltshire is unusually low, is it not?—I think it is very moderate, and it is wonderfully well administered in Wiltshire.

3224. You have no great grievance in that county with regard to the administration by the magistrates?—Not at all; on the contrary, I think it is very well administered.

3225. You said, as I understand, that the landlord pays all the rates eventually?—Ultimately he does; it is a burthen upon the land.

3226. But supposing that a tenant invests, say, 1,000 l. upon his holding, who pays the increased rates upon that 1,000 l., the landlord, or the tenant who has put his money into his occupation?—Supposing the assessment committee take the application of that 1,000 l. into account, in arriving at the rateable value of the property, obviously the tenant bears it during the existence of his tenancy.

3227. But then the assessment committee revise their assessment every three years, do they not?—Yes; every three years.

3228. Therefore, at the end of three years at the furthest, that man would have to pay the increased amount of rates upon the personal property which he had invested in his holding?—Supposing an increase in the annual value of the property, and that such increased value would be taken as the basis of the rateable value, that would be so.

3229. Mr. Hunt.] I think you stated that you were acquainted with Cumberland and Westmoreland?—Yes; we have had one agency in Cumberland.

3230. Is it not the fact that properties are held in those counties in much smaller quantities than they are in the rest of England?—It would be true, as a fact, that the holders of property are smaller, generally speaking; the statesmen of Cumberland and Westmoreland are a peculiar class, but the estates with which I had to deal were practically large estates.

3231. Mr. Pell.] You stated, did you not, that local taxation ultimately attaches itself to the owner?—Yes.

3232. There is an interim between the time at which it is first increased and is paid by the occupier, and the time when it detaches itself from him and attaches itself to the owner?—Obviously.

3233. During that interim it falls upon the occupier, does it not?—Any increased taxation beyond the average which existed at the time when the tenant took the farm, clearly falls upon the tenant during that interval.

3234. You are personally acquainted with the letting of land; at what intervals do you readjust the rent?—They vary much according to circumstances; in some localities the interval of readjustment may be taken at from 10 to 15 years.

3235. And in others would it be longer; take, for instance, some of those large properties in Wiltshire?—I should think that in exceptional cases they might be longer; but the average interval of readjustment of rental is something like from 12 to 15 years.

3236. In the estates which you have the management of, what is the general rule that you recommend to your employers with regard to the readjustment of rents where there are no leases?—We ordinarily recommend leases, and where there are no leases we invariably recommend our clients to give two years' occupation; that is, that the tenancy should be determinable by two years' notice to quit, and in those cases, unless there is anything special in the case that may arise, the rearrangement of a farm or anything of that kind, we should consider it unwise, and I should not advise our clients to expect any alteration in the rental under 12 or 14 years' interval.

3237. Is it not very frequently the rule, where the property is of large size and where they have had the same family holding the land for many years, that the rents should not be altered excepting upon a death or upon the chance of the man going out voluntarily; do you lay it down as a rule that you recommend your clients to reconsider the question of rent upon a yearly tenancy at certain periods?—Certainly, if I thought there had been an increase or a decrease in the value, I should recommend it.

3238. Do the occupiers know when those periods are going to occur?—They would expect it, certainly, at about the intervals which I have indicated; about 12 to 15 years.

3239. Then it comes to this, that taking the whole class of men whom you act for, or whom you are placed over in the sense of an agent, that for 12 or 15 years they bear all the increased taxation?—Quite so.

3240. And therefore it is a matter of considerable interest to them?—It is a matter of considerable interest to them, certainly to that extent.

3241. And you think that the occupiers of land are more interested in this point of the increase of rate than the landowners?—I think that both parties are interested in the results of increased expenditure, supposing the expenditure has been wisely applied. Obviously, increased expenditure on highway rates, assuming of course an economical application, is as decidedly beneficial to the occupier as it is to the landowner. The occupier sends two horses where he would have sent three, under a bad state of roads, to carry his corn to market, and he can use a better kind of conveyance in taking himself to market than he would take before, or than he would ordinarily take in a bad state of the roads; the tackle lasts longer.

3242. I think you said a little time ago, in answer to a question of the Right Honourable Chairman, that, as a class, the landlords thought over these questions more than the tenants?—I did not intend to convey that they thought over the questions more, but rather that they were a more educated class than the tenants, and that they appreciated the fact at once, that those matters are simply a distribution of a certain payment by the tenant between themselves and the tenant.

3243. The result of their thought is that they have not remonstrated to the extent of those who, instead of thinking, have had to pay?—That is the practical result.

3244. You have told us one other point with regard to your own occupation, that the effect of the the change in the law was to raise your poor rate from 75 l. to about 180 l. a year; that was an increase of about 105 l.; I suppose that it is hardly a fair thing to ask what the rent of your occupation is, and what proportion it bears to the rent?—The rent of my farm is 1,300 l. a year.

3245. It was really an increase of 105 l. a year?—Practically it was so.

3246. Upon that appearing, did you apply to the assessment committee yourself to have your assessment reduced?—I did, and succeeded after a very long fight indeed. I had to bear it for a time; sufficiently long to get a basis of operations.

3247. Sir Massey Lopes.] In a word, you have had to pay 105 l. more?—Yes, I have to pay 105 l. more in the shape of rates, but I have reduced my rateable value.

3248. Mr. St. Aubyn.] What was it originally assessed at?—It was assessed originally at 1,300 l. a year, minus 10 per cent. I bore it for a certain period, that I might get a basis of operations to go to the assessment committee upon, and after a very long struggle with the assessment committee, I compelled them to reduce my rateable value 100 l. a year, although my rent was not altered at all.

3249. Chairman.] You enforced a reduction of 10 per cent., which reduction was afterwards allowed?—They afterwards reduced the rateable value of my occupation by the excess amount of rates which I showed them I was paying; that is about 100 l. a year. My rateable value stood at 1,300 l. a year, minus 10 per cent.; that is, 1,170 l. Then I appealed to the assessment committee, and the rateable value was reduced from 1,170 l. to rather below 1,000 l.; 965 l.

3250. Mr. Pell.] Were you ever short of labourers in that parish; was it a close parish?—Yes, it was a close parish.

3251. Have you labourers that come from any distance?—No; not for ordinary purposes, but we are peculiarly placed, we are on the edge of the New Forest, and there are a great number of small freeholders who work during the winter in the New Forest at wood work and things of that kind, and in the summer we can command any amount of labour from that source.

3252. This was an abatement from your profits of 105 l.; did you avail yourself of the opportunity of claiming to be assessed upon your profits?—I simply waited for the alteration, because I knew that the assessment committee would take the rateable value, and having taken the rateable value, I paid upon the lowered rateable value to the income tax.

3253. In fact your landlord is paying upon one assessment, and you are paying upon another?—Yes.

3254. Colonel Brise.] This increase, I think you say, was from 1848 to 1868?—In the special parish which I mentioned, it was from 1848 to 1868.

3255. What is the acreage of that parish of which you are speaking?—Between 5,000 and 6,000 acres.

3256. I think I understood you to say that you would hardly recommend that the rate should be divided between the owner and the occupier, except in this way, that the owner and the occupier should enter into an arrangement that, say, something like 2 s. 6 d. in the pound should be fixed as the rate to be paid upon the farm, and if there is an increase or excess on that 2 s. 6 d., then half that excess should be paid by the owner, and half by the occupier?—That is the course which I suggest, because it may well happen that there are parishes in which the normal average, that is the value of the terms on which the tenant took his farm, may really and truly not have been altered, and in that case there would be no necessity at all for raising the question of rates between the landlord and the tenant; it is only to protect the tenant in the excess of expenditure, that I care that any alteration should be made.

3257. Do not you think that if the tenant had a fixed rate to pay of 2 s. 6 d. in the pound, he would take very little interest in the expenditure, or as to the increase of rates in the district?—His interest would be diminished up to a certain point, but I do not think that would affect the case very materially; I infer that it would not, because since the Union Chargeability Act has been in operation, I think the poor law has been more fairly and better administered than it was before. Clearly the interests of the individual under the Union Chargeability Act are so wonderfully mitigated, compared with what they were before, that his interest in extravagance or economy is very small indeed.

3258. Do you think that the occupier would take an equal interest in the rate, whether it was fixed at 2 s. 6 d. or not?—Yes, I think so.

3259. I understand you to say that the rector of your parish is a guardian of that parish, and that he only pays very little to the rates?—He is only rated, I think at 40 l. a year.

3260. Has he not the rentcharge of the parish?—He has no rentcharge; he has glebe in lieu of tithe; he only pays rates on his actual rectory house. I occupy his land, and therefore I pay the rates upon the land.

3261. I think you said that you did not see any advantage in putting all the county rates on to the owner, but at the same time you thought that, if possible, the occupier ought to have a share in the administration of the expenditure of the county rates?—On principle, I think so.

3262. If the county rate were to be put upon the owner, do not you think that that would be desirable, and that there would not be any feeling or any discontent as to the administration of the expenditure of that county rate?—I think that the discontent is more in idea than in fact. I do not think that it really is a tangible grievance at all. I should concede, that as a mere matter of principle, if the occupier's money is to be spent, he has a right to say that he or his representative should sit upon the board.

3263. Then you would not recommend that the county rate should be put upon the owner?—No, I think not; I see no ground for it.

3264. Mr. Fielden.] You stated, did you not, that the increase of expenditure in your parish is 24·9?—It is not my own parish, but it is the parish of Britford, a parish in the Alderbury Union.

3265. Can you tell us what has been the increase in the union in the same period?—I cannot; but I think it has been, as nearly as possible, the average of the Britford parish.

3266. Has there been the same increase, or somewhere about the same increase, over the whole county of Wiltshire, do you suppose?—I should think as nearly as possible.

3267. You stated that a new workhouse has been built for the Tisbury Union; can you tell me me if the poor rates have increased since the building of that workhouse?—I cannot give you any authentic information upon that point; the workhouse was only completed about a year ago, and we have no information.

26 April 1870.

3268. Has vagrancy increased in that union?—I believe it has decreased somewhat. I was told the other day that there had been fewer vagrants in that direction since the house had been perfected, so that the application of the poor law could be insisted upon thoroughly, compared with its negligent administration under the old house.

3269. Has the police force been increased, do you know?—The police force has not been increased, it has been at one uniform standard for many years.

3270. Sir James Lawrence.] You mentioned, I think, that in the parish of Bitford there had been a great increase in the local rates during the last 20 years; has the land increased in value during that period?—Yes, certainly.

3271. Then the increase of local rates has not decreased the value of the land?—It has not decreased the value of the land; the conditions have been concurrent.

3272. Then the tenants having paid the greater part of this per-centage while it was levied, you stated that the local taxation ultimately fell upon the landlord; will you explain what appears to me to be a discrepancy, that if those rates were paid, according to your own statement there should be a fall in the price of land in consequence of the increase of those local taxes, but if the land has increased in value, how has the expense of the local taxation fallen ultimately upon the landlord; where is the evidence of its so falling?—Supposing the conditions were identical in 1848 and 1869, it is quite clear that the increase of 24·9 per cent. in the value of Britford parish, would have fallen completely and absolutely upon the landowners, but the value of land, the value of the rateable corpus has increased during that time from other circumstances, and that has more than compensated for the additional taxation; rents have been actually raised, so that the increase of the local taxation has been concurrent with them.

3273. I gather from you that a great part of this increase was caused by the making of new roads?—I do not know that I have committed myself to the statement that it was due to new roads; that was one element.

3274. Has not it tended to increase the value of the land?—Yes, up to a point, it is one of the elements in the increased value.

3275. Has not the tenant, while he has been paying the rates which have been employed in making those new roads, increased the value of the land, so that at the period when there will be a re-assessment he will have to pay increased rent, having already paid for the roads, which had produced in some measure this increased rent?—That is quite so, with a qualification, the qualification being that the tenant would take into account the increased rates which would be payable under his tenancy; and he would therefore pay the landlord a rather less rent, a less nominal value of the estate being consequent upon the amount of the increased taxation which he had been spending up to a certain point in improving his holding.

3276. Although the land has increased in value, and larger rents have been obtained in consequence in some measure of the expenditure of the local rates, yet a larger rent would have been obtained but for the still larger local rates which remain to be paid?—Yes.

3277. Mr. Seely.] Do you think that, as a matter of convenience, it would be a good thing if all the rates, the county rate, poor rate, highway rate, and so on, were collected in one sum by one collector?—I do not think that that would be a matter which would affect the question at all.

3278. Do not you think it would be a good thing for the tenant to know more clearly than he does now, what the total amount of the rates is?—I do not think it would affect the question very materially.

3279. You do not think that there would be any convenience at all in it?—No, I think not. Practically the ratepayer, except he is very remotely interested, knows pretty well what the actual contribution to the rates will be, and the increment of the rate is very gradual indeed.

3280. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Has your attention been at all turned since the Union Chargeability Act to the parish overseers; and can you state whether, since the Union Chargeability Act has been in operation, there is any further necessity for the officers whom we know as the parish overseers?—Their duties are wonderfully mitigated, no doubt.

3281. But would it not be better, in your opinion, that the board of guardians, or some officer in connection with the assessment committee, should be the person levying the rate, instead of the overseers of the parishes; it seems very cumbrous now, and unnecessarily so, does it not?—I have not thought of that special point; but I think that the arrangement might be simplified, possibly.

3282. In what way would you simplify it?—The present form is that the board of guardians make calls upon parishes, which calls are directed to the overseers; the overseers, if necessary, call a vestry and state their requirements, and the rate is made upon the basis of the requirement indicated upon the calls of the board of guardians. I do not know that there would be any great gain in modifying the machinery under which that is arranged now.

3283. Is it not the fact at this moment that the parish overseers call for any sum that they like, totally irrespective of the wants and requirements of the boards of guardians, so far as the poor law is concerned, for instance?—I think not; I have had no experience of such a state of things.

3284. Do you know anything of Yorkshire, or of boards in Yorkshire?—I do not.

3285. I think, in answer to some of the honourable Members of the Committee, you have told us that you thought that ex officio guardians do not take so much interest as perhaps they would do if they were elected by the ratepayers; but supposing that all the guardians, instead of some of them being ex officio guardians, were elected by the ratepayers, is there not very considerable danger, or would there not be very considerable danger that the gentlemen who are now ex officio guardians being magistrates, as we commonly find them, would not be elected at all, and that the magistrates would have very little to say at the boards, because they would have no seat there?—I should be extremely sorry that ex officio guardians should not be present at the boards of guardians; and if I conveyed to the Committee

Committee any idea that the whole constitution of boards of guardians should be changed radically, I beg to state that I desire that if any ex officio guardian is elected he should be elected by the landowners and not by the occupiers, so that that ex officio guardian should represent the landowners, as contradistinguished from the occupiers.

3286. But would you make a different franchise for the ex officio guardians to that which is commonly found in the elected guardians?—Most distinctly I would, because I can quite conceive of a state of things under which the owners of property, not being ex officio guardians, may actually have no representation at all at the board.

3287. At all events you would think it very undesirable that the magistracy should be excluded from seats at the board?—Most distinctly so; I desire to have a larger proportion of them if possible.

3288. Why do you think that a larger proportion of the magistrates would be an advantage?—Not quoad magistrates, but as owners of land as contradistinguished from occupiers.

3289. That is in order, if I may make any distinction at all, that there might be a better class of mind brought to bear upon the subject than otherwise would be the case?—A more educated class of mind.

3290. Chairman.] It is not as magistrates that you wish them to be present at the board, but as representatives of the owners, and taken from the owner class, if possible?—Quite so. I venture to illustrate that by saying that I could conceive a union in which no magistrates qualified as ex officio guardians, but where a large number of owners of land who were not magistrates, would be quite unrepresented.

3291. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Is the union of Tisbury a large one?—I think it comprises about 16 or 17 parishes; it is a large agricultural union.

3292. Do you consider that for the purposes of administering the poor law a very large union has an advantage over a comparatively small one?—Most distinctly.

3293. How about the relief of the poor who have to apply, say, at the weekly meeting of the board of guardians, going a distance?—I quite recognise the difficulty which you propound to me in that direction; but I think that the office of overseer really comes in to mitigate any pressing necessity in the case of areas of large unions as distinguished from small unions; but there is the difficulty of locomotion.

3294. Would it not tend very largely to increase the pauperism of a union, say, where a pauper or person obliged to go for relief had to travel 10 miles to the board and 10 miles back again, and possibly take up the whole day; might not that permanently pauperise his family?—I think it would tend to a great deal of individual suffering, but I should be disposed to think that it would rather decrease the pauperism.

3295. Would it not have the effect, possibly, of decreasing pauperism, in making persons careful about applying to the poor law guardians where the Poor Law Board guardians ought really to step in and administer relief?—I have said that it might tend to increase individual suffering in cases of deserving paupers applying for relief, but I am quite satisfied that it would keep a great number of persons away from applying for relief if larger difficulties existed in their making the application.

3296. Mr. Gregory.] You have been asked as to the rise in the value of land; has not that rise been rather keeping pace with the increase of the population and the general wealth of the country?—Yes; but there are qualifications necessary in accepting that proposition.

3297. Do you mean local qualifications?—Yes, local qualifications; and also the improved means of locomotion have affected it very materially, and have increased the value of land.

3298. That, in fact, has brought land into value in remote districts, as I apprehend?—Certainly.

3299. Again, there has been an increase, has there not, of towns trenching upon agricultural land, which has tended to increase the value?—That has tended to some extent, but I should dismiss it in dealing with the question very broadly.

3300. You state, do you not, that there has not been an increase in the farmers' profits upon land, or but a slight increase?—I think that the effect of competition has been to reduce rather than increase the farmers' profits, except in the particular directions which I have indicated, namely, dairy farming and grazing.

3301. The particular parish which you spoke of, I presume, is your own parish?—No, it was not my own parish; the parish that I specially referred to, in which the increase of expenditure upon the local taxation had occurred was a parish adjoining mine; but I speak of the whole of the Alderbury Union as being a perfectly fair instance, as nearly as one could arrive at.

3302. You took it as a sort of model parish?—Not a model parish, but an average parish.

3303. Do you think that we may take the result of that as pretty general?—I believe that in Wiltshire it would be a true average.

3304. The increase of expenditure is about 24 per cent., and that you say has arisen, to a certain extent, from the highways and turnpike roads being thrown upon the parish?—Upon the application of the Highway Act. It was especially a true average of this parish, because there never were any turnpikes in it; the roads were maintained entirely out of the local rates.

3305. Was there any debt in respect of those roads?—None.

3306. It had all been defrayed, had it?—There was no debt at all; the roads were simply maintained in diem de die by the rates of the parish; but they have been greatly improved.

3307. Have new roads been constructed?—No, no new roads have been constructed; it was merely the maintenance and improvement of the old roads.

3308. I do not understand that you propose to to throw anything upon the owner beyond the one-half of the increase of the average rates?—That is my proposition.

3309. You would not therefore make any alteration in the present system of representation in the administration of the poor-rates, for instance?—Not the least, except the administration of the rates that I have suggested, in cases where the ex officio guardians were not in sufficient number, the owners of land, seeing that they would be interested in the expenditure of any surplus, they should be entitled to be represented at the board of guardians.

3310. We have had recommendations to this

26 April 1870.

Committee, either that the owners should pay one-half the rates, or that the whole of the rates should be thrown upon the owners, and that in consequence of that they should be represented upon the board, or rather that the board should be composed to a greater extent of owners; would not there be a difficulty in many cases in getting a sufficient number of owners under those circumstances?—Certainly; I see great difficulties in shaping out such a thing over the area of a union.

3311. You mean from some being not resident and others being very large owners?—Yes; I should prefer that the occupiers should still have a certain interest in administering the finances of the union.

3312. You say that the owner should pay one-half of the excess over the average rates; what would you take as the average; have you contemplated any period of years for the average?—I have taken in this particular case of Britford a three years' average, and I found it on a very fair rateable value—a rateable value which I do not think, if a person were employed to assess the whole parish of Britford, would be very materially qualified. I find that the expenditure during the years 1867, 1868, and 1869 has been 2 s. 11 d. in the pound.

3313. Applying your principle to that parish, anything over 2 s. 11 d. in the pound you would propose to be divisible between the landlord and the tenant?—Quite so.

3314. That the tenant should come to the landlord and say, "I have paid over 2 s. 11 d.; you must pay me half of that excess"?—Yes.

3315. Would you apply that to existing contracts; for instance, a case in which the tenant has covenanted to pay all the rates and taxes?—No, I do not want to interfere with existing contracts. A tenancy from year to year might be open to a new arrangement. I should not deal with the question of lessees.

3316. You have spoken of your rector; the clergy, I think, are rated in the full amount of their rentcharge, less the Government taxes and the expenses of collection, are they not?—The poor rates and the repair of the chancels.

3317. But the latter does not always fall upon the clergyman; it falls upon the lord of the manor, sometimes, does it not?—If they are rectories it invariably falls upon the clergymen; those are the deductions allowed, and in some particular cases there is a deduction made for curates when the population is excessive.

3318. Does not that fall with some hardship upon the clergy; do not you get really, for the purposes of rating, more at their actual income than you do with respect to other classes?—Yes, as to the question of income; as to the question of rateable property, you must separate the income from the rateable property.

3319. You get closer to them, and you hit them rather harder, do you not?—No, I think not.

3320. Do you think that the landowner could not stand on exactly the same footing as that?—I have to assume always that the tithe rentcharge is rateable. I think that the system of rating is perfectly fair.

3321. Do you not think that the clergyman suffers?—I do not think that he does; he has property, and we know the actual sum which he receives; this is his rent, which is taken so frequently as the test of value, in arriving at the rateable value.

3322. But you make a more considerable reduction from the rent, do you not?—We make a reduction of 10 per cent., which I am quite satisfied in the broad average is not at all more than is required.

3323. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Supposing an Act of of Parliament were passed which divided the rate, in equal halves between owner and occupier, would you state to the Committee, as no doubt you have considered the subject, what should exactly be the constitution of the board; and, first of all, taking the board of guardians as the administrators of the money which is raised for the relief of the poor, will you tell us in what way you think the board of guardians should be constituted, taking your own union as an example?—I have not thought the subject out very carefully; but the principle which would seem to me to be fair in the rearrangement of the board of guardians would be this, that the magistrates, quoad magistrates, should be ex officio guardians, and that a certain further number of owners of land who are not magistrates should be elected by the owners of land to represent them at the board of guardians.

3324. But if the two interests are exactly equal, if the rate is divided between the owner and the occupier, as a matter of inference I presume you would like the representation to be equal also?—As nearly as may be.

3325. Could not that be obtained by the representative body, in each case, electing an equal number of members of the board?—Theoretically the proposition would be quite right, but I doubt, in practice, whether it would work; I do not think that you would readily obtain the same number of ex officio guardians for current attendance as you would of the ordinary guardians that are elected now.

3326. But I presume that if any such scheme was carried out, the ex officio guardians as such would disappear, and the owners of property would elect half the board, and the occupiers of property would elect the other half?—In the event of the disappearance of the ex officio guardians, the scheme which you suggest would work equally fairly, I think.

3327. Do you see any obstacle in the way of its working in practice; take a case where the land in the union is in the hands of a small number of landowners?—It is precisely that case which I am contemplating now—the case of the Alderbury Union; I do not think that we could get there a sufficient number of representatives of owners.

3328. But you suggested lately, in answer to a question, that the owners might nominate representatives?—Yes, but I should be unwilling to dismiss the magistrates from being ex officio guardians, because in my own knowledge there are several most excellent ex officio guardians who are men without any landed property at all.

3329. But it would be competent for the owners of property to elect those ex officios to represent them at the board?—They might be there, and they might not be there; they might not be elected, possibly.

3330. But supposing they were elected, they would be competent members of the board, and adequate to represent the interests of the owners?—Yes, certainly.

3331. Is that the only difficulty that you would see in the way?—I have not thought the matter out; out; but it obtrudes itself on my mind as what naturally should be.

3332. The same consideration of property would influence your judgment with regard to the composition of the highway board as of the board of guardians?—Yes.

3333. Is the present composition waywardens elected by the parish and ex officio waywardens?—Yes; there has been one peculiar feature in the conduct of the highway board, and it is because, so to speak, it enters peculiarly within the scope of the operations of the tenant farmers; the chairman, instead of being elected as a man of position, as a landowner, or other person of mark in the neighbourhood, is selected simply from amongst the occupying farmers; it is rather a new feature, certainly.

3334. To what do you ascribe the difference in the proceedings of the two boards?—I think that the occupiers in the constitution of the highway board, the waywardens, have felt most distinctly that they were bound to keep the control of the thing entirely in their own hands.

3335. But the highway board is composed, is it not, on the same principle as boards of guardians?—It is; but in the case of boards of guardians the person of the highest position, and who has ample leisure, is usually selected chairman of the board, whereas in the case of a highway board it is quite the reverse. I do not know a single instance in which a magistrate has been elected chairman of a highway board.

3336. Can you give no other reason beyond what you have just stated, that they are desirous of keeping the management in their own hands?—Yes, I think so; they felt that there was a probable increase of expenditure likely to be incurred in the district, and those who really paid it directly desired to keep the expenditure under their own control.

3337. Then, according to your experience, it appears that the ratepayers are more afraid of gentlemen, so to speak, spending money in keeping the roads good, than of their spending money improperly in the administration of the poor law?—Yes; it comes upon them more absolutely, more directly.

3338. Supposing the rate to be halved between them, do you think that would make any difference in their feeling?—I think it would.

3339. With regard to the quarter sessions and the administration of the county funds, do the same observations apply as you have made with regard to the poor rates?—I think not with the same force. The county expenditure is much larger than the expenditure for highway purposes and kindred purposes of that kind, and I think as I have said before, the county financial boards have been wonderfully well managed; they have certainly in those counties with which I am acquainted, at least there has been no grave cause of complaint.

3340. It is the quarter sessions who administer the county rate now?—Yes.

3341. In the agitation which has taken place upon the subject of county boards, it has always been assumed that the ratepayers were to continue to pay the rates?—Quite so.

3342. There was no question of a division between the ratepayer and the owner?—No; indeed the only justification for the agitation was that the ratepayers paying the rates should have a voice in the administration.

3343. Supposing the rate were divided amongst the two, speaking of county funds as distinguished from poor law and highways, do you see any objection to an equal number being elected to represent at the board, and do you think that you would have difficulty in finding an adequate number to represent the landlord's interest?—I do not think that I should give an equal number of occupiers to the magistrates in the administration of the county funds, because I think that the interests of the owners are larger than the interests of the occupiers, and they ought to be proportionately more largely represented.

3344. But if the rate is equally divided would you be of that opinion?—Yes; but still I can conceive a county board taking a larger and broader view of the course to be taken with regard to any special purposes, whether of justice, police, or sanitary purposes, than would be taken by the occupiers, and although it would be quite true that the expenditure would be divided between the ratepayers and the landowners in that case, yet I think that the landowners, as having the fee-simple, as it were in them, and the occupiers having only a limited interest, it would be fair and reasonable that the landowners should have a larger power in the determination or the adoption, or otherwise, of those questions than the occupiers.

3345. Then you would give them a preponderating power in the composition of the board?—Yes, I should.

3346. Have you considered at all in what proportion?—No; I have not considered the proportion at all.

3347. You said in answer to the honourable Member for Devonshire, that you had been lately into Devonshire; did you happen to cross the Tamar and go into the county of Cornwall?—I frequently do cross the Tamar.

3348. Have you been engaged in your business on the other side of the Tamar?—Yes.

3349. Have you come to the same conclusion with regard to the increased value of land there that you have elsewhere?—Land in the vicinity of the mouth of the Tamar certainly has increased very considerably in value of late years.

3350. But speaking of the county of Cornwall generally, the west as well as the east, are you able to tell the Committee anything with regard to that, in the same manner as you have with regard to Devonshire?—We have the management of an estate in Cornwall, and certainly we have very old tenants there, and we might get an increased rent if anything were to arise to disturb the arrangements between the existing tenants and the landlord.

3351. Mr. Gregory.] Have you ever considered whether any greater simplification could be introduced into the mode of collecting local rates, with a view to saving expense?—No, I think I answered the honourable gentleman opposite with reference to that, that it might be moderately simplified, but I did not think with any great advantage.

3352. I am speaking now of the highway rate, the poor rate, and the county rate?—Practically, the collection is now wonderfully simple, because the assessment is made entirely from the poor rate, through the overseer; every payment for those local taxations is made through the overseer.

3353. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you find generally that there is a growing dissatisfaction at the increased and increasing amount of local rates?—Yes, most distinctly there is.

26 April 1870.

3355. But the same amount would have to be paid; therefore there would be no real diminution, although there might be an imaginary one?—In the suggestions which I have ventured to make to the Committee the burthen would apparently be divided, and it would be divided as far as existing interests are concerned.

3356. But you would be shifting the burthen when the time came for re-arranging the rent?—The land ultimately must bear it all.

3357. In Wiltshire there are a great number of small freeholders, are there not?—Yes, in the northern part of the county, but not in the southern part.

3358. To what extent would those freeholders be benefited by this alteration of dividing the rates between the owner or the occupier?—They would get no relief whatever.

3359. Do you not think that the freeholders, the yeomen in this county, are a very valuable body?—Yes, they are very valuable indeed.

3360. Chairman.] Generally you mean that the plan which you suggest would be a relief to the ratepayers would remove the grievance from the ratepayers, but that it would become eventually a landlord's grievance?—Ultimately it would become a landlord's grievance.

Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow, called in; and Examined.

Sir S. H. Waterlow.

3361. Chairman.] You are Chairman of the Improved Industrial Dwellings Company, are you not?—Yes, I am.

3362. And of the Highgate Improved Industrial Dwellings Company?—Yes.

3363. Are you also chairman of the committee having charge of the industrial dwellings erected by the Corporation of London?—I am.

3364. Before you took part in those companies did not you yourself erect a certain number of tenements as dwellings for the working classes?—I did.

3365. How many tenements do those various buildings in which you have been interested comprise?—We have now 1,117 in occupation in 10 parishes in the metropolis.

3366. I presume that in erecting those dwellings the question of local taxation has come across you in a very serious manner?—It was of course a matter of the greatest importance.

3367. Do the rates vary much in the 10 parishes in which the dwellings in question are situated?—They do not vary materially, because it is only in the poorer parishes, in those parishes where the poorer classes as a rule reside, that the dwellings have been erected.

3368. Could you name the parishes in which the dwellings are situated?—There are the largest number in St. Pancras; the rest are in St. Leonard's, Shoreditch; St. Luke's, Islington; St. James', Clerkenwell; St. John's, Wapping; St. Saviour's, Southwark; and St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green.

3369. Are the rates lightest in the parish of Islington?—Not in proportion to the gross rent; they are lightest in proportion to the gross rent in the parish of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch; but that may be an accident in the assessment.

3370. Are those properties mostly freehold, or do you pay a groundrent for them?—They are nearly all leasehold.

3371. Can you state to the committee the amount of groundrent that you pay in the various localities, as compared with the local taxation; could you give, on the one hand the groundrent, and on the other the total of what you pay in rates?—In St. John's, Wapping, we pay 92 l. 12 s. 6 d. a year parochial rates, and 90 l. a year groundrent; in St. Saviour's, Southwark, we pay 35 l. a year groundrent, and 38 l. 6 s. 5 d. parochial rates; I may say that those rates are for the last year; in the first lot in St. Pancras we pay 60 l. a year groundrent, and 199 l. 7 s. 7 d. parochial rates this arises from the fact that there are a larger number of dwellings than usual on the same space of ground, the buildings being more lofty; in St. Luke's, Islington, we pay 70 l. a year groundrent, and 167 l. 10 s. parochial rates.

3372. Are the houses the same height as in St. Pancras?—About the same height, but they are not so closely packed. In the second lot in St. Pancras we pay 160 l. a year groundrent, and 330 l. 3 s. 10 d. parochial rates; the most recently erected are in Shoreditch, and there we pay 260 l. a year groundrent, and 279 l. 9 s. parochial rates. Taking the average of the dwellings in those nine parishes, containing 819 tenements, the per-centage of local rates upon the gross rent is 13·8.

3373. In three of the cases that you have mentioned, in St. John's, Wapping; St. Saviour's, Southwark; and St. Leonard's, Shoreditch; the rates are equal to the groundrent?—Yes.

3374. If therefore the theory held good that the rates were paid by the landlord of the ground, they would absorb the whole?—Precisely so.

3375. You would therefore, I presume, not be able to admit that in those cases the rates are paid by the owners of the land?—Confining myself strictly to those properties as illustrations, I consider that the occupier undoubtedly pays the rates.

3376. And you would assign as a proof of that, the larger amount of the rates in proportion to the groundrent?—Yes; and I may say as a fact, that as manufacturers of houses, we should not have erected them at all, if we had not expected that those who were going to occupy them, would pay all the charges.

3377. But the point is continually urged, and with some force in most cases, that the owner of land which is rated heavily, would get less groundrent than the owner of land which is lightly rated, and therefore the excess of rates would come from the pocket of the owner of the land, how far would you subscribe to that doctrine as regards the poorer parts of the metropolis?—I do not know whether I gather the question rightly, as to whether, I think, in reference to this class of property, a landlord in a parish where the rates are high, has got less groundrent than he would have done if the rates were low.

3378. That

3378. That is my question?—There is no doubt that when a building lease is taken, the landlord does get less ground rent if the rates are very high.

3379. Within a given number of years you have taken all those plots of ground?—Yes, those properties have been erected within the last six years.

3380. What I mean really is this: supposing that in St. Saviour's, Southwark, for instance, you would have no rates at all to pay, would the landlord have got 70*l.* instead of 35*l.* from you?—If he had got the 70*l.* we should probably not have erected more than the 22 dwellings which we have erected in the parish; but if we had not had to pay any poor rates at all, the speculation would have been so profitable that we should have been tempted probably to have erected a much larger number, and in that way the rent would have been reduced, and the rates would have been saved to the occupiers.

3381. Do you mean to say that you would have erected a larger number of dwellings upon the same ground?—No, we should have taken more ground, because it would have been a more profitable operation.

3382. Then, as you would have taken more land, would not there have been increased competition for land, which would have enabled the owners to ask for a certain advance in the price?—Yes.

3383. So that you would have paid rather more rent on the one hand, and you would have derived a little more profit on the other?—That is to say, the occupier would have derived a little advantage, and the landlord would have derived a little advantage, till the supply of houses locally situated met the demand.

3384. Therefore you would hold this: that even in those portions of the metropolis a certain amount of rates does fall upon the owner of the land, but that a portion of it falls upon the houses, and therefore upon the consumer of houses, namely, the occupier?—At the time when a building lease is granted, no doubt the amount paid as rent is influenced by the amount of taxes in that particular parish.

3385. As a matter of fact in the various buildings in which you are interested, and in what you have done yourself in building houses, does the fact of heavy taxation enter largely into your calculations?—In every case it has been my practice to calculate what are the outgoings, the outlay, and the probable rent which could be obtained, and then to determine whether the investment was a wise one or not.

3386. And the same consideration applies when you consider what ground rent you will pay?—Undoubtedly; if the rates were very low, and likely to remain so, we should be tempted to give a better ground rent than if they were very high, and likely to increase.

3387. So that you cannot say that the whole of the rates fall upon the occupier, because you would have given a certain amount additional to the ground landlord if the rates were low?—Undoubtedly; but looking at the fact that our building leases are never for less than 80 years, the whole of the increase during that 80 years must come out of the pocket of the occupier.

3388. Of course no one would build upon a short lease?—No.

3389. Therefore when you enter into a speculation, in the first place you consider necessarily the ground rent and what the rates actually are, and what the prospects are, and if the rate increased much more rapidly afterwards it would come out of your pocket?—Yes.

3390. Supposing it came out of your pocket, would you charge the occupier a higher rent?—That would depend upon circumstances. If by charging a higher rent the demand would be lessened, and there would be a number of empties, of course we should not charge a higher rent.

3391. It would either come out of your pocket or out of the pocket of the occupier?—Yes.

3392. If it came out of your pocket, it would influence you in building further houses, would it not?—Undoubtedly, if the rates generally in those parishes were so much raised that no dividend was left for the shareholders, we should not be able to get any more capital to increase the supply of the article, and therefore those who occupy the houses must either be satisfied with a smaller number of rooms for the same price, or they must pay a higher rent.

3393. Do you find, practically, that the position of the poor occupiers of your tenements is this, that where they can only afford to give a certain sum to you, if you are obliged to charge, in consequence of the heavy taxation, a larger price, they will take a worse tenement than they had before?—We find, as a rule, and the figures show that the calculation is correct, that this class of people spend about one-fifth of their income in rent, whether they are earning 15*s.* a week or 35*s.* a week; and if that fifth will not produce three rooms they must be satisfied with two rooms; or, two rooms, they must be satisfied with one.

3394. Has there been, within your experience, during the last six or eight years, an increase or decrease in the rents paid by the industrial population?—I have made no change in seven years, in the parish of Shoreditch, in the 80 tenements erected there in 1863.

3395. Have the rates meanwhile increased very much?—The rates have increased, but not very largely, except just during a temporary interregnum recently, when Parliament threw the rates upon the occupier; there were six or nine months during which there was a different method of collection.

3396. Were the rents advanced when the rate was put upon the owner?—We made no change, expecting that the alteration would only be temporary, as it has turned out to be.

3397. Otherwise you would have increased your rents?—We must either have increased our rents, or stopped our operations.

3398. Do you find that during the time in which you have been at work, the value of land has been increasing, and the difficulty of procuring sites at a reasonable ground rent has been increasing also?—Not on the average; in some parishes it has been so.

3399. Is the value of land decreasing in any parish?—I will take an illustration as an evidence of decrease in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had the Finsbury estate fall in, and they asked very high rents in the beginning, but they have been obliged to take much lower rents since as ground rents.

3400. Sir James Lawrence.] Are you aware that the original price asked was very much larger than that of a similar class of property in the neighbourhood?—I believe it was; therefore, on the average, I do not think there is more difficulty in obtaining sites than there was six years ago.

Sir S. H. Waterlow.

26 April 1870.

3401. Chairman.] Do you think that the heavy taxation is lowering the value of land, taking the last 10 years?—My impression is that the value of land generally has rather increased.

3402. I mean in those parts of the metropolis where you are operating?—I am only speaking with reference to a particular class of sites, such as are suitable for this class of tenements.

3403. I understand you to say that the difficulty of getting sites was rather one of open space than of rent?—No, I thought I stated that, taking all the parishes together, I did not think that there was any material alteration; but I quoted an instance where there had been a difficulty.

3404. There are three parties out of whose pockets the increase in local taxation might have come, that is to say, out of the pocket of the landlord, the owner of the land, out of your pocket, that is to say, of the companies who have built those houses, and thirdly, out of the pockets of the occupiers of the tenements; who do you think has borne the increase in the local burthens, as far as your experience goes?—The increase, after the buildings are erected, necessarily comes out of the pocket of the occupier.

3405. I understood you that if you had not raised you rents, in the case you referred to, it would have come out of the pockets of your shareholders?—Yes; but we should have raised the rent if we thought that the increase was to be permanent. We did not wish to disturb the relations when we thought it was simply a temporary matter.

3406. Do you think you could get more rent if you were to try?—As the demand increased, and as the population increased, we should ultimately get more rent; and if the operation of manufacturing houses continued profitable, we should go on, and then the increased supply would be equal to the increased demand.

3407. When you come to an increased supply of houses, the question arises, whether, in getting the new sites, you might not be able to get them so much cheaper on account of the increased taxation, and in that case it must come out of the pockets of the owners; but I understand you to say that it must eventually come out of the pockets of the occupiers, because you would stop building if you had to pay so much more in rates?—If any portion of the land of the company suitable for the erection of a house is not likely to be of advantage to the occupiers, we should very naturally leave off erecting houses.

3408. But you would not leave off producing if, in case there were such production, you could pay a cheaper ground rent in proportion to the increase of local taxation?—Certainly not, if the increase of local taxation was made up by a decrease in the rent charged for the land, then we who stand in the relation of the occupier would generally go on with our operations.

3409. Assuming that the local taxation increased, you say that either the occupier must pay you more rent, or you would stop building?—Yes; or we must get the land at a cheaper rate.

3410. Would not that last alternative be the most likely of the three?—My impression is the contrary, because as the population increases the demand increases, and then that always increases the value of land.

3411. Then do you mean this, that the increased taxation is likely to be thrown off by the party who is strongest in negotiating, or to the party who is weakest; for instance, that if land in a certain neighbourhood is rising in value, it is more likely that the increase would have to be paid by the occupier than by the owner of the land?—My impression is that it would have to be paid by the occupier. I would put this case, supposing there were no local rates at all, our company last year having earned only 5,452 l. net, would have had in addition 1,704 l., the amount paid for local rates, and the profit would have been so large that we should have been tempted immediately to increase the supply, until the increased supply had brought down the price to a sum yielding only an ordinary profit.

3412. The next result would be that you would be stimulated to go on, and you would look for new sites, and the landlord knowing that you could afford to give so much more, because you had got more than the average rate of profit, would be able to get a higher price for his ground rent, and thereby absorb a portion of your 1,700 l.?—Yes, he would absorb a portion.

3413. And the remaining portion might go into the pocket of the occupier?—Undoubtedly; but looking at the fact that contracts for building leases are made for such very long terms, it seems to me that all changes in local taxation must fall upon the occupier, because the contract with the landlord is a settled and fixed quantity.

3414. But you assume that you would be encouraged or discouraged from further building, and you could not build without going to new ground landlords?—Quite so. As regards new building, the landlord must get a portion of any saving in the rates.

3415. And your profit might go into your own pockets, and not into the pockets of the occupiers of the tenements, until you came to the new building?—Quite so.

3416. Therefore, the position is this, that so long as you do not build new houses, the remission of local taxation would come to your aid?—Yes, unless other people built, and the increased supply reduced the rents.

3417. Whereas the landlords would advance their terms for the ground rent for new sites, and then immediately a portion of your profits would at once go into the pocket of the landlord as well as into that of the occupier?—Undoubtedly it would; but I think it is impossible that the owner of small houses could retain for any length of time the whole of any reduction in the local taxation, because if the trade was so profitable, some one or other would necessarily increase the supply of the article.

3418. But then no one can increase the supply of the article without going to the ground landlord?—Quite so.

3419. The proportion of the ground rent to your gross rent would depend very much upon the height of your buildings?—Yes. In the last case which I instanced we have seven storeys; where you have the figures 260 l. ground rent, and 279 l. local taxation.

3420. Then any increase in the ground rent would be likely to make you crowd more tenements in a given space than you would otherwise do?—We should erect a larger number of floors, and build higher tenements.

3421. Then,

3421. Then, in fact, the heavy taxation of and in the eastern end of the metropolis, tends, to a certain extent, in your opinion, to crowding a great many persons upon the same spot?—Where the local taxation and the ground rent together are very large sums, in order to recoup ourselves, we are obliged to build a great many floors.

3422. Sir James Lawrence.] With regard to St. Leonard's, Shoreditch; is it not a fact that the 260 l. which you mentioned was something more than the ground rent; were there not small dwellings on that land, which accounted for the high price?—I forget how many there were, but probably 40 small tenements were pulled down, having a ground floor and a first floor; and 168 erected in their place, having seven storeys.

3423. Chairman.] To whom do you pay the 260 l.?—To the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

3424. Those tenements have been pulled down, I think you say?—We pulled the small houses down, and put larger ones on the site.

3425. So that you have got nothing for it except the ground?—Yes, except that, I think, the houses produced, as materials, 250 l.

3426. Mr. Pell.] But what rent did they produce before?—I should think, about 7 s. a week.

3427. How many storeys are there in the buildings in St. Saviour's, Southwark, and St. John's, Wapping?—These are in each case five storeys high.

3428. Chairman.] Have you considered the question of rating the owner instead of the occupier, with regard to this class of property?—Yes.

3429. Which do you think is the most convenient to rate, the owner or the occupier?—In this class of property the owner is rated now, because the tenements are all under 20 l. a year.

3430. When the occupiers of the tenements, during what you call the interregnum, were bound to pay the rates, did they pay them or did you make some arrangement?—We paid them invariably.

3431. Did you pay the full rate?—Yes, we paid the full rate in some cases; in other cases the parishes considered the question, and they made an allowance.

3432. In paying the full rate, whereas you had compounded before, there was considerable loss to your company, was there not?—There was a temporary loss.

3433. But considering that it was only temporary you did not disturb your general arrangements as regards rent, and you were ready to make the sacrifice?—Precisely so, because if we had disturbed the arrangements many of the people could not pay any more money than they were paying, and those who had three rooms would have gone into two rooms, and possibly the men, who had two rooms and offices, would have gone away altogether.

3434. If you had been conducting the company simply on commercial principles would you have made a change?—Certainly not in contemplation of the arrangement being simply temporary.

3435. Is it not a fact, that in a great many parts of London, there was an increase made in the rents in consequence?—I know in a great many cases where it could be obtained, an increase of rent was insisted upon.

3436. Do you think that even on purely commercial principles, without any philanthropic element entering into it, it was wiser for the owner to pay the whole rates without disturbing the rent?—We thought so in our case.

3437. In the case of tenements exclusively inhabited by the working classes, would you say that it was even in the interests of the owner of the houses to be continually shifting the rents with the variations of the local taxation?—Certainly not, because you are sure to lose a number of tenants if you attempt to raise the rent. This class of people invariably pay the maximum rent, which they can afford, out of their income, and if you require them to pay more rent they cannot do it, and therefore they are obliged to take a smaller or cheaper tenement which is inferior in quality or accommodation.

3438. Do you think that they generally do pay the maximum?—Yes; I think they do pay the maximum they can afford, namely, one-fifth of their income.

3439. So that the position of the owner of small property is this, that he knows that the working classes can only afford to give a certain rent, and, therefore, if he is obliged to put that rent up, they will leave their tenements and go into worse?—Yes; in order to test that question I obtained, as nearly as we could possibly obtain it, the earnings of the occupiers in 819 cases, and we made the average earnings to be 28 s. 8 d. a week, and the average rent 5 s. 8½ d.; and 13·8 per cent. of that is the local taxation, which makes the local taxation paid by each tenant 8¾ d. per week. I gave you the per-centage of the rates to the gross rent, taking all the parishes together as 13·8; that is to say, our gross rents last year were 12,344 l. 3 s. 8 d., and the amount of local rates was 1,704 l. 9 s.

3440. You say that they are made to pay 8¾ d. a week for local taxation; but if there had been no local rates at all, you have expressed your opinion to the Committee that the owners would have been able to get better terms for the land; it would thus not be quite fair to say that it comes out of the pocket of the occupier?—No doubt if you remove the whole of the 8¾ d. then the landlord, on making his terms for a building lease, would get a better rent, unless you had got such an increased supply of the article that the rents went down. The principle is different in the case of land, and in the case of buildings, because you cannot increase the quantity of the land, but you may increase the quantity of buildings on a given piece of land, and if you put seven storey houses instead of two, of course you get an increased quantity of the article, and then the law of supply and demand comes in and affects the rent.

3442. As a broad principle, the more that capital or business value of the land enters into the consideration, the more the occupier, who is the consumer of the article, becomes interested?—Undoubtedly.

3443. So far as houses are a manufactured article, they will follow the rules applicable to the taxation of any other commodity, but so far as they depend upon the ground rent, they will follow the rules of taxation which are peculiar to them alone?—Or rather, so far as they are in positions where you cannot increase the amount of accommodation, then it must fall upon the land.

Sir S. H. Waterlow.

26 April 1876.

3444. Then the owners of land being sometimes in the position of owning land along the frontage of a river, or in some particularly favoured spot, they may obtain, to a certain extent, immunity from taxation by the power of monopoly that they have?—Yes; if a man has an article which cannot be increased, and which cannot be got anywhere else, of course, the public who want it must pay that which it is worth.

3445. On the other hand, the owner of land cannot take away his land and apply it to any other trade. If he loses the power of selling it for houses, is not the owner of land in a worse position than the owner of any other capital, if the trade is leaving the locality?—Undoubtedly he is. He is subject to the migration of population, or to the alteration of fashion, which may make a street which was once popular, unpopular, and therefore the price goes down, but if, on the other hand, it becomes very popular, then the price goes up.

3446. Then in the case of land where the population is falling off, any increase in the burthens would have to be borne by the landlord without any escape from it?—I do not think that the landlord would be in a different position whether the locality was going down or going up; if the locality was going down, and the rates were going up, and he was about to make a contract for a building lease, he would lose by the depression of the locality, and he would also lose by any great increase in the parochial rates at the time the contract is made.

3447. But any one else who is in the position of finding a heavy tax put upon him and his investment would be able to take his capital to any other position, whereas the land being immoveable must bear the burthens put upon it?—No doubt it must, subject always to the fact that building leases are for such long terms, that the landlord gets out of the variations in the taxation for a long period by making a fixed contract.

3448. Therefore, if the land has the advantage of monopoly on the one hand, it has the disadvantage of being irremovable and inconvertible?—Yes; each person must judge for himself as to to the prospective advantages and disadvantages of his property.

3449. One of the disadvantages being that ultimately the local taxation will fall without recourse upon the owner of the land?—Yes; subject always to bearing in mind of course that very few people who make building leases speculate upon what the local taxation will be in 80 years.

3450. Sir Massey Lopes.] You are already of opinion that in the poorer class of houses which you are more conversant with, the occupier pays the whole rates?—The occupier pays the rates; the contract with the owner having been made, the occupier must after that necessarily pay the rates whatever change takes place.

3451. In stating that the occupier pays the rates, you do not mean that he pays them out of his own hand, but he pays them in the shape of increased rent?—Yes, after the houses are once erected; but, no doubt, at the time of the erection of the houses the value of the land is affected by the fact of whether the rates are very high or very low im that particular district.

3452. What I want to ascertain is, whether, in your opinion, the poor people who occupy those houses which your company are interested in, pay the rates?—In my opinion they do pay the rates; that is to say, in this sense, that if you take all the rates off next year, in the course of a few years the tenants will have the benefit of that reduction; but that would take some time, because you cannot erect a house as you can bring so much more sugar to market.

2453. Is not this question of local taxation what you would call a poor man's question; it is a question of the pecuniary interests of the poorer class of occupiers?—Undoubtedly; and I explained that just now by stating that if that section of the Reform Act which compelled the occupiers to be rated instead of the owner, and to be rated at the full value, had continued, the occupier must have paid a higher rent, to include the extra rating; they must eventually have done so, some immediately, some in a year or two, and some perhaps, not for four or five years, dependent upon circumstances.

3454. Then you would say that high rates act as a great discouragement to the erection of buildings for the lower classes?—Undoubtedly. If the rates were reduced we, as a company, should be stimulated to increase the supply of the article.

3455. If the rates were reduced it would be a great stimulus to your company to build more houses?—Yes; because although we should not save, on making new contracts, the whole of the reduction of the rate, I believe we should save a portion of it.

3456. Then the amount of the rates very much influences your company whether they should erect more houses or not?—Undoubtedly, in this way, that if we have to go to a parish where the rates are very high, we cannot afford to pay the same ground rent as if we went to a parish where the rates are low.

3457. Then low rates would very much tend to increase the comfort of the poorer classes?—Undoubtedly so, because upon all existing property the occupier would very soon get the benefit of the reduction of the rates.

3458. To that extent, increased rates would very much diminish those comforts?—The increased rates of that property must come out of the pocket of the occupiers.

3459. And therefore would diminish their comforts?—Yes, as a poor man cannot afford more than a certain portion of his income in rent, if he has to pay more rent, he must take a smaller number of rooms.

3460. If a poor man, finding that his rates are increased, is obliged to take a two-roomed house instead of a three-roomed house, of course that very much tends to crowd his family together?—Undoubtedly.

3461. And does not that crowding, in your opinion, tend very much to produce, or to increase immorality and crime?—I have a very strong opinion that the character of a man is materially influenced by the character of his home, and I think, as a rule, you will find that the best class of workmen, whether in this country or in other countries, is found where you find the best class of house accommodation.

3462. You think that the house is a very good index of the man?—The house has a material influence upon the character of the man.

3463. The

3463. The Right Honourable Chairman has been asking you about ground rents; is it your opinion that those ground rents ought justly to be rated, or why should they be exceptionally omitted from being rated?—I do not understand how they are omitted.

3464. The landlord receives a certain amount annually from you as ground rent, does he not?—Yes.

3465. Do not you think that the landlord should in justice pay the rates upon that amount; why should he be excepted?—I think he does pay the rates, because at the time the contract is made, if he was going to pay the rates, those who take the lease would pay more rent.

3466. You pay a ground rent of so much a year for the land upon which those small dwellings are situated; does he pay any rates upon that ground rent?—He does not directly.

3467. Nor indirectly?—Except that if he were to undertake to pay the rates at the time the contract was made we should of course give more money for the land.

3468. But does any ground landlord ever undertake to pay any rates?—No, not to my knowledge.

3469. Chairman.] Do you consider that he pays them indirectly by getting so much less rent?—I consider that at the time the contract is made, the calculation between the two parties is this, what will the average of the rates be; and if they are likely to be low, then the ground landlord gets a better rent than he would if they were likely to be high.

3470. Indirectly, therefore, he is paying a portion of the rates?—Indirectly he is paying a portion of the rates during the whole of the term; but, of course, after the contract is once made, then the occupier pays any variation which may arise in local taxation, and necessarily so.

3471. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is not the amount of ground rent very small as compared with the amount which you pay for local rates?—I will take the second case, 35*l.* ground rent a year, and 38*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* rates, in the parish of St. Saviour's, Southwark; that was land in the new street with nothing upon it.

3472. In that case there is almost the same amount for the local rates as for the ground rent?—Yes; one is 35*l.* and the other 38*l.*

3473. Mr. Pell.] The speculation that you are engaged in appears to be in one class, or rather in neighbourhoods of one character?—Yes; the rents vary from 4*s.* to 8*s.* a week; 4*s.* for a two-roomed tenement, which comprises the offices; and 8*s.* for a three-roomed tenement and offices of the best class.

3474. What I mean is this, that the places which you select for the operations of your company are of one character among poor people, I take it?—We invariably select sites where the working classes find it necessary to reside, and where we are likely to find customers.

3475. In your experience do you not find that where the poor reside, as you have just termed it, that is to say, where they are thick upon the land, in comparison with other classes, the rates are high?—No doubt the parishes I have given you are parishes in which the rates are as high, and higher on the average than the average of London.

3476. Therefore those would be rather the kind of places that you would select for building; you would go into places to build where the rates were practically high?—We have built in parishes where the rates are high, because those are the places where we find the people who want this character of accommodation.

3477. When you get into such a place and you are proceeding to build, you have two opposing elements against you before you commence building; one the landlord, who is going to let you the land and who will create a charge upon your building, and the other the amount of taxation, which is invariably a large one when you begin; and, if I understand you, you escape the one, that is, the ground landlord, by taking to the air, in fact, you ascend as a flying fish?—In this way—we calculate 30*s.* a year is about the average which each tenant can pay for ground rent, and if that cannot be covered by five floors, we must cover it by seven floors; that is how we divide the ground rent.

3478. With regard to the other opposing element, namely, taxation, you escape that, I understand, by laying it upon the tenement?—We do not escape it.

3479. I mean that you escape it at a serious reduction of your profit?—Whenever we have to pay a higher ground rent than the local taxes, and if we did not get it back from the tenant we could not go on.

3480. You have one way of dealing with your ground rent, you build more floors, but the more floors you build the more is your local taxation?—Yes.

3481. And you have only one way of meeting that, and that is the way which I understood you to tell the Honourable Member just now by charging the tenant with it, of course considering, in the first instance, whether he can pay it?—Yes, by making it a portion of the rent for the room.

3482. That forms a very large proportion, as I make it, viz., 14*l.* 17*s.* for rent, of which 1*l.* 18*s.* is for taxes?—I do not think I gave those figures.

3483. Five shillings and eightpence halfpenny was the rent weekly, and 8¾*d.* of that you would have to pay for taxation?—Yes, those figures I have given to the Committee.

3484. I think that is as nearly as possible 1*l.* 18*s.* for taxes, leaving you 12*l.* 15*s.* for rent, making the whole charge upon the tenant, 14*l.* 17*s.*?—I gave the gross per-centage 13·8 as as the proportion, which is probably the same thing.

3485. With regard to the ground rent, having yourself just recently signed those ground leases, should you think it a fair proposal, or assent to it in honesty, that the ground landlord should have, by Act of Parliament, a portion of the local taxation imposed upon him?—I should think it was very unfair if any such arrangement were made that did not except existing contracts.

3486. Is it not one of the conditions of the lease expressly set forth that all local rates and taxes, whether imposed then, or hereafter imposed are to he borne by the tenant?—Yes.

3487. And you would not lightly set aside such a condition?—I should think it most unjust for any Act of Parliament to set that contract on one side, because I, as a builder, have taken the chances of legislation in reference to local taxes, whereas the landlord has made a bargain that he shall not in any way be affected, that is to say his income out of the property shall be a fixed definite sum for 80 years, and I think anything which possibly interfered with that contract so as to put a part of the charge off me and put it on to him would be unjust and unfair.

Sir S. H. Waterlow.

26 April 1870.

3488. Is it not possible that the building may be a direct means of increasing the taxation, that is to say, if the ground remained naked land you would have none of that taxation, but the fact of building and bringing a population, perhaps of poor people, on to that ground is followed by considerably increased taxation?—No doubt the parochial rates rise very much as you increase the number of persons inhabiting a given area. If you take the case of bare land, and you assume it to be covered, of course the local authorities must provide drains, roads, and lighting, and all that of course increases the taxation, but at the same time it increases the accommodation.

3489. Colonel Brise.] Speaking of the cases in which you are interested, I think you said that the earnings of a man were 28 s. 8 d. a week, rental 5 s. 8 ½ d., and local taxation, 8 ¾ d.?—Eight pence three farthings is the proportion of the 5 s. 8 ½ d. which the occupier pays.

3490. If there was no local taxation the occupier would only pay 5 s.?—He would do so eventually; for a time probably the owner of the houses might seek to put the difference into his pocket; but as that would make the houses a very profitable speculation, there would be an increased supply of the article, and the price would go down.

3491. However, if there is any increase or decrease in the 8 ¾ d., do you make any alteration in the rent of those houses?—If it was to be material and likely to be permanent, then we should endeavour to make an alteration; but if it was merely temporary and arising from local causes, we should not disturb the arrangement by altering the rent.

3492. Did I rightly understand you to say that the owner of house property is more interested in local taxation than the owner of land?—I think I said that the occupier of house property was more interested in local taxation than the owner of land; and necessarily so, because the owner of the land has made a definite contract by which his interest cannot be affected by alterations in the local taxation.

3493. Sir James Lawrence.] A question was asked you as to the groundrent with reference to the possibility of such buildings not being erected on a given site; but is not the price obtained for building land five times as much as if it were land not intended for building purposes?—No doubt land intended for building purposes fetches a much higher price than land not intended for building purposes.

3494. You mentioned that the price obtained for your tenements has averaged 5 s. 8 ½ d. I suppose they would not be suitable at all for the lower class of workpeople at all; that is to say, labourers and persons of that class?—The incomes average 28 s. 8 d., varying probably from 1 l. a week up to six or seven or eight and thirty shillings.

3495. For example, a policeman in the City of London would not be able to occupy your rooms?—Not unless he sublet one of the rooms; he could not occupy this number for his own use, only by sub-letting one room.

3496. He could not afford to pay the rent?—No; only that persons in that case generally take a three roomed tenement, and let one room to a single man, and that reduces their rent to a sum which they can afford to pay. We do not provide single-roomed tenements, except in that way.

3497. Do I understand you rightly, that if the local rates were very much reduced the rent would be equally reduced?—Undoubtedly, in all those buildings.

3498. Mr. Seely.] On whom would this rate fall; I suppose it makes no matter to you whether you pay 300 l. a-year for ground-rent and 300 l. for rent, or 400 l. for rates and 200 l. for ground-rent?—None whatever.

3499. Supposing that in a district you were paying 300 l. a year rates and 300 l. rent, and those rates were to increase to 400 l. a year, and you were going to erect more buildings, you would then be only able to offer 200 l. a year for groundrent, and you would be only able to take a piece of ground at 200 l. a year groundrent instead of 300 l.?—Quite so.

3500. And as no one else would be able to offer more for it, that would be the value of the groundrent; that is, what the ground landlord would get?—Assuming that he were offering the market price, that would be so.

3501. In the same way, if the rates had fallen to 200 l., then you would be obliged to pay 400 l. a year groundrent, because it would pay either you or some one else to build houses, and to pay 400 l.?—Yes; and that is why I answered the question as to whether the owner or the occupier paid the rates in this form, that at the time when the contract was made any heavy local taxation comes out of the pocket of the owner; but, inasmuch as building contracts are made for a very long period of years, during the whole of that period any increase must come out of the pocket of the occupier.

3502. The interest that satisfies you at any particular time for those houses is fixed, is it not?—Yes; we started with the principle that five per cent. was a proper return.

3503. And the rent which the occupier can pay is also fixed, and it answers a man's purpose to give so much money for such a house?—I think you may take it as a rule that the working classes cannot afford to pay more than one-fifth of their income in rent, and I think that will apply whether you take a costermonger at 15 s. a week, who pays his 3 s.; or whether you take a man at 35 s. a week, who pays his 7 s.

3504. Therefore the only amount which is uncertain is the ground rent?—The ground rent is a certain quantity directly the contract is signed.

3505. I am speaking of the period before the contract is signed?—Before the contract is signed, of course the ground rent has to be fixed; but the local taxation, which is one element of the expense, may materially vary during the whole course of the lease.

3506. When you were going to build a new house these elements are fixed—the rent which the occupier can pay, the interest that will satisfy you, and the local burthens?—Yes.

3507. The only element which is uncertain is the ground rent; therefore on the ground rent falls the whole of those local burthens?—That is, if there were no local burthens at all, a portion of the sum which I estimated might have to be paid during the term of the lease in the form of local burthens would be added to the ground rent.

3508. Because either you, or some other company, pany, to whom it would pay to erect houses getting a certain amount of interest, would give that amount of ground rent?—They would give that sum either in ground rent, or in local taxation.

3509. But the other elements are fixed; the interest is fixed; the rent which the occupier can pay is fixed, and the local rates are fixed; the only element which is not fixed is the ground rent?—At the time of making the contract it is so.

3510. As soon as the contract is made the owner of the houses and of the ground rent are one and the same; he is then the owner of fixed property in the same way as the ground landlord was?—As soon as the contract is made the local taxation immediately shifts on to the occupier, and he takes the risk of variation.

3511. Mr. St. Aubyn.] With regard to adding storeys to your houses, do the Committee understand you to say that you added storeys ad libitum whenever it suited you?—We vary the height of the buildings from two storeys to seven storeys, according to the amount of the ground rent, in order to bring the ground rent as near as possible to 30*s.* per tenement per annum.

3512. After you have entered into a contract with the ground landlord, do you, if it suits you, add to the storeys of the houses?—Before we make any contract, we calculate whether we can put so many tenements upon the land as will bring the ground rent to 30*s.* per tenement per annum. If we cannot, we should then consider the ground rent too high, and we must abandon the contract.

3513. That is to say, you would determine the height of your houses and the number of storeys before you made the contract with the ground landlord; you do not add storeys to the houses after you have made the contract?—No; at the time we are negociating we determine whether we can put as many tenements as will cover the ground rent.

3514. That is before the contract is signed?—Yes.

3515. Mr. Pell.] I suppose it really comes to this, that the amount of the ground rent with reference to the space which you get for that ground rent, depends very much upon the crowded state of the neighbourhood; the amount of land that there is in the neighbourhood, the demand that there is for dwellings, and the competition that there is to build upon the land?—The amount of the ground rent is modified, no doubt, to a great extent by the demand which there is for houses in that particular locality. As an illustration, if in a particular neighbourhood it is very convenient for workmen to reside, they are willing to pay a trifle more per week than if they had to live further off. As an illustration, I will put it in this way; a woman was engaging a tenement, and we said to her, "Well, but this is 6*d.* a week more than you are paying, how can you manage it?" "Well," she said, "my husband will be going out to his work and coming home to his meals, and therefore it is worth 6*d.* a week more to me," and therefore in a neighbourhood where men are closer to their work, their wives will pay more per room than they will do when they are a long distance from their work.

3516. It is obvious that you could not go on raising storeys upon storeys till you got it to such aheight that it was inconvenient for the tenants to mount to it, unless there was a great demand, and unless you graduated your rents the higher you got?—There is obviously a limit in height both as affecting the cost of construction and the question of convenience to the tenants.

3517. Therefore it is only in districts where there is a great demand for houses that you are able to build those flats one above the other, and the landlord is able at the same time to get a high ground rent; it is not from any design in the office of your company that this is carried out, but it is in obedience to the conditions under which you build?—Undoubtedly.

3518. Chairman.] You divide the ground rent over a large number of tenements?—Yes; if the ground rent is very high we divide it over a large number of tenements, but then we could not do that except in localities where there is such a demand for tenements; otherwise they do not take the trouble of going up so many flights of stairs.

3519. But the ground landlord has no control over you whatever, as regards the number of storeys; he does not ask you, in fact, about the number?—No.

3520. Mr. Pell.] Only the Metropolitan Board of Works have anything to say to that?—Yes.

3521. Sir Massey Lopes.] That is an arrangement by your company, in order that the ground rent per tenement, shall in no case exceed 30*s.*?—Yes, exactly. As a rule, the landlord does not object to the increased value of the property on the ground; of course, the more you put on it the better for him.

3522. Mr. Pell.] Are you limited as to your method of building by the Metropolis Building Act?—Yes; every one is subject to the Metropolis Building Act.

3523. Mr. Seely.] Does not it cost more per house the higher you go, to build seven houses one on the top of another, than it does to build them only five storeys high?—The variation between seven and five is comparatively nothing, but the variation between seven and two in the price of a room is worth consideration; it costs a trifle more to build them per room, but not very considerably more.

3524. Chairman.] Did I rightly understand you to say, in answer to an Honourable Member, that the tenant paid the whole rate?—I should like to be understood upon that. My opinion is this: that at the time the contract is made with the owner of the ground, and before the building lease is executed, the price of the ground is affected by the amount of local taxation; but inasmuch as building leases are for such a very long term, my impression is, that the increase which has been going on for the last 20 years in local taxation has come, as a rule, out of the pockets of the occupiers of this particular class of tenements and that perhaps may be best illustrated by the fact that during that period there has been such a very large increase in the price per room of this class of tenement.

3525. In fact, it is not the whole 8*d.* a week, but it is so much of the 8*d.* a week as represents the increase since the original contract with the ground landlord was made?—Yes.

3526. The 8*d.* may be divided into two parts, and a portion of it is paid indirectly by the owner of the ground rent, because he would have got so much more rent if there had not been that taxation?—Yes.

3527. But the increase which has sprung up since that contract is paid by the occupier?—Yes.

Sir S. H. Waterlow.

26 April 1870.

3528. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is it your opinion that the ground rent amounts generally throughout the metropolis to the same sum as the local rates?—No, certainly not; and I will explain why it does not.

3529. Surely the ground rent does not amount to the same sum, as a general rule, as the local rates?-- No, for this reason, that in our case we put so very much more property upon a given space of ground, I mean so many more rooms, than are to be found in ordinary cases, and so the amount of the assessment is governed by the number of rooms, and the rent which they fetch; of course we get a larger assessment upon a given quantity of land, than is ordinarily to be found, especially in the case of houses occupied by this class.

3530. Chairman.] That means to say that, generally speaking, your local taxation is higher as compared with the ground rent than it would be if they were simply poor cottages?—Undoubtedly.

3531. The poor cottages, or whatever they were, would pay the same ground rent as you would?—They would pay the same ground rent and local rates according to their net annual value.

3532. Houses covering a certain space, if they were miserable houses scarcely two storeys high, and if they were very bad tenements, would not be assessed at the same amount as your lofty tenements for which you get high rents?--That is to say, the same space of ground would not produce to the parish the same assessment in the one case as it would in the other.

3533. Your assessment would be higher?—Yes; because there are so many more rooms on the same space of ground.

3535. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is not it, in your opinion, very exceptional for the ground rent to be so very high as that in proportion to the rates?—I take a more recent example, which is not subject to exceptional circumstances at all, and that is the case of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, where the ground rent is 260*l.* and the local rates are 279*l.* That is a very recent contract, and a very recent assessment.

3536. Chairman.] And Shoreditch being a high rated parish?—Rather.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. CHARLES GREY GREY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. C. G. Grey. 29 April 1870.

3537. Chairman.] ARE you acquainted with farming, both in England and Ireland?—Yes.

3538. Do you yourself farm land in both countries?—Yes, I do.

3539. In what part of England?—In Northumberland.

3540. And you have also had experience as a land agent, have you not?—Yes, very largely in both countries.

3541. Especially in the north of England?—In Northumberland mostly, in England, and in Limerick and Tipperary and other counties in Ireland.

3542. Have you given your attention to the subject of local taxation?—Yes, a great deal, for the last 20 years, in both countries.

3543. Therefore you are well acquainted with the differences between the two countries, with respect to local taxation?—Yes, pretty well.

3544. In Ireland the poor rates are divided, are they not, between the owner and the occupier above a certain line?—Yes, above 4 l.

3545. Below 4 l., what is the rule?—In that case the rate is paid by the owner.

3546. And the rate above the 4 l. line is collected from the tenant, who deducts it from his rent?—Yes.

3547. Does that apply to towns as well as to the country?—Yes, I think it does. I have not had to do with any large towns; but in the small country towns it certainly does.

3548. Are you aware whether the owners usually make bargains with their tenants to deduct the taxes?—I have heard of its being done, but I do not know an instance of it myself.

3549. We have had evidence given us here, that in farms in Ireland, the usual custom is that the tenant deducts half?—Yes, it is the almost universal custom, I should think.

3550. In your opinion is the system of the division of rate in Ireland attended with advantages?—Very great, I think.

3551. Will you state those advantages to the Committee?—One of the advantages is, that it gives the owner of the land, or his representative, a much greater interest in the administration of the rates than the landowners in England, as far as my experience goes, take in the matter; I think that is the chief advantage; another is one, or rather would be in England, if we had that system, that where we have long leases and the rates vary very much during the currency of those leases, and the tenant having taken a farm on a certain ascertained average rate which he has to pay, it would be only fair that the owner of the land should share the fluctuations of the rate during the currency of the lease.

3552. Will you state to the Committee whether, as a general rule, in your opinion, the rate is paid by the owner or by the occupier?—There is no doubt that when a tenant takes a farm he takes it with the impression that he has a certain amount of rates to pay, but if the rates have been increased very much during the lease, and he is seeking to take his farm again, I think the landlord or agent, in fixing the amount of the rent which he has to pay for the new lease, takes very little account of the alteration in the amount of the rates during the previous lease.

3553. If the farming profits had remained identical during that time, would it not be necessary for him to do so, in England at least?—If the landlord insists upon having too high a rent, the tenant would not take the farm, and they would have to go to the public, and all that might be taken into account; but a tenant who is already on a farm, and wishes to take it again, will very often consent to take it at rather a dearer rent than he would think of giving if it were a new letting.

3554. In fact, the tenant, rather than change his tenancy, which is attended with very considerable expense would be willing to drop the question of rates, unless the difference was too great?—Generally so; that is my meaning.

3555. But as a broad rule, would you say that this is a correct statement of the facts, that what may be called the average rate is paid by the owner, and that the excess over that average is paid by the tenant, during his tenancy?—I think that is generally a correct statement; because clearly, if there were no rates to be paid by the occupier, he would give more rent for the farm.

3556. Therefore, to put it quite broadly, for the sake of argument, if the rates were swept away, the main part of the advantage would go into the pocket of the landlord?—I think it would, certainly at new lettings.

29 April 1870.

3557. Are you as clear about this point, that during the tenancy, even if it is not under lease, the excess over the average rate is usually paid by the tenant?—Certainly; if the farm is not on lease, there is no difference made in the rent on account of the increase in the rates.

3558. Not unless it reaches a very exorbitant point?—I have never heard of its arriving at that.

3559. You have never known that in your experience as agent?—No.

3560. You have possibly not been called upon to deal with the increase of rents if the rates were very much reduced, but can you say whether the landlord would not, in such a case, demand a higher rent?—I have not been fortunate enough to have instances of rates being reduced. In my experience, they have always been increasing during the last 20 years.

3561. Has not the passing of the Union Chargeability Act tended to shift the burthens considerably?—They are relieved in the towns a little, where I have not had much to do with property; but in nearly all the estates which I have had to do with, the consequence of the passing of that Act has been to increase the rates very much.

3562. Have you never been called upon to advise the owners of farms, of which you are the agent, to increase the rent in consequence of the reduction of the rates?—No, I have never been so.

3563. But no doubt if the rates were very materially reduced, owing to legislation or any other cause, the landlords would be able to raise the rents upon their tenants to a certain extent?—Yes, where there were no leases, no doubt.

3564. Supposing that the Irish system were to be introduced into England, either partially or entirely, do you think that that would have the effect of throwing a portion of that excess over the ordinary rate upon the landowner?—If you did not make the legislation apply to existing leases, it would depend then entirely upon whether the rates after the beginning of a new lease went on increasing or decreasing.

3565. But you would interest the landlord either in the increase or the decrease?—Yes, certainly that would be my great object.

3566. That, you consider, would be an object beyond the possible object of relieving the tenant?—I think it would.

3567. Supposing it were proved that the landlord would be able to raise the rent precisely in the same proportion as the tenant would be relieved by the rates, you think, nevertheless, there would be economical advantages in such a change?—I think there would.

3568. You think it would be attended with advantages beyond the relief to the occupier, if there were such a system?—I think so.

3569. Does that remark apply to the various kinds of rates on farms, or do you apply it chiefly to one?—I apply it to all; I treat all the rates alike in that respect.

3570. You would divide both the county rate, the poor rate, and the highway rate between the owner and the occupier?—Yes, all of them, certainly.

3571. Would your view apply more particularly to any of those rates in proportion as they may be called rates which improve property, as distinguished from rates which are a mere burthen upon those who pay them; would that argument apply to a rate such as the county rate, where value is given, more or less, for the money, rather than to the poor rate?—No, I think generally it would apply to all; it might, in the case of some landlords, have more effect in cases, such as the improvement of roads, where it applies specially to the improvement of property.

3572. In your opinion, does the payment of the entire rate at present by the occupier keep down the expense?—It does in the case of the highway rate to a very material and exceedingly injurious extent, but I cannot say as much for the poor rate.

3573. Would you say that the occupiers feel that the cost is so great that they do not look to the ultimate improvement of the property, which good roads would bring about?—I do not say that generally, but in my county particularly, I think it is, because the highway districts are made up of a very great number of small townships, and the farms are large; each township is rated separately, and the surveyor of the district is appointed by the waywardens, and the consequence is, that each waywarden, who represents either himself alone, or perhaps two or three more ratepayers, keeps his roads in the very worst possible state, and he insists upon the surveyor doing so in order that his rates may be kept down; but he does not object to the rates being raised in other parts, to have good roads when he is going to market, when they are off his own farm, because the rate is paid by other people.

3574. Can you tell the Committee whether the new Act has been introduced into Northumberland generally?—Yes.

3575. Universally?—I think in some cases the districts have been broken up again. In my district it is in operation at present.

3576. Have you attended the road sessions in Ireland?—Yes, regularly.

3577. Could you state to the Committee the different principle in Ireland and in England, and which you prefer of the two as regards roads?—A description of the Irish system would be rather long. There is a county surveyor for the whole county applicable to the roads, which we have not here. The county is divided into baronies, and the rate for roads is equal over the whole barony. The county surveyor has assistants in each barony. Each barony has a road sessions, and there are twice a year road sessions held at which the county surveyor presents a list of all the works that are necessary, the roads that are out of contract, and the members of the road sessions take them into consideration, and put a maximum price on every work. The road sessions then are adjourned for a fortnight, and tenders in the meantime are taken in, and at the adjourned road sessions the lowest, if satisfactory, is accepted. That tender is signed by the contractor and his sureties, and is then binding on him, subject to the approval of the grand jury at the assizes. The grand jury have the power of putting a veto upon any act of the road sessions, but they cannot alter the act; immediately the fiat of the judge is put to the act of the grand jury approving the proceedings of the road sessions, the contract becomes binding on the county as well as on the contractor, and the surveyor has very summary powers by summoning the contractor before the magistrate to insist upon the contract being carried out to great perfection. The consequence is that the roads are remarkably good good in every district. If there is anywhere a fault, you see it, and have it rectified in a few days.

3578. What would be the closest analogy in England to the barony?—In the north of England the poor law unions, which are pretty large, would, I think, pretty nearly correspond.

3579. Are they not as large as petty sessional divisions?—The baronies in Ireland are larger than the petty sessional divisions are generally.

3580. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Do they include several parishes?—Yes, several parishes.

3581. Chairman.] The area is considerable, is it not?—Yes, the area is considerable; there are perhaps five or six in a moderate sized county.

3582. Is it more like a hundred?—We do not know anything about hundreds in the north of England.

3583. Mr. Corrance.] Is there a separate valuation for each barony?—No, it is all under the county organisation; the assistant of the county surveyor is confined to the barony, or to any particular locality.

3584. Chairman.] Who appoints the county surveyor?—The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

3585. Is he a Government officer?—He is appointed by him, and I think almost the only control that the county has over him, which is considerable of course, is his payment by the grand jury.

3586. He is appointed practically by the Crown, but paid by the county?—Yes.

3588. Are you satisfied with the constitution of the highway boards in England?—No, not by any means, with those that I am acquainted with.

3589. Will you state what objections you see to their present constitution?—The first objection is, that they are far too large; it is impossible for them to do the business; I do not know the number on the Hexham Board, which I attend, but I believe it is considerably over 100; it is a very large number, but they never all attend, except when there is an official to be appointed, or something of that kind.

3590. Mr. St. Aubyn.] That number includes, does it not, the ex officio waywardens?—Yes, but there are not more than two or three of them that ever attend in my district.

3591. Do you say that there are about 90 elected members on that board?—I am not quite sure whether there are not more; I have not the numbers with me, but I rather think there are over 100.

3592. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] I am afraid it is not a very favourable specimen of the working of the New Highway Act?—Indeed, it is not.

3593. It began badly, did it not?—Yes.

3594. Chairman.] What would be the mileage of the roads?—I believe, in our district, there are about 700 miles; but a great many of them are common roads and drift roads, which are not made, and never will be probably. But there are other objections besides the number; that is to say, we have townships there, each of which townships formerly was rated to the poor before the Union Assessment Act passed, and those are rated separately, and each appoint their own waywarden; that is the reason why we have so many waywardens elected. Each waywarden has a certain local interest, not only in the rates, but in the roads; and the surveyor of the district being appointed by them, for he is their nominee, is completely under their control; and it is utterly impossible that we can ever have good roads under that system.

3595. Can you state your impression of the maximum number that attend on this highway board?—Fifteen or 20 on ordinary occasions.

3596. On a great occasion, have you seen as many as 100?—Yes, 100 or more.

3598. My question is rather directed to this point; that, supposing the owners pay a portion of the rate, would you think it right to give them a representation both on the highway boards and boards of guardians, different to the representation which they have now; you are aware that at present the owners are not represented, except so far as the ex officio guardians may be said to represent them; would you think it necessary to give them any other representation if they paid bonâ fide half the rate?—I do not think it would be necessary. If they attended the meetings they would have quite a sufficient amount of influence as ex officio members of the board, or if they were not magistrates, they would be as sometimes proprietors now are, elected waywardens to represent districts.

3599. Elected by the ratepayers and as ratepayers?—Yes.

3600. Do the ex officio members, as far as your experience goes, attend as regularly as the other guardians?—Only one or two that I know attend regularly.

3601. Do not you think you might secure their attendance more regularly if they were elected as owners, or by owners especially to represent the owners who would be rated?—I think that if they paid half the rates they would naturally attend without being elected; I should expect so at least.

3602. Would not practically the small freeholders be excluded?—No, because they would have a voice in the election of the waywardens.

3603. I am not thinking of highway boards especially, but I mean generally would not the result be this, that you would have the large owners, who may be said to be represented by the ex officio guardians, and you would have the occupiers as ratepayers represented, but the small owners would be paying rates without having any representation at all?—They would not be paying rates any more than a small occupier, who is not represented, or is only represented through the guardian, or waywarden, or whoever he elects to represent him at present, and the small owner would be just in the same position as he is now.

3604. But the small owners might be a small body, and not be able to carry their candidate, whereas the occupiers, being a very large number, might might be able to out-vote the owners?—I think that their interest would be identical; I do not see how there would be any antagonism between them.

29 April 1870.

3605. Then you do not think it important to give the owners a direct representation, as I understand you?—I do not think so; they have no more direct representation in Ireland than as ex officio guardians, and I have not found any harm to result from that.

3606. They pay half the rates, and yet they have no direct representation beyond what they have in England?—No.

3607. Are you at all aware whether the ex officio members do take more interest in Ireland than they do in England, in the administration of the local rates?—In the districts of which I have had experience they do very much more.

3608. Do you attribute that to their paying a portion of the rate directly, and feeling the variations of the rate accordingly?—I think that probably has a great influence.

3609. Do you not think that if the system were introduced into England the landlords would make an arrangement with their tenants by which they would stipulate that the tenants should pay the whole rate?—I do not think they would; I think that the fact of a certain law existing is generally accepted; it is only for some very particular reason that it is deviated from in making the contract.

3610. Would you not, as an agent, recommend the owners of the farms with which you are connected, to protect themselves by asking the tenants to pay the whole rate?—Certainly not.

3611. Would you explain why you would not?—Because, if the Legislature holds that it is fair that the rate should be divided equally, I do not think it would be right for me to advise the owners of property to run counter to that which is supposed to be a wholesome system.

3612. Not if it were left open for the parties to contract if they chose?—No, not even then.

3613. It might be advisable, possibly, to put a clause in the Act, as there is in the Income Tax Act, preventing the owner from contracting with the tenant for the payment of the rates by the tenant; but you mean independently of that; even if that clause were omitted you do not think that the owners would arrange that the tenants should pay all the rates?—I do not think they would, or very few would.

3614. Are you aware that in towns, where there is the sewer's rate, which is considered as an owners' rate, they continually arrange for the payment of that rate by the tenants?—I believe they do; I have not had much experience in that, and, of course, I cannot tell what the reason of it may be; but owners have not got accustomed yet to paying their share of the rates; if it became law and it became general, I think they would accept it in all cases.

3615. Do not you think that the temptation to know how much exactly will be deducted from them from year to year in the shape of rates would induce them to make an arrangement with the tenants for an equivalent amount of rent?—I do not think it would. They would take their chance as they do with the income tax, whether it is a penny more or a penny less.

3616. Are you aware that in the Income Tax Act there is a clause to the effect that deductions are not legal?—Yes; but the landlord, of course, has no control over the income tax; I mean that under schedule A of the income tax, the landlord has no control over it, if Parliament makes the income tax 1 d. or 2 d. more or less.

3617. You think that if Parliament were to divide the rate between the owner and the occupier, it would not be likely to prove a dead letter?—I do not think it would. I think that landlords generally accept the position that is put upon them, without trying to evade it.

3618. Mr. Corrance.] In Ireland the holdings are very small compared to England, are they not?—Yes, of course there are very many small holdings in Ireland.

3619. In your opinion does that constitute any advantage in the division of the rates or the contrary, or what effect would it produce in such a division?—I do not see that it makes any difference.

3620. For instance, if he had so dealt with property consisting of holdings of 10 l. each let from year to year, would it make no difference in that respect as contrasted with large holdings under lease?—I think not, because the increase of a certain per-centage to the rates is of as much importance to the man who pays 10 l. a-year as to the man who pays 1,000 l.

3621. But is he in a position to take as much notice of the administration of the rate, or to exercise as much control over it?—A small ratepayer always takes a part in the election of guardians, just as much as a large one.

3622. Do you find in practice that where the constituency, if I may so call it, is mostly composed of small occupiers, the same administration prevails as does where it is composed of large occupiers?—They take quite as much interest in the election of the guardians, and they very soon find out if the rate is 1 d. or ½ d. more than it was the year before.

3623. That is your experience of Ireland?—Yes; they find it out just as soon as the large farmer does.

3624. Had you any experience, as a land agent, of two classes of property, one where there were large grazing farms held by substantial occupiers for long periods, and the other where there were small holdings and the tenants were mostly of the poorer class, as in the case in other parts of Ireland?—Yes, I have had experience of both kinds.

3625. Practically, in the working of this law, you do not find much difference?—No; the small occupiers take just as much interest as the large ones.

3626. Does the landlord protect himself in any way by requiring the services of his agent upon such boards of local administration, or is the landlord represented there?—If he is not resident, he may have an agent who is, perhaps, an ex officio guardian.

3627. Do the agents usually act so in Ireland?—On large estates nearly all do; and on the small estates the owner himself, if he is resident at all, is an ex officio guardian.

3628. You know England as well as Ireland; it is not so in England, is it?—Agents are not, as agents, generally ex officio guardians in England.

3629. And as business men they rarely attend?—I think those who are ex officio guardians do attend.

3630. I mean that the land agent very seldom represents his landlord at the local board of administration?—He is not so often an ex officio guardian, guardian, or a magistrate, as is the case in Ireland.

3631. Nor so often elected as a guardian?—He is frequently a guardian, but then he is not necessarily made such to represent the owner but merely as a resident.

3632. With regard to your answer as to landlords pocketing the difference of any remission that might accrue in the rates; do you assume, as a practical man, that landlords do avail themselves of any small sums that may happen to be cast into the common lot?—No, I never heard of it being done: not in my experience.

3633. Is it not part of your experience that, if a large margin of general profit out of industry is left, a pretty general subdivision of those profits will take place between all the parties concerned in equal proportions, or nearly so?—Ultimately it would be so; after so many years.

3634. In such untaxed industry the rents may be slightly higher, and the profits would be therefore larger, and the labourer better paid; would not that be the result of an unburdened industry?—No; labour is regulated by supply and demand, rather than by the burdens of the land.

3635. Has not it been the case with manufactures, that as the profits have increased the wages have increased considerably, and, in fact, all classes have participated?—I am not much experienced in those matters; but one often hears that profits are diminished, and yet wages are increased.

3636. Do you think it would be the result of such a thing that any one of those three classes, the landlord, the employer of labour, or the employed, the labourer, would have the power under existing circumstances of extracting to his own advantage every farthing of that remission; would that be so?—It would be just possible, of course, for a landlord, if his farms are not let on lease, to make such arrangement as that he should have so much more rent, and that he would pay the rates, when below a certain point; of course, he could do so, but I do not suppose that it would be done.

3637. You have said that you do not draw any distinction between poor rates and other rates; did you ever consider them as quite a separate question?—Certainly they have to be considered separately in some questions; but I put them together with regard to the basis of rating, and the mode of collecting them, and the way they should be divided between the occupier and the owner. I class them altogether in those respects.

3638. In fact, in your mind, you are acting more under a preconceived idea than from any distinct consideration of them as separate subjects?—I have not built up any theory about them at all.

3639. You take them as existing facts, levied and collected under one head?—No, I do not; they are not collected under one head. They have not been hitherto collected under one head, in Ireland or in England; but I think it would be an enormous convenience to us, and save a great amount of irritation and annoyance amongst farmers, if they were all collected together, once or twice a year, and by official collectors, instead of by overseers going seven or eight times a year all round from one place to another; men who do not know their business.

3640. Are the interests of the ratepayers absolutely identical in each case; are the interests of the landlord and the tenant identical as regards permanent improvements like highways and county rates of various classes, and those connected with merely such temporary matters as the employment of labour and poor rates?—Certainly not. There are some connected with county rate which concern the owner of the land more than the occupier, because very often there are improvements required to be done which may cost so much that it ought to be divided over a good many years, and the tenant of a farm may have only a very few years of his lease to run, and therefore he is not interested in them.

Mr. C. G. Grey. 29 April 1870.

3641. That is not so with the poor rate?—No.

3642. That is a mere temporary matter from year to year, is it not?—Yes.

3643. You have told us that the highways are a county organisation in Ireland; do you find that that works well?—I think that the Irish system of highways is as near perfection as any system can be.

3644. Is there any classification of the roads there, such as turnpike roads and parish roads?—There is a division, but in letting contracts each road for so many miles is let on a contract by itself; they do not let a district comprising one public road and one less used road together; each kind of road is let on a separate contract; but there are roads which are called in Ireland mail car roads, which correspond with our turnpike roads and main thoroughfares, and half the expense of keeping those roads is thrown upon the county at large, the work being done by the barony.

3645. There are some parish roads, are there not?—I am not aware of any. All the roads that I have experience of are on the whole barony.

3646. Under whose sanction would a new road, either a parish road or any other road, be made?—If it was a new road, it would have to be passed at two road sessions consecutively before it could go before the grand jury. Generally speaking, the road sessions consider the question of a new road, and see whether any contributions can be got from proprietors, or from any person who has works or anything which makes them particularly interested in making this road. If this can be done, they consider it again at the next road sessions, and then they agree to add so much to what is already subscribed to do the work, charging it on the whole barony.

3647. Mr. St. Aubyn.] The system of payment is simply this: that as a rule your roads in the barony are defrayed by the barony, with the exception of the mail-coach road, one half of the expense of which is borne by the county?—Yes.

3648. With regard to the highways in England, the Committee understood you to say at the beginning of your evidence, that you thought the whole of the rates should be divided equally between the owner and the occupier in the case of poor rate, county rate, and highway rate; have you considered particularly the question of highway rate, with regard to that opinion?—Yes, I think so.

3649. Evidence has been given before the Committee, that in Scotland the highway rate is borne wholly by the owners; will you state to the Committee what objections you see to the adoption of such a plan in England, with regard to highways?—I think that we have amongst our large farmers very practical business men, and that they would take an interest in the management of the roads of their district, and I do not see any reason why they should not contribute towards the keeping of them up. It is more to consider whether there is any sufficient reason for them not bearing any part of the burden, than to consider why they should bear it I think, because they bear it all now.

Mr. C. G. Grey. 29 April 1870.

3650. Why would you move one-half of the burden from them to the owners; would it be for the purpose of giving the owners greater interest in their maintenance?—Partly for the purpose of giving them greater interest, and partly that a good deal of the work to be done on the roads for many years hence, must be more or less of a permanent nature, and concerning the proprietors more than the occupiers.

3651. Mr. Backhouse.] In your experience do you find that the elected members are at all jealous of the interference of ex officio members at the different boards, highway boards, and boards of guardians?—I have sometimes seen a little of it at the highway boards. When an ex officio member has wished some particular works to be done on roads that have never been repaired, the ratepayers say, "We are only on the farm for a few years, and we pay the rates, and it is very hard that we should do it; but if the proprietors come forward and subscribe to the rate we are quite willing to bear our proportion."

3652. When appointments are made, the ex officio members attend, do they not, in greater numbers than ordinarily?—Yes, certainly.

3653. Would you think that if the ex officios were elected either by the owners expressly, or by the ratepayers generally, as owners, they would have more influence on those boards than they have at present?—I have never considered that question of the representation of owners; it never was put to me before, but I do not see that it would make much difference, because from their position in the country they do already represent property, and they would not do so any more if they were elected.

3654. Do you think that they would attend better if they were elected?—If they were elected to represent a certain number of properties besides their own, they might feel it more incumbent on them to attend than if the business merely concerned their own estates.

3655. Mr. Birley.] I understand you to say that the fluctuations in the local rates in Ireland have not occasioned in your experience any corresponding alterations in the rents?—No, I have not found it so.

3656. Have there not been great alterations or fluctuations in the rates?—Very great; they were very high after the famine, and they were very much reduced afterwards.

3657. What is the length of your experience in Ireland?—I was 12 years on Lord Derby's estate, and shorter periods on other estates.

3658. Were you there previous to the famine?—I went there in 1851; in fact just at the worst time, as far as the burdens went, when the worst of the famine was over.

3659. Then you have had experience of extraordinary fluctuations?—Yes.

3660. But that has not occasioned any corresponding, or any very appreciable alteration in the rents?—No; the rates were very much reduced in some instances during my residence, and I never found that the rents were raised in consequence.

3661. Chairman.] Generally speaking, are the rents more stationary in Ireland than in England, or is there more change, as far as your experience goes, in the rents in Ireland than in England?—There is much more change in England.

3662. It is less often, is it not, that the landlord meddles with the rent, if one may say so, in Ireland than he does in England?—Much less, if you take estates which are let on leases in England, but there are some estates in England where there are no leases on which there has not been any very great change for many years; such estates, for instance, as the Duke of Cleveland's, where there has been very little fluctuation in the rents for very many years; but, generally speaking, in England the rents vary very much more frequently.

3663. Mr. Pell.] You have been giving us evidence with regard to the rates in Ireland; with regard to the police, the State pays the whole of that; you have no rate for the police in Ireland, I believe?—I think not; I think that the State pays the whole of it.

3664. With regard to education, the State pays three-fourths, does it not?—Yes; there is no education rate.

3665. With regard to poor rate, the owner pays half and the occupier pays half?—In all holdings over 4 l. a year valuation.

3666. With regard to county rate, who pays that?—The occupier pays the whole of it.

3667. That includes roads, and therefore the owner pays nothing for roads?—Yes, that is so.

3668. But who controls them?—The occupiers and the ex officio members of the board.

3669. How is the occupier admitted to any control over the roads; I thought that the sessions were composed entirely of owners?—No; the road sessions are generally more than one-half ratepayers.

3670. Are they elected?—They are not elected; they are rather taken by chance. A number of names are put into a hat, and they are drawn out at the road sessions. It is an open question.

3671. Who puts those names into the hat?—That is a question I am not quite sure about. I am not sure whether the name is not sent down either by the clerk of the peace or by some county officer, but there are a considerable number of names of ratepayers put into the hat.

3672. But the names, such as they are, that are put into the hat are given in, are they not, by the owners?—No, not by the owners. I think that the county official, whoever he is, knows that he is selecting a certain number of names from the ratepayers in the barony, and those again to be balloted for are taken by chance; and he is taking them to represent the ratepayers and not the owners.

3673. Have you not an officer in Ireland like the clerk of the peace in England?—Yes.

3674. Is not he the officer who makes out the list?—I rather think he is.

3675. But, at all events, he is not confined in making his selection to owners only; he can take simply occupiers?—He must take occupiers; he cannot take owners, unless they be occupiers too.

3676. So

3676. So that, in fact, you cannot say that the county rate in Ireland is controlled entirely by the owners?—You cannot say that, certainly.

3677. Therefore, the occupiers in Ireland have a distinct control over the county rate?—Clearly so.

3678. And much more so than they have in England?—They have none in England.

3679. And it is the same, is it not, with regard to roads?—Yes; the only thing in Ireland is, that the representatives of the ratepayers at the road sessions are not elected, they are taken partly by chance.

3681. An honourable Member asked you a question with regard to the road-rate in Scotland, and you said that it was all paid by the owner; but is not one-half of it recovered from the occupier?—I am not aware, from my own experience, of the working of Scotch roads.

3683. Will you tell us what the inconvenience is, and the point which annoys you now?—The township ratepayers meet four times a year and make four different rates; those rates are to meet the different precepts of the highway board, the county, and the poor law guardians; and the ratepayers every year elect a new overseer, a new parish constable, a new waywarden, and a new Poor Law guardian. The overseer is a simple farmer who takes his turn and knows nothing about the business; and it is a great deal of trouble to me and to those from whom he collects the rates, because, in a public office like mine, if there is a farthing mistake in his calculations, they come back from the Audit Office. So many small rates are exceedingly inconvenient; they are also extremely troublesome in going before the assessment committee, because the overseers know very little about the way in which the rates ought to be made out; one sits on the assessment committee day after day doing work which really a paid clerk ought to do; there are a number of gentlemen doing that which ought all to be done by a paid officer; and my very strong opinion is, and I have come to the conclusion long ago, that all those small local volunteer offices ought to be done away with, and that the whole collection ought to be done by a paid officer, and not so frequently.

3685. So that, under the present form of collection, the ratepayer's attention is not drawn to extravagance in any particular department?—He can always find it out at the township's meeting, because he knows what the precept is upon the township from each different body that requires it.

3686. He would not know that, unless he went through the overseer's account?—No, nor unless he went to the township meeting, where the overseer has to show his precepts.

3687. Do you not think it would be better for yourself that an estimate should be made for the year for the poor rate, and the road rate, than that there should be four collections?—Yes; I would not have four collections. There is an estimate made in Ireland for the year by the Poor Law guardians, and the rate is made once for the year.

3688. How often is the collection made?—It is collected once in the year; and most of the rates are collected in the office, in the principal market town, so that the collection is much less troublesome than in this country.

3689. Did you hear complaints in Ireland of large balances in the treasurer's hands?—There are very seldom any balances; the guardians take them into the general account in the banks; and if they have a large sum standing to their credit at one time in the year after the rate is collected, they are allowed to overdraw towards the end, in case their estimate has been rather short.

3690. With regard to the persons employed in the management and collection of rates, you think there are a great many people doing now imperfectly and voluntarily business which would be better done by fewer persons, who should be paid for it?—Yes, I have a very strong opinion about that.

3691. Do you think that paid officers in England might collect the rates, so that as where now there are two relieving officers for a union there might be two collectors?—I have not considered very much that there would be any advantage in employing a relieving officer as a collector, but I think you might have a collector or two collectors for a Poor Law union, if it was found necessary, who would have a central office in the place where the guardians and waywardens meet.

3692. Has it ever come under your notice, that there have been defaulters amongst collectors and overseers?—I have heard of such things, but I have never had such a case within my own experience.

3693. Sir Massey Lopes.] If, as you suggest, a paid officer were employed for the collection of rates, do you think that there would be any great objection in the division of those rates between owners and occupiers?—I do not see that that affects the question at all.

3694. You strongly recommend a paid officer, and also that, upon those precepts, or rather upon the

Mr. C. G. Grey. 29 April 1870.

the papers given for payment, there should be mentioned the objects for which the rate is collected; that you should see how much is for the poor and how much for the police, and so on?—It is on the precept, of course, because the precepts come from the different boards. One precept comes from the highway board, and another comes from the Poor Law guardians.

3695. But when the overseer comes with a paper to you asking you to pay the rates, he does not tell you how much is for police and how much for county rate?—No, he does not generally.

3696. The overseer comes to you for a lump sum?—Yes.

3697. He is not able to give you the specific amount for each particular charge?—He would have no difficulty in doing it if he was a paid officer, and knew his business.

3698. You recommend classification, do you not?—It might be desirable; and I think there would be no difficulty in it whatever; it is merely a line or two more in the printed form which he fills up.

3699. The overseer could show you the precept for the highway, but could he show it to you for every other rate?—For the poor rate he could.

3700. For the county rate could he?—I think the county rate is paid through the Poor Law guardians, but we know how much it is in the pound, because when the precept from the county comes to the Poor Law guardians, they say it will take so much in the pound, say a penny or a farthing in the pound to raise this sum, therefore one knows that so much of the rate which one pays is for that.

3701. Supposing that there was a division of rates between owners and occupiers, would you not consider that the owners ought to have direct representation?—If it is considered desirable, I do not see any objection to it at all, but I never considered the matter before.

3702. Do not you think that that would give them a better status at the board of highways and the board of guardians?—I do not think it would make much difference in that respect, but the ex officios would be known then to come to represent their own properties, which it is not known now that they come to do.

3703. You mentioned just now that in Ireland the police rate is paid by the Imperial Legislature. Do you know any reason, with your experience of England, why the national Exchequer should not pay the police rate in England. Can you draw any distinction between England and Ireland in that respect?—The Irish police are, to a certain extent, a military force, which our police are not, but in the ordinary local duties of police I cannot see why there should be any difference.

3704. The object of the police in both cases is to protect persons and property, is it not?—Yes, certainly.

3705. There is no reason, is there, why they should be paid by the Government in one part of the kingdom rather than in the other?—None whatever, I say, in the ordinary duties of the police.

3706. If any arrangement was made for the division of those rates between owners and occupiers, do not you think that it would, in a great measure, tend to interfere with existing arrangements as between owners and occupiers?—Clearly, and that must be provided for in one of two ways. You must either say that it shall not come into operation where leases exist, or you might say that it shall come into operation only taking as a basis the average rates for so many years past.

3707. It would necessarily interfere, would it not, with the present existing arrangement of leases?—It need not.

3708. Then you would only take the benefit of it after the lease has expired?—Certainly.

3709. Would you recommend that, in cases where the rates have increased, the owner should pay that increase; and also would you give him the benefit of any decrease in those rates?—I think that would be rather interfering too much with the contract that has been made between landlord and tenant.

3710. Still, if you are going to break the contract in one way, why should you not in the other way?—I do not propose to break it at all; I would let the present contracts continue, and run out.

3711. And start de novo at the end of the lease?—Yes.

3712. Do you think that if a portion of the management were given to the owners, there would be the same economy, or do you not think that the occupiers, for instance, paying those rates as they now do, are more interested in keeping them down than if the owners were combined with the occupiers in the management of them?—That is a very difficult question to answer. I think that where works were considered desirable, the tenant, knowing that he had only half the rate to pay, would be more easily persuaded to allow the work to be done, and therefore, in that respect, it might increase the rate; but in the ordinary expenditure and administration of the rate, I think he would take as keen an interest in it probably as he does now. I have not found in Ireland a tenant take less interest in the poor rate because he only pays half.

3713. Do you think that any substantial benefit would accrue to the occupier by making this proposed change?—I think there would. One great thing is, that it would do away with the grievance about their not being represented. I think also, that where rates are fluctuating, on the principle that the rate ultimately does come out of the pocket of the owner of the land, he should participate in that fluctuation.

3714. Supposing that was made law to-morrow, and the owner was going to make a fresh arrangement with his tenant, do not you think that he would put on an excess of rent, sufficient to make himself safe with reference to any increased rates which might occur during the tenancy?—I do not think he would; the rates would increase on the tenant as well as on him.

3715. For instance, we are possibly going to have an education rate; do you think that an owner, making a fresh arrangement with his tenant, would not take that into consideration and put some little increase upon his rent for it?—I do not think he would, because it would come to this, that if he put too much on, his farm would be too dear, and the tenant would not take it.

3716. You have probably more particular experience with regard to large holdings, but how would it be with small holdings; where your holding is very large it would not make the same difference, but in a very small holding would not the

the landlord take those minor matters, as you would call them, into consideration?—I do not think he ought, because if it was a small holding and he tried to throw a large increase upon the tenant, it would be just as hard upon the small occupier to pay a very much increased rate as it would upon a large occupier in proportion.

3717. Could you tell us, with reference to your experience in Ireland, whether there is any great grievance felt there with regard to the pressure of local taxation?—No; while I lived there the rates had generally decreased; the poor rate very much.

3718. There is very little out-door relief in Ireland, I believe?—Very little; there seems to be more now, but there was scarcely any when I left; it seems to have increased a little in the seven years since I was there.

3719. What is your experience in England with regard to the increase of local rates?—I can give an example of a tenant who told me that the poor rates which he paid in 1859 amounted to 93*l.* 15*s.*, and in 1869, 10 years afterwards, to 174*l.*, being very nearly double. That is the position, in consequence, partly, of the Union Chargeability Act, but not entirely; because, if you take any of those large farms, the rates have been increasing from year to year continually. For instance, there is another farm which was let in the year 1851 for 21 years, the rent of which was 470*l.*, and all the rates together, for the first three years, were only 12*l.* a-year; but they have increased gradually until, in the last three years, they have been 72*l.* a-year. They did not increase all at once when the Union Chargeability Act came into operation, but they have increased every year almost. I may say they have been regularly increasing.

3720. Are not those exceptional cases, or do you know of many others?—Not at all exceptional, except that in rural unions, I could find some district, where the rates have been reduced; in the town of Hexham, for instance, which is the central town of the district, where I have resided.

3721. Did you find a better attendance of boards of guardians in Ireland than in England?—Yes, I think there was a larger attendance there.

3722. How do you account for that, because in Ireland they pay only half the rate?—Yes; but a good many of the ex officio guardians attended there, and scarcely any of them do here. Then, also, in Ireland, they have not a union assessment committee for the poor rate which we have in England.

3723. Mr. Pell.] Is the assessment for baronies or townships?—In Ireland the area of assessment for the poor rate is the electoral division, which comprises one or two, or several townships.

3724. Sir Massey Lopes.] I presume the effect of union assessment has been very much to increase the rateable value of land; it has raised all the assessments in almost all instances, has it not?—Considerably so, I think.

3725. Do you consider that the intrinsic value of land has increased in the same proportion as those assessments have been increased?—No; I attribute it chiefly to the assessment committees looking more sharply after the true value of farms and finding out what the rents were.

3726. So that the increased assessments are no indication of the increased value of the land?—I would not say that they are no indication.

3727. But not to the same extent?—No; certainly not.

3728. Mr. Rathbone.] With regard to the difference between Ireland and England, as to attendance on the highway boards, is it the case that in Ireland the chief management of the highways is left in the hands of the magistrates?—It varies very much, I know districts where the ratepayers attend very regularly every sessions, and I also know districts, which are comparatively rural, in which they are all large proprietors, and the tenants seem to think that their affairs are as well managed as they could manage them themselves. I have attended a road sessions in those districts, at which there were nobody but two or three ex officio members, and no ratepayers at all, or only one ratepayer, perhaps.

3729. As a rule, the ex officio members do exercise a good deal of influence, probably, in their management?—They do, certainly.

3730. Is it not the case, also, that the class from which the ex officio members are taken are, perhaps, more at leisure in Ireland than they are in England?—I think that is very likely.

3731. Also, is it not the case that the ratepaying class have not quite the same amount of position or education, and therefore do not take quite so large a share in the management?—That is also a very sufficient reason; and in the districts which I have mentioned, where the ratepayers do take a very active part, they are men of much higher position; men who pay 600*l.* or 700*l.* a year rent, or more; and men who can take their position along with the ex officios in discussing public business.

3732. You said, did you not, that the system worked very well in Ireland?—Admirably, I think.

3733. But would it not be dangerous, owing to those differences which you have mentioned, that in England the ex officio guardians, unless they were representatives and chosen and had voluntarily undertaken certain work, might not attend as well, or have the same influence as they have in Ireland?—They might not; there are a good many country gentlemen in England who do not care about attending meetings where the farmers and people are, but rather avoid them; but I have a very strong impression that they would attend more to business if they had a more direct interest in the administration.

3734. With respect to the Poor Law guardians, is not the attendance of the ex officios very irregular, and in consequence their influence very much less than it is in the highway boards in Ireland?—It is less, but I do not see that it is entirely attributable to that reason that their influence is less. I think that if the ex officio members in any union in England attended regularly, they probably would have quite the influence due to the position which they hold in the country; but the reason that they do not have influence is, that they only come when there is an officer to be elected, or something special to be done, and then the guardians elected by the ratepayers do not like to see them there.

3735. I want to know whether the good attendance, and the consequent good management of the highway boards in Ireland, was not in a great measure due to the fact that the responsibility was practically thrown upon those men, and therefore they attended regularly?—No; I think the difference is entirely owing to the two systems; to the law. The Irish system of road making, and the rating for roads, is just and equitable; and the English system not only works badly, but is exceedingly injurious and harsh in some cases, and, in fact, is unjust; it is a thoroughly bad system.

29 April 1870.

3736. But still you think we should be probably more safe, do you not, in having a regular attendance of representatives of the owners, if they were distinctly elected for that object, than if they had to take their chance out of the ex officio members of the board?—I do not quite understand the question which has been put several times; when you talk of the owners being elected, I do not know how they would be elected, or who would elect them.

3737. Supposing the owners elected half the highway board in England, and the ratepayers elected the other half, would you not probably have greater interest and more regular attendance on the part of those elected members representing the owners, than you have now where there is only the indirect representation of ex officio members?—That I certainly think, but then in that case you would have to elect a great many more people to represent the owners than you have now ex officio members, and perhaps you would have to elect more owners than you have owners, if you wanted to have an equal number with the ratepayers on the board. You might have a smaller board, and if you did it would work much better.

3738. In cases like your own, where you represent a number of large owners, do you think that in country districts you would be able to find sufficient representatives of the owners to take their places with the representatives of the occupiers on a moderate board?—I should not in my case, because in England I only represent one large proprietor, namely, Greenwich Hospital. In Ireland, I represented a good many; but in England I only represent Greenwich Hospital, and there are districts where I should not find an owner at all who would represent the interest of Greenwich Hospital.

3739. But if you had the power of choosing men who were not ex officio members, but who were elected by the owners, would you be able to choose men upon whom you could rely?—I should have to choose them just as my nominees; and if they did what I did not like, at the next election I should have to put somebody else in instead of them.

3740. When you proposed the apportioning of the payment between the owner and the occupier, am I right in understanding you to say, that you did not propose to divide the whole rate equally between the owner and the occupier, but only the fluctuation above or below the average?—Ultimately I would divide all the rates. It is only in case you interfered with the present tenancies that I would bring in the question of averages.

3741. But did you not state in an answer that you gave lately, that you did not propose to interfere with existing tenancies?—I should not do so; but if they were to be interfered with at all, it would not be just to give a tenant, now holding under a lease, the power to deduct half his rates from the landlord, when he took his farm on the condition of paying the whole; but if you do interfere at all with the existing tenancies, which I do not recommend, you might do so somehow in this way: Take the average of the rates for so many years during the lease, or say from the beginning of the lease, if you like, arrange then that the tenant shall always pay the whole of it; but when it exceeds that amount, he might deduct half the increase from the rent.

3742. Would not that be a rather complicated calculation?—Not at all.

3743. Is not the average itself a shifting quantity?—No; but I should take a fixed average to begin with, up to the time of the passing of the Act.

3744. That would not meet the exact demands of justice, would it, because the average itself is liable to vary very much; because, supposing you take an average of seven years to begin with, you must alter that average every year if the amount of rate alters?—I do not propose to do that at all. Take the case which I have mentioned, where a man's rates were for three years 12 l. a year, and were increased to 28 l., and 48 l., and now are 72 l. He took the farm in 1851, and from that to the year 1871 the average of that man's rates, suppose, stands at 50 l. I would let him, to the end of his lease pay the 50 l., and let him deduct from the landlord half the excess on that, and let it so stand to the end of his lease; then, at the end of the lease, he would come under the operation of the law.

3745. But that would be only an approximate mode of arriving at justice?—It would merely be a slight relief, that is, in case you determined to interfere at all with the present tenancies.

3746. With regard to the general question of rates, are you disposed or not to make any distinction between what may be called rates levied for the purposes of permanent improvements and rates levied for ordinary purposes; that is to say, in the case of county rates you would have what I should call permanent improvements, the building of lunatic asylums and gaols, and in the case of highway rates the making of new roads, and in the case of poor rates the building of new workhouses, supposing them to be required; are you disposed to make any distinction, or do you think that it would be practicable or desirable to do so, between the incidence of rates levied for those purposes and those levied for mere ordinary purposes?—I do not think it would be desirable, because for those works you borrow money and spread the payment over a number of years; and if you spread the payment over a number of years, I do not see that you need make any difference in the division of the rate equally between the owner and the occupier.

3747. Is not the county expenditure for the purposes which I have mentioned, somewhat analogous to imperial expenditure, and of an exceptional character, like the expenditure upon fortifications or for Abyssinian expeditions, and matters of that kind, and is it not usual to impose some rather special taxes on property when expenses of that kind are incurred?—Yes, but then you spread it over a great many years.

3748. Still, is it not rather the practice to provide for that increased expenditure by taxes which fall more especially upon property, than by those which fall upon articles of consumption, and might not a similar process be justifiable in the case of rates?—I do not see the need for it in the case of rates if you spread the payment over so many years; but if it is for a lunatic asylum, for instance, the occupier has just as much interest in it as he has in anything else if you spread it over a number of years; if he has his farm for a few years he pays only for those few years, and his successor pays after him.

3749. That

3749. That is an analogous case to terminable annuities, is it not?—It is a terminable annuity, in fact.

3750. In cases where great expense is incurred for imperial purposes, for what may be called permanent improvements, is it not usual to throw the burden rather more upon property than upon the mass of the population?—That is rather a question for Parliament than for my opinion, I think, because I do not venture to give an opinion upon national subjects.

3751. But are not the two cases somewhat analogous?—There is a certain analogy between them, of course, to some extent.

3752. Legislation is essential, I presume, in order to carry out the proposed plan that you suggest, namely, to employ a class of rate collectors, and to take care that the rates are levied by properly qualified persons, instead of by the present class of overseers?—Certainly, and very urgently.

3753. You think, do you not, that if the payment of poor rates is to be divided equally between the owner and the occupier, the owner should have a more direct representation at the board of guardians than he has at present?—If you have very large boards, as you have at present, he ought to have a larger voice.

3754. Take the case which you mentioned just now, of a large landowner who might be the only ex officio member of the board in a particular union; do you think it would be just that his single voice should be the only voice to represent his property in that union, or would you give him power to nominate a certain number of guardians?—I think he ought to have more than one voice if he has so much interest.

3755. Would you propose to give him that by giving him the power of nominating a certain number of guardians, in order that his property might be represented?—I have never considered that case before I came here; it did not strike me. My general impression was, that the influence of country gentlemen would secure their own ends if they attended to the business; but if that question is gone into, I am inclined to think that you must reduce the size of your boards very considerably, and then you may appoint a certain number by election to represent property, as well as a certain number to represent the occupiers.

3756. I asked that question because it was stated in evidence by Mr. Squarey, at the last meeting of the Committee, that he thought that elected guardians frequently took a loose view of a case, and they will not and do not deal as rigidly as ex officio guardians would do; is that your view of the present working of the system?—Yes; I think that many elected guardians, not having the same experience as magistrates, do not look so closely into their legal obligations as ex officio members would do.

3757. But do you think that the attendance of a large number of ex officio members would tend to a more rigid or a less rigid mode of working the present law?—More rigid, as to the legality of their proceedings, I mean.

3758. My question was with reference to expenditure?—You very often find that the elected guardians are exceedingly niggardly; for instance, in retiring allowances to old officers, and in matters of that kind.

3759. But they are more liberal to the poor, are they not?—No, I do not think they are over liberal to the poor, certainly.

3760. In what way do you think that the presence of a large number of ex officios would tend to economise the administration of the law?—I do not think I said that it would economise it.

3761. Do you think it would have any effect either way, either in increasing or reducing the expenditure on poor relief?—I think it would be as likely to increase it as to reduce it, but I think everything would be done more regularly, in a more business-like way; there would be fewer irregularities.

3762. Mr. Pell.] You think that the ex officio members would consider general consequences, while the elected members would attend more to particular consequences?—That is what I intended to express.

3763. Mr. Birley.] There would be a more intelligent administration?—Yes.

3764. Mr. Corrance.] You have had experience of the election of assessment committees, have you not?—I have acted upon an assessment committee for some years.

3765. You know that they are elected by the whole body, but that they are restricted to the choice of a certain number of ex officios and a certain number of elected representatives?—Yes.

3766. And that works well, does it not?—It works as well as the system of assessment committees can work; the mode of election works well.

3767. You said that the county surveyor in Ireland is appointed by the Crown; do you approve of that?—Yes.

3768. Does the Crown pay any part of the road expenses?—No, I do not think it pays any part of the road expenses.

3769. And yet they appoint their nominee?—Yes.

3770. Did you ever hear any complaints of its being made a political appointment?—I do not remember ever having done so; I think that the appointments have always been made, as far as I could judge, with a view to efficiency.

3771. And no complaints have ever been made to your knowledge?—Not to my knowledge.

3772. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] In answer to the honourable baronet the Member for South Devon, you alluded to the increased sharpness of assessment committees; should you be astonished to hear that, in a county adjoining to your own, there has been, mainly in consequence of the increased sharpness of those committees, an increase in the rateable value of assessable property in the county from the year 1862 to the year 1868, of 730,953 l., which is at the rate of 121,825 l. a year?—I can quite conceive it possible in such a county as Durham under the assessment committee system.

3773. Chairman.] In Northumberland, is the land held chiefly under leases, or without leases?—Chiefly under leases.

3774. You stated, with regard to the increase in the rates, that the rate has very considerably increased since 1859; have you ever gone further back in your comparison?—No, I have not taken out the figures further back than that.

3775. You have not gone back as far as 1849 or 1829?—No, I began at 1851, before the Highway Act came into operation.

29 April 1870.

3776. Were there tolls in Northumberland before? — Yes, on the turnpike-roads there were.

3777. The turnpike tolls have been replaced, have they not, by the highway rate to a certain extent?—In cases where the Turnpike Acts have expired they have, of course; there are a few of those, but very few.

3778. Therefore a portion of the increased rate is compensated for by the abolition of tolls, and cannot be looked upon as increased taxation?—I do not look at it in that light; now that the tolls are abolished it all comes upon the ratepayers of the district; very likely those who paid the tolls before were not those people at all; they were people who, perhaps, paid no rates in the district, or very slight.

3779. But, as far as the farmers paid tolls they have been relieved of the tolls while they have to pay the highway rate?—Yes, but not to a commensurate extent at all.

3780. The additions partly come, do they not, from the abolition of the tolls?—A little of it, of course, but there have been very few turnpikes abolished in Northumberland. In those cases that I have mentioned toll gates still exist, and the additions come from very much increased contributions from township rates towards the turnpike trusts.

3781. To a certain extent there has been value received for the increased taxation in the form of better roads, has there not?—I cannot say that.

3782. Have the highway boards spent money without any good?—They have not, if the improvements which they contemplate, in putting the roads in better shape, ultimately come into operation, but I cannot say that we have better roads; our roads are about as bad as they can be, I think.

3783. Mr. St. Aubyn.] You have spoken of the probable position of ex officio members of the board after an alteration in the law, supposing the rate to be divided equally between the owner and the occupier; and as a consequence, the representation to be equally divided, so that the board would consist of members elected by the owners and by the occupiers, do you contemplate that there would be any ex officio members of the board at all?—No, not then, certainly not.

Captain Frederick L. Dashwood, called in; and Examined:

Captain F. L. Dashwood.

3784. Chairman.] You are a tenant farmer, are you not, in the county of Oxfordshire?—Yes, and have been for 15 years.

3785. How many acres do you farm?—About 1,100.

3786. Have you also had other experience in the management of estates?—Yes, I have.

3787. In England only?—Yes, in England only.

3788. Are you acquainted with the rating system in Ireland and Scotland, as well as the rating system in England?—I got the subject up a year ago for a paper which I read at the London Farmers' Club in April 1869, on "The System of Local Rating in England, Scotland and Ireland."

3789. But you have no practical experience in Scotland and Ireland?—Not any.

3790. Have you turned your attention to the subject of local taxation in England?—I have.

3791. Have you served as a poor law guardian?—Yes; I began as a poor law guardian.

3792. I think you are also a magistrate?—I am.

3793. Have you considered the question of the division of rate between owner and occupier?—Yes; and I am very strongly in favour of it.

3794. Will you state to the Committee the main considerations which lead you to that conclusion?—The owners of property now pay no part of the rates, and consequently they take very little interest in the question; and as to the small occupiers, without this system of half rating, it is, I believe, impossible to have a machinery which will enlist their co-operation to diminish pauperism, and to take interest in the question of primary education, in which I, as a tenant farmer, much wish to enlist the co-operation of the class, agricultural labourer.

3795. You say that they pay no part of the rates, but when leases expire, or when new arrangements are made, have they not to content themselves with a lower rent, in consequence of the higher rates?—Yes; I meant no direct payment.

3797. Whereas you would consider it desirable that they should be interested, like the occupiers, in the fluctuations of the rates?—Certainly.

3798. You think it desirable that when rates are rising, they should feel that rise at the time, and not as at present, at the conclusion of the tenancy?—Yes, at the time, so that they should co-operate with their tenants.

3799. At present, so far as your experience goes, do you find that the owners take much interest in the rates?—Very little, indeed.

3800. Is it not a grievance with the owners of property that the rates upon their property are so high as they are?—They grumble.

3801. Do you find more grumbling amongst the occupiers or amongst the owners?—Among the occupiers.

3802. Do not the rates ultimately come out of the pockets of the owners at the expiration of leases and tenancies?—In a certain proportion they do.

3803. Do you consider that it would be any relief to the occupier if a portion of the rate were put upon the owner?—It would be a relief so far, that the whole thing would be better managed, and each would see that he is mutually interested.

3804. Are you in favour of the division chiefly from the point of view of the management of the rates, or from the point of view of the pocket of the occupier?—The management of the rates. I am looking to the good of the country. The present system does not enlist the co-operation of owner and occupier.

3805. Would they be more extravagantly or more economically managed?—More economically.

3806. And more judiciously, do you think?—Yes, more judiciously; certainly; the same as we now see with respect to the county rate.

3807. Do you consider that the county rate generally is better managed by the justices of the the peace in their committees than the poor rate is managed by boards of guardians;—I think the management of the county rate is very good indeed; but it is rather an absurdity that that, over which they, the justices, have control, only constitutes one-fifth of the whole of the rates.

3808. Why is that absurd?—I think people who live in the country, or stay in country houses, often hear it said, "We must go to the quarter sessions;" it strikes one as absurd that you hear all this fuss made about going to look after this one-fifth, while, with regard to the other four-fifths, these justices know little about them, and, in fact, legislation has left these duties to the occupiers.

3809. Do you think that the ex officio members take, comparatively, less interest in the administration of the poor rate, because they are in such a minority that they cannot carry their own points?—Not that; but they do not pay it; they have nothing to do with it.

3810. But they pay the poor rates, do they not, as much as they pay the county rate?—Yes; but the county rate is referred to them to administer by the law.

3811. You mean that they have to administer the whole of the county rate; but they have only a portion of the administration of the poor-rate?—Only a portion of the administration of the poor rate.

3812. Do you think that, because they have only that portion they do not take the same trouble in the administration of that portion as they do where they have the exclusive management?—Yes.

3813. They pay both rates, therefore I do not understand why you believe that they take less interest in the management of the poor rate than in the management of the county rate?—In one case it is left entirely to them, but, in the other case, they are only ex officio members of the board.

3814. Do you think that they would take more interest if they had a different position at the boards of guardians; if they were selected by the owners, for instance?—I think they would.

3815. Are you aware that in Scotland the owners have a considerably greater share in the administration of the rates?—Yes, I know they have.

3816. Have you any knowledge upon the subject as to whether, having the administration, they take more interest in the matter, and whether they really pay attention to it?—I have learnt the system works better than with us.

3817. Does your view extend to the division betwen owner and occupier of all rates, or would you select any special rates for that division?—Of all the rates, so as to get the co-operation of the owners.

3818. Would you be in favour of putting the whole of the county rate, for instance, upon the owner?—I should not; for if I was an owner, I should like to have the assistance of my occupier.

3819. Do you think that the union of owners and occupiers in the administration is desirable in the case of all the rates?—Of all the rates, certainly.

3820. Supposing that division were not made, would you prefer that the county rate should continue to be paid by the occupier, or placed entirely upon the owner?—I should prefer half and half.

3821. Of the two alternatives, that it should be paid exclusively by the occupier, as at present, or exclusively by the owner, which would you consider the fairer?—Exclusively by the owner; but I think the owner would be the loser by losing the co-operation of his occupier.

3822. What assistance would the occupier be to the owner in the administration of the county rate?—I suppose that the quarter sessions would be elected upon a different plan than at present.

3823. You state that it is desirable that the owner should have the co-operation of the occupier in the administration of county rate; what precise advantage do you consider the owner would derive from the association with him of the occupier in the county rate?—He would get the support of his occupier. In many cases, he is on the spot, and he can give evidence, and bring his local knowledge to bear.

3824. From your experience, is there any feeling in Oxfordshire, for instance, of which you have local knowledge, as regards the exclusion of the occupiers from the county administration?—They are not at all satisfied with the county rate system.

3825. As far as you are aware, however, there is no grievance existing upon the ground that the rates are not well administered?—No; the only objection is to the way in which the county rate is administered by other parties than those who contribute to it.

3826. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do I rightly understand you to say that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst occupiers generally at present with regard to the increased and increasing amount of local rates?—Yes, there is.

3827. Are you of opinion that the owners now really pay those rates?—I think that property pays a great proportion, in the long run.

3828. Do you consider that there would be any pecuniary advantage to the occupier if that division was made, or do you think that it would simply be for the object of co-operation and good feeling?—There would be a pecuniary profit, I think, because the whole thing would be better managed.

3829. But there would be no pecuniary advantage to the occupier?—Yes, there would; but that is not my important point. I say that the present system works very badly.

3830. You think that the owner would have greater interest in all improvements?—He certainly would. Owners take very little interest now.

3831. Do not you think the fact of having a separate collection for the poor rate, and for the highway rate, and so on, is bad; and would not it be an improvement if there were only one paid collector for the whole of the rates?—Our rates are all collected together. On my farm I pay four rates a year, and they are all lumped together quarterly.

3832. But who collects them; is it not the overseer?—Yes; the parish overseer.

3833. Do not you think it would be desirable if the collector was a paid officer, instead of performing the duties gratuitously?—We in our parish pay him for doing it.

3834. But that is not quite legal, is it?—I believe not.

3835. How do you pass that payment through the audit of the board of guardians?—I cannot tell you; it does not come under that head, certainly.

Captain F. L. Dashwood.
29 April 1870.

3836. Do not you think it desirable to have a paid officer, a properly qualified man, whose employment would go on from year to year, should be appointed, instead of changing your overseer so frequently?—I think it would be better, but I cannot speak from my own experience.

3837. If the proposition were carried out of dividing the rates between the two parties, would it not be necessary to make some alteration in existing agreements as between owner and occupier?—If it was made law to-morrow, I, as an agent, should recommend my employer, with regard to all his annual tenancies, to make the alteration as soon as convenient.

3838. Would there not be a fear of making fresh valuations; for instance, in large estates they go on from year to year, and there is very little change in the rents as a general rule; but if an alteration of this kind was proposed, would there not be a fear of the landlords saying, "Well, here is an opportunity; we will have our estates re-valued"?—Yes; I think there might be that fear. I, as an agent, should not recommend an owner to take advantage of it, although some people might do so.

3839. Supposing those estates were to be re-valued, do not you think that the landlords would take care to make themselves safe by an increase of rent, in order to meet any increase in the rates during the tenancy?—It might be so; but it would soon find its level, whether the farm was worth too much or too little.

3840. Quite so, if you put it out to tender; but in large estates that is not very frequently done?—Even then there is a kind of feeling that it is not advisable to upset safe people.

3841. Still the fear would be that the landlord, in re-letting the estate, would naturally say, "I must make myself safe with regard to any increase of rates during the tenancy." Take the education rate, for instance, which we are likely to hear of, do not you think he would add something for that, with the prospect that it might be made law during his tenancy?—I think he might; but there would be very few cases of it, I think this will be determined by the question of rent.

3842. Mr. Pell.] When you say that you think there would be an advantage from the owner paying half the local taxation, or all the local taxation, upon whom do you believe the local taxation ultimately falls; who bears ultimately the burden of the rates, the owners or the occupiers?—Theoretically, the owners.

3843. It would be so ultimately, would it not, that the owners would bear it?—That is a very difficult thing to define exactly.

3844. At all events, the owner would bear a very large proportion of the rates?—He would do so certainly.

3845. But you say that under the present rrangements he takes really very little interest in the increased taxation?—Very little indeed; for it is not brought to his notice in his rent roll.

3846. But the occupier does take a considerable interest in the rates?—He does, but he feels at the same time that he has got the upper class against him as well as the lower in the administration.

3847. Apart from that he really feels the increased taxation in the first instance?—He does; and is made to oppose many improvements, such as the Union Rating and Highway Acts, as he foresees the change will increase his rates.

3848. Do you believe that a careful stimulus to administration of those rates would be given to the owner by the fact of his having to put his hand into his pocket?—I think it would.

3849. At present he is only of the contemplative class?—Yes, that is all.

3850. And if you could bring him into the immediately contributing one, then you would start his mental energies, and something beyond that possibly, as he would co-operate with the class who are at present complaining sorely against the increase of local taxation?—Yes, that is what I meant.

3851. And do you think also that you would introduce in the shape of the owning class, those who own real property, and who are from education and position more likely to administer the rates better?—Yes, they certainly would. The great difficulty of the occupier as a common guardian, is that he now feels that he has got all the highest and the lowest classes against him.

3852. Do you mean actually against him?—No, not at the board, but the feeling of the country is against him.

3853. Do you think there would be a better attendance at all boards of management, whether they were highway boards or boards of guardians, if the owner had actually to pay a portion of the tax out of his own pocket?—Certainly.

3854. Mr. Wheelhouse.] You said just now that your rates are collected together; you mean, I presume, that the parish overseer or officer takes the whole of the rates at one time?—Yes.

3855. Does he come every quarter?—Yes, every quarter.

3856. Do you think that a collection made quarterly or a collection made annually is the better?—I would rather have it quarterly than annually.

3857. You told us also that you pay your parish overseer, therefore he is your parish official to that extent?—Yes.

3858. Would it not be very much better, in your opinion, to pay an assistant overseer, who should be a permanent officer, and therefore, perhaps, a considerably more intelligent man, or else he would not have been chosen?—I think probably it may; I cannot speak from my own experience in that respect.

3859. And in all probability that would lead to a more economical administration of the rates?—Yes, I think so.

3860. Mr. Birley.] In speaking of the division of rates between the owner and the occupier, and their better administration, am I right in understanding you to mean that the management of the rates would be much more intelligent if it were superintended by the owners of property in conjunction with the occupiers, than if it were superintended by owners alone or by occupiers alone?—Certainly.

3861. And that whether it were more economical in one sense or not, that is to say whether the expenditure, larger or smaller, it would be more beneficial?—Yes, it would be more beneficial.

3862. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Supposing the rate to be divided equally between owner and occupier, you would then provide, would you not, for the fair representation of both at the various boards?—If the honourable Member means as regards owners and occupiers being represented, I have not not gone into that detail, but I suppose we have got the guide of Scotland and Ireland. I do not know how it is done there exactly; both classes certainly ought to be represented, but without ex officios. The ex officio system ought to be done away with, in my idea.

3863. Of course where there were an equal number of owners available, there would be no difficulty; but in the case of a union where the greater part of the land was in the possession of one owner, there would be a difficulty in having the board composed of an equal number of representative owners and occupiers; have you considered how you could meet that?—I think that the owner would see that he was represented; he would manage it some way or other.

3864. But if it came to a division at the board, how would you equalise the voting power?—I think that must be left to the owners to arrange somehow out of doors, as it were; but I have not considered that question.

3865. Mr. Corrance.] You have spoken of the feeling of the country as being against guardians; do you mean personally on account of their personal conduct upon the board?—No, I do not mean in that way.

3866. Do you mean as simple administrators of a certain system of relief?—Exactly so, and as the owner does not pay, he does not co-operate.

3867. You think that the feeling of the country is against the present system of Poor Law relief, as administered by the guardians?—No, not against the Poor Law system.

3868. What is the feeling of the country directed against?—Against the system of representation at the board.

3869. When you say that both high and low, rich and poor, are against the system, do you think that the owners are against the administration by the present guardians?—As a common guardian, I have felt that they were not against me personally; but they did not understand the question, and therefore I have not had their support.

3870. Then you do not think that the owners recognise the value of the services of the guardians to them as saving them the payment of surplus rates, that is to say, they do not fully recognise the immense value of the services rendered to them as absolute ratepayers, or ultimately ratepayers, by the supervision that is exercised through the guardians at the boards?—I can hardly answer that question.

3871. You do not think that the owners value the services of the board as saving their own pockets?—They do not.

3872. You are acquainted with the present system of collection; would there be any difficulty in collecting two rates at the same time under different heads by the same person?—That detail can be given on a piece of paper.

3873. It would form a subject for two slips of paper, would it not?—Only one.

3874. The same as is done in other parishes, and in London?—Yes, it is all put on one piece of paper.

3875. There would be no further expense if you collected two rates at the same time instead of one;—No, I do not see any objection to it.

3876. One collector could collect two rates at the same time, could he not?—He could do so; but there would be more expense in printing two bits of paper than one.

3877. That is very trifling, is it not?—I do not see any object in it.

3878. Supposing those rates were not levied in exactly the same way, or upon the same persons, but there was a division between those two rates, would there be any increased difficulty then?—There would.

3879. For instance, if the county rate were put upon owner and occupier, and the poor rate upon the occupier only, do you think that the collection would be more expensive?—I think it would. I should like to see all the rates collected in the first instance through the occupier, the same as is now done with the income tax.

3880. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you not think that instead of collecting the rates as you have been asked, once a year, or four times a year, it would be far better only to have two collections in the year, half yearly collections?—I think half yearly would be better.

3881. Is it not your opinion, that if the occupiers had not had the management the rates would have been higher than they are even now, and therefore there would have been a greater grievance than there is expressed at present?—I think that if the rates had been halved, and the owners had to a certain extent an acquaintance with the matter, the rates at this moment would have been a great deal lower.

3882. Chairman.] What is the ground of economy which you contemplate?—The introduction of a more lasting interest, and of a higher intelligence, with more time devoted to it.

3883. In what points is the expenditure now excessive; is there any waste through maladministration?—There is in the Poor Law department, as regards the immense quantity of out-door relief given.

3884. Mr. Walter.] Is not that out-door relief given chiefly in the shape of medical relief?—No, not in my part of England; our great grievance is in the out-door relief, which is the bane of our labouring population.

3885. Mr. Smith.] Is it your opinion that a great deal of the relief of the poor would be more economically administered parochially than by unions?—I am all in favour of union rating.

3886. Mr. Pell.] With regard to out-door relief as administered now by the occupiers chiefly, do you think that there is a tendency to administer the poor law in the direction of relief in aid of wages, and is that tendency growing?—Not directly, but indirectly; a great deal of out-door relief must lower wages, and a year ago only, I heard the vice-chairman of a board of guardians say that he would rather have high rates than high wages.

Dr. W. Neilson Hancock, called in; and Examined.

29 April 1870.

3887. Chairman.] You are the head of the Statistical Department in Ireland, are you not?—Only for some purposes; for judicial and criminal statistics, and also for the last three or four years I have been collecting the statistics of local taxation in Ireland.

3888. Do you publish annually Local Taxation Returns in Ireland, somewhat analogous to the Local Taxation Returns in England?—They were first published for the year 1865, and then for 1866, 1867, and 1868 in one volume. I was too much engaged to bring out the Report for the first year they were collected, 1865, until 1868; but they are now brought up to 1868, and I am collecting them for 1869 under the authority of the Government; they will not be out till the end of the Session.

3889. Did the preparation of those returns lead you to examine all the rates that are levied in Ireland?—Yes. My instructions were to prepare returns that would compare with the returns of the English local taxation statistics, and also to go into the whole question of local taxation in Ireland, to see if there were any taxes not included in the English returns; and it is as complete as I could make it.

3890. Are you acquainted with the mode in which they are levied?—Yes.

3891. Will you, in the first instance, enumerate the various rates that are levied in Ireland?—I will first enumerate them in large classes. The best order to take them in is by the amounts, as that gives the best conception of the importance of them. The largest local tax in Ireland is what is called the grand jury cess, which is for the year 1868, in round numbers, 1,122,000 l. The next largest is poor-rates, and burial rates levied along with the poor-rates, and that is 921,000 l. The rates for town purposes were 483,000 l.; the tolls and dues at harbours and piers, 207,000 l. Then the drainage rates and tolls on inland navigation amounted to 58,000 l. The next is the dog license duty, which is a local tax in Ireland, applied for local purposes, amounting to 24,800 l. The fines and penalties that are applied locally in Ireland and centrally in England, are 27,000 l. The Mercantile Marine Fund is 24,000 l.

3892. Why do you put that down amongst the local taxation; is it applied locally?—Yes; there is a local corporation for managing the largest part of it, and it is locally applied.

3893. What is it levied upon; is it fees or what?—The light dues for Irish lighthouses, and fees under the Merchant Shipping Act; the light dues are 20,000 l., and the balance of 4,000 l. are fees under the Merchant Shipping Act.

3894. Why were they included in the Irish Local Taxation Returns?—Because I find them included in the English returns.

3895. Does that exhaust the heads?—No; there is another very peculiar tax, and that is, fees on the sale of forfeited pledges of pawnbrokers in Dublin, and that amounts to 6,700 l.; that is a tax which was imposed by the Irish Parliament, and it is only imposed in Dublin.

3896. Could you explain a little more fully to the Committee what that is?—There are certain officers that must be employed for selling forfeited pledges; they are appointed by the corporation and the Crown, and they hold sinecure offices and appoint deputies to do the duty; the whole sum amounts to 6,700 l. a year, and that has been recommended to be abolished; but the officers are not abolished yet.

3898. Will you state, in the first instance, by whom is that levied?—That is levied territorially; there are two distinct divisions. There are certain cities in Ireland that have got the grand jury powers transferred to their town councils, and those are Dublin, Belfast, Limerick, and Cork; and in those cases the tax is levied by the town council, but in all other respects under the old law as to grand juries; in all the rest of Ireland it is levied primarily by the sessions. The applications for presentments of expenditure first come before the sessions; and then, after they are passed by the sessions, they go before the grand jury at the assizes; and then, if they are approved of by the judge in point of law, they are passed. So that they go through, first, the baronial sessions, then the grand jury, and finally they go before the judge of assize, not for discretion, but merely to allow any person of the public to object to it, if the thing is wrong in point of law.

3899. Does the judge also confirm the cess in the case of town councils?—In the case of Dublin they go partly before a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, and partly before the recorder. In Cork they go before the recorder, in Limerick before the judge of assize, and in Belfast before the judge of assize. I may mention that that is a very important machinery in our Irish administration of this large tax, and it has worked admirably; it secures the fiat of expenditure, as distinct from the audit; and that is, that no portion of this large tax, upwards of a million, nearly half of our taxation, can be spent by those local bodies if any member of the public can allege a legal objection to its expenditure. Then, on the other hand, if he does not avail himself of the public opportunity of objecting to the expenditure at the right time, and no one objects to it, the judge fiats it; and then the town council or grand jury who administer it are relieved from any responsibility of being afterwards held to be accountable for having made a mistake in law. So that it works extremely well. It secures, in the first instance, that no money is spent without proper authority; and in the next, it protects the administrators from vexatious proceedings afterwards; and there is an application by some town authorities in Ireland to have that fiat extended to all their local taxation that is not under the Poor Law Commissioners. What is under the Poor Law Commissioners has really a fiat, because if the guardians do anything with the approval of the Commissioners, that amounts to a very substantial protection to them; but some town authorities are anxious to have this system of fiat extended to all their proceedings; and it is under the consideration of the Government

Government at this moment whether it should not be extended to them.

3900. Will you state the purposes to which the county cess is applied?—The purposes to which it is applied are: new roads and bridges, repairs of roads and bridges, court-houses and gaols, county infirmaries, lunatic asylums, and diocesan schools. I may mention that the last-mentioned tax will come to an end under the operation of the Church Act; but it is a curious thing, as a matter of history, now that local taxation is prepared for England, to find a local educational rate that has existed in Ireland since the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Then there are county officers' salaries, police, the cost of valuation, compensation for malicious injuries, and inland navigation.

3901. Have you at all examined as to whether there are any purposes to which the county cess is applied in Ireland to which the county rate is not applied in England; has your attention been called to any discrepancies between the two?—No, I have not examined it critically. The Committee might like to know the proportions of those different figures. The largest item of all is the repairs of roads and bridges, 551,000 l.

3902. In round numbers, about half?—Yes; I may mention that the reason of that is that we have abolished all our turnpikes.

3903. Can you state how much of the total was for each of those two items?—No, I have not gone into that.

3905. Will you state the mode in which the county cess is levied?—The county cess in Ireland is paid by the occupier of lands and houses, and railways and canal tolls are liable to it. It is not divided between landlord and tenant, but is paid entirely by the occupier, and it is collected to the lowest fraction, except in certain towns; but in the country it is put down at the smallest figure by the occupier; it is collected by the barony constables who are appointed by the grand jury, and, except in Dublin and Belfast, it is entirely separated in its collection from the poor rate.

3906. Does the county cess, from its mode of collection, and from the other circumstances connected with it, give rise to much dissatisfaction amongst the small occupiers?—There is a very strong feeling that it should be divided in the same way as the poor rate, and a Committee of the House of Commons have recommended that division to take place.

3907. I suppose that the fact that the poor rate is divided between the landlord and tenant has given rather a stimulus to occupiers who alone pay the county cess, to think that the fairer way would be to divide it between the two?—That is their feeling; but what I think is a much stronger feeling is, that in the administration of the poor rate the taxpayers are represented, and in the county cess they are not represented.

3908. What is the relation of the road sessions to the baronial sessions for the purposes of county cess?—They are different names for the same sessions; they are really baronial sessions, but they are called road sessions, because, as you see, the principal expenditure is on the roads.

3909. Can you state how the ratepayers are represented?—They are not really represented at all in any true system of representation. The grand jury at the assizes select, out of 100 of the highest cesspayers in the barony, a certain number of names that they choose from, and those names are chosen what are called associated cesspayers; they are cesspayers, as a matter of fact, but they are not selected by the cesspayers, they are nominated by the grand jury, and they must select them out of the first 100 highest on the list. When they come to the sessions, those who are to form part of the court are selected by ballot, and the result of that is that there is no one certain of forming part of the court, and very often they do not attend, because a man does not like to go the whole way to be at the sessions when it is a perfect lottery whether he is to be part of the court or not.

3910. How many cesspayers go?—There are no statistics of the numbers made up, it cannot exceed 12 at each sessions.

3911. Is it a large number?—No; but then the magistrates, as ex-officio members, form part of the court, and they may attend from the whole county whether they are interested in property in the barony or not, and they may outvote the cesspayers.

3912. Are the Committee to understand that the names of the first highest cesspayers are taken up to 100?—Yes, and out of those the grand jury select.

3913. Then those selected by the grand jury do not all attend; a certain number are taken from them by ballot?—The ballot is held by the chairman of the court. When the court sits he ballots for names for the number that are to sit, and the result is that no one, when he goes to the court, is certain that he will form part of the court.

3914. How do you mean that they go to the court?—A certain number of cesspayers go, but they are not certain to form part of the court; nobody goes except they are named, but of those named they are not certain who will be called upon to form part of the court.

3915. There are three processes; in the first instance they get a list of 100 cesspayers who pay the most rates, and then, from those 100, a certain number are nominated by the grand jury?—Yes.

3916. And of that certain number so nominated only a portion sit, who are selected by ballot?—Yes; only half the number nominated can sit, and and that half must be some number fixed by the grand jury between 5 and 12.

29 April, 1870.

3917. The whole of those that are nominated are not required to attend?—No; the rest of the board consists in the number of magistrates that may attend, and the result is that the magistrates of the whole county, though not interested in property in the barony, may attend and outvote the cesspayers. Therefore, the only thing that the cesspayer does is to secure publicity; everything must be explained and done in public, but as to securing any real voting it does not do so.

3918. But such as it is the cesspayers have that representation in Ireland, whereas they have none at all in England?—So far; but then along with that there was started in 1836, two years after the Poor Law was passed, the system of giving the ratepayers perfect representation at the board of guardians. I believe the Poor Law has worked most satisfactorily, and the desire is to have that system which has worked satisfactorily extended to other local arrangements.

3919. Are the Poor Law guardians elected much upon the same principle as in England, or how are they elected?—Ireland is divided into 163 unions, and it is sub-divided into electoral divisions; and the effect of that sub-division is to give about 21 electoral divisions to each board, and then there are about 24 guardians elected; large districts have two or three members, and that gives about 24 elected guardians to each elected board.

3920. Is an electoral division equivalent to our parish?—It is equivalent to a very large parish, or two or three small parishes. Along with them the magistrates may sit as ex-officio members, provided they do not exceed the number elected. In fact, they form all over Ireland about the proportion of 21 to 24, so that in most of the boards they are exactly equal to the elected. I should mention that besides the ex-officio representation, property is very largely represented in the elected part of the board, because, first of all, all owners of property vote as well as occupiers; the occupier votes and the owner votes besides in respect of the same tenement; the occupier on his valuation, and the owner on his rent. Then they have multiple votes, from one to six votes, according to the valuation; for 200 l. and upwards they have six votes, and there is a scale below that to persons with one vote. Wherever property is much subdivided, as in the city of Dublin, for instance, where there are a great number of landlords, that system gives the owners of property an overwhelming preponderance at the board; so that, between getting half the board as ex-officio members and the property votes, it gives property a preponderance, wherever property is much divided; but it does not work unequally where property is not much divided.

3921. May the Committee understand this, that supposing a man has got six houses he might have 36 votes?—No.

3922. He can never have more than six?—No; not in the same electoral division or ward in a town.

3923. The maximum that a man can have, even if he has several tenements, would be six votes?—Yes; he might have six votes in every electoral division in the union, if his property extended to it; but in one electoral division, he has only six votes.

3924. Supposing that a man occupies his own house, does he have a vote both as owner and occupier?—No, because he gets no rent from himself; he votes as an occupier.

3926. Then the sub-division of property has this effect, that if there are a certain number of owners owning a certain number of houses, the addition of six votes to each owner would give a larger number of owners' votes, than if one owner held them all?—If one owner has property worth 10,000 l. a year, he only has six votes if it is all in one electoral division; but if there are a number of proprietors of 500 l. a year each, they have each six votes.

3927. I presume that in the towns property is more sub-divided than in the country?—A great deal more sub-divided.

3928. As a matter of fact, do the owners, as far as you are aware, exercise their voting powers in the towns?—Most carefully; the effect of the division of rate is all that people anticipate from it in England; and that has led me to a very strong feeling in favour of division. The division of the rate between the parties has led to the most economical management of the Poor Law, that is to say, parties feel the deepest interest in the expenditure, there are no people that feel more interest in it than the owners of property.

3929. They do not neglect their votes, feeling that they are swamped by the occupiers; but as a matter of fact, they do exercise their privilege of voting, wherever there is any chance of influencing the election?—They do; of course, if they see that taking trouble about it would not turn the voting, they do not do it; but the division of rating has the effect of making them watch the expenditure, and attend most zealously to the management of the Poor Law.

3930. Is the poor rate in Ireland devoted to any other purposes except poor relief?—The total Poor Law expenditure in the year 1868, exclusive of balances, was 847,000 l.; and for direct poor relief, it was 707,000 l.; we have a complete system of dispensaries and medical officers all over Ireland, much more than is the case in England; and the expense under the Medical Charities Act, in the year 1868, came to 121,000 l.; the burial board expenses came to 2,000 l.; the board of guardians are burial boards in all cases except within towns under town authorities. Then there was 12,000 l. for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages; and under the Sanitary Acts, the expenditure was 3,000 l. The guardians are the sewer and nuisance authority in every place outside town government, and the sum they spent was 4,000 l.; the guardians are the diseases prevention authorities in all Ireland. In 1867 we had an attack of cholera, and they spent 15,000 l. in that one year; but the ordinary expenditure for diseases prevention, is only about 200 l. The cattle plague expenditure was all met out of the poor rate; and the tax for that in the year 1866 came to 13,000 l. Then, with regard to the classification of the poor rates, the 707,000 l. is divided in this way; in-maintenance 436,000 l.; out-door relief 44,000 l.; salaries and rations of officers 108,000 l.; and all other expenses 110,000 l.

3931. Are all those items which you enumerated before, and which you have now given us the ıe detail, collected and administered by the ıe boards of guardians?—Yes.

3932. They do not pay out those sums to others ho administer them, but, as I understand, they dminister them themselves?—All of them, exept the cattle plague expenses, they administer ıemselves.

3933. Have you got that system in Ireland hich we have in England, that a certain number f other rates are paid out of the poor rate?—o; our most ancient rate was the grand jury ess, and the practice has been hitherto to put verything on the grand jury cess; there is no ther source from which an expense is to be de-ayed; it is made payable from the grand jury ess.

3934. In Ireland the grand jury cess stood in ıe same relation that the poor rate did in Eng-ınd?—Yes; a very large part of the grand ıry cess is what is called imperative present-ıents; that is to say, the Lord Lieutenant of reland, or other prescribed authority, certifies hat is to be paid, and the grand jury have no iscretion; they must pay the money.

3935-6. The boards of guardians are the autho-ity for the Diseases Prevention Acts, are they ot?—Yes; we are under the Sanitary Act of 866, which was extended to Ireland. Whenever ne Lord Lieutenant declares it necessary to have hat are called the diseases prevention powers f that Act put in force, the boards of guardians ll over Ireland have authority to carry it out; ut it is a temporary measure; it is only put in orce for a time.

3937. It is like an Order in Council?—Yes; is similar to an Order in Council in England.

3938. As regards the rates for town purposes; ill you state by whom they are levied?—The own authorities in Ireland are all similar to the own authorities in England. We have in large owns town councils, and in small towns we have own commissioners.

3939. The town commissioners being equiva-ent to our local commissioners and improvement oards?—Yes; they are similar to them. Then ve have lighting and cleansing commissioners, imilar to those that were under the old private Acts in England, with limited powers. They ıre under the old Act of 1829, and they have ıot adopted the new law yet. Then there are ome commissioners in townships under special Acts, which are like the suburban commissioners n England. I may also say that there are some peculiar rates in the city of Dublin.

3940. Generally speaking, are those town councils and commissioners appointed pretty much in the same way as in England?—Exactly; hey were all copied from the English law a good many years ago, and we are working under the aw of England of about the year 1854. We have ıot as yet got the benefit of the Local Govern-ment Act of 1858 or of 1861, but there has been ın application pending before the Government ıow to bring our town government up to the evel of the English town government.

3941. What rates do those various bodies levy; irst of all, do town councillors levy a borough ate?—Yes. Take the town council of Dublin; hey levy what is called an improvement rate, ıot a borough rate. Then, besides that, they evy a sewer rate; they levy grand jury cess in he city of Dublin; and they levy a domestic vater rate, and a public water rate.

3942. Those are, in fact, the town purposes; rates in boroughs governed by town councils?—Yes; the reason I mention Dublin is, that we have carried out the consolidation of the collection of rates, which has worked very satisfactorily there. Another rate in Dublin is the police tax. Our police are formed upon the model of the London Metropolitan Police, and we have the same scale of taxation as they have; that is to say, 8 d. in the pound, a fixed tax; but that is considered not so good an arrangement as the more modern arrangement of dividing the proportion between the general and local taxes, because the effect of that is that no one in Dublin has any interest except in increasing the number of the police, because he pays his 8 d., and the more police he has the better he is protected. With regard to the police, the English and Scotch towns have been formed upon a more recent basis, the plan being to divide the rate, the central government paying a fixed proportion, and that gives both parties an interest in keeping down the number. There are two other peculiar taxes in Dublin; and those are the carriage duty, 5,200 l., which is somewhat similar to the carriage duty in London; and then there is pawnbrokers' licenses, 5,900 l.

3943. Those two taxes are in addition to the list which you gave us before?—Yes, and besides those there are publicans' certificates, 600 l.

3944. The improvement rate of Dublin amounts to 2 s. in the pound, does it not?—Yes; it is limited by statute to that.

3945. They have power to spend 2 s. in improvements?—Yes, not more.

3946. Do they spend that 2 s.?—Yes.

3947. They spend up to the maximum?—Yes.

3948. With regard to the poor rate in the South Dublin Union, what is that?—In that particular year it amounted to 2 s.; it may be anything.

3949. The grand jury cess was how much?—1 s. 8 d., the police tax was 8 d., the sewer rate was 4 d., the domestic water rate 1 s., and the public water rate 3 d.

3950. What does that give as the total in the pound?—7 s. 11 d. in the pound.

3951. And without the water rate how much?—Without the water rate it gives 6 s. 8 d.

3952. Is there much complaint of that taxation; is it considered very high?—It is considered high; but on the other hand the valuation is on a different plan from the valuation in England.

3953. So that practically it does not represent the same amount; you only change your valuation once in 14 years, I believe?—But there is a different point in that. In the original Poor Law Act there was a different rule laid down for valuing in Ireland to that in England; for instance, in England you only deduct from the net annual value the tenant's taxes, but in Ireland the landlord pays half the poor rate, and his whole taxation is deducted.

3954. As regards Dublin, the grand jury cess is paid by the occupier, and the poor rate is paid half by the owner and half by the occupier; but you collect the whole from the occupier?—Above 8 l. you do; under 8 l. in Dublin the landlord is liable for the whole of the poor rate.

3955. In the rest of the country it is under 4 l. that the landlord pays the whole?—Yes.

3956. For the county cess he is not liable, I believe?—No.

29 April 1870.

3957. Is this the case in Dublin, that the collector goes to the landlord for the poor rate, and to the occupier for the county cess?—No, I think not in Dublin, because that is regulated by a special Act.

3958. In what do they differ?—I could not state that; there was a special Act passed for Dublin with regard to that.

3959. I see by the demand note that they are all collected and paid together?—I cannot quite explain that.

3960. As to the town commissioners in the smaller towns, are the rates which they levy analogous to those in Dublin, excepting the grand jury cess?—No; where there are town commissioners the right of levy is simply for town purposes; they have no powers beyond that. There is a special peculiarity about that, which should be mentioned; and that is, that it is not levied on a uniform valuation.

3961. Is the public improvement rate in Dublin levied on a uniform valuation?—It is; but in the smaller towns there is this exception, that arable land, meadow, park ground, market gardens, nursery ground, canals, and railways, are only charged on one-fourth of their value. Then the peculiarity of lighting and cleansing towns is that they have an exceptional scale of rating; that is to say, houses under 5*l.* are exempted altogether, and the proprietor is not liable. It is an old exemption, which obtains in 17 towns under lighting and cleansing commissioners.

3962. Do the town commissioners levy any rate except the improvement rate?—No.

3963. Do they levy water rate?—That is part of their power; they may levy a special water rate; but they do not generally do it.

3964. Do they levy a police rate?—No; the police is paid out of the county cess.

3965. Is Dublin the only town which pays the police rate?—Dublin and Belfast also are under special police arrangements.

3966. Do the town commissioners pay the sewerage out of the improvement rate, or do they levy a special sewer rate?—They pay it out of the improvement rate.

3967. As I understand, while in Dublin there are those various rates which you have enumerated, in the towns under town commissioners they have only a single rate besides the water rate?—They have; but then they pay the county cess as part of the county, and they pay the poor rate.

3968. But the commissioners have nothing to do with that at all?—No.

3969. Is there any system of compounding?—I believe not in practice.

3970. As regards the Lighting and Cleansing Commissioners, what rates do they levy?—They levy a rate for lighting, cleansing, and watching.

3972. Are we to understand this, that in the towns under lighting and cleansing commissioners, the whole of the houses under 5*l.* pay nothing; but above that there is a scale, and houses up to certain figures pay less then those above them?—Yes.

3973. Does the same difference in the assessment hold good as regards the one-fourth which is paid by arable land?—No, it does not hold good in such a case; that is only in towns under town commissioners.

3974. Are there any other peculiarities connected with the Lighting and Cleansing Commissioners that you have to mention to the Committee?—No.

3975. The next are commissioners under special Acts; is there anything worth mentioning to the Committee with regard to them?—No, there is only one special case, and that is the county of the town of Carrickfergus. They are under municipal commissioners that were intended to be a temporary body when the corporation was abolished, until the new commissioners should be elected; but the inhabitants have refused to elect new commissioners, and they are still continuing to exercise their powers; but they want to get that remedied by having the provisions of the Local Government Act of 1858 extended to Ireland; that is to say, that the commissioners, by a majority may adopt the powers of the Town Improvement Act, whereas in Ireland, you must get the vote of the inhabitants, so that that has prevented the Act being adopted in that town.

3976. By whom are the drainage rates administered?—The drainage rates are administered by boards of districts elected by parties interested in the drainage. I might mention that in consequence of the very small amount of the maintenance rates, it would be very much better managed if it were handed over to some other local board to manage; it is not a large enough matter, except in a very large district, to make it a sufficient business for a board, and it is not well managed.

3977. What is the rate in the pound of local taxes in Ireland?—The rate in the pound, of all those local taxes which I have mentioned, is 4*s.* 3¼*d.* in the pound, and the rate in England is 4*s.* in the pound.

3978. It must be borne in mind, must it not, that valuations in Ireland are considerably under the mark?—Yes.

3979. Because you do not revalue every year?—No; and more than that, the valuation is not under the same words.

3980. Therefore the comparison of the rate in the pound is not a fair comparison?—No.

3981. Do you consider that the division of the rate between owner and occupier has worked well in Ireland as regards the poor rate?—Yes, certainly; and the universal feeling in Ireland is that the same system should be extended to all local purposes.

3982. Is that feeling universal amongst owners as well as the rest of the public?—I believe they do not object to it; a Select Committee of the House of Commons adopted it last Session.

3983. Would you say that Ireland generally adopts, as a universal opinion, the decision of a Select Committee of the House of Commons?—I mention that to show that it was not merely a popular demand outside, but that a Committee of the House were unanimous about it.

3984. Is there any feeling on the part of owners in Ireland against it?—I believe not. I might mention with regard to that division, that there there is one point which occurred to me, viz., that is, of course it is only proposed to apply to new lettings; but there is a very simple way of applying it to all lettings without the slightest injustice, and that is by taking the average of the tax for three, five, or seven years back, whichever was thought to be right, and in all past contracts to add that to the rent, and divide the liability for the future.

3985. The contract being that the tenant should bear the burthen of any fluctuations, would the landlord consider it to be fair that, having been covered by that contract against any future increase during the currency of the lease, he might nevertheless have to pay the excess for the future?—On the other hand, that policy will not come into work for many years. If it is a matter of policy to have both parties really interested in the thing, the policy will not come into work for many years.

3986. Sir Massey Lopes.] You stated just now that in your opinion the owners would not at all object to this division of rates; have you any authority for stating that; are you not speaking more of the mind of the occupiers than of that of the owners?—I take the Select Committee of the House of Commons as my guide.

3987. But have you any authority for making the statement you have done, that the owners in Ireland would not object to this division of rates?—I have no authority beyond this, that it has been very much discussed, and there has been no strong objection, that I am aware of, made to it; I never heard any strong objection made to it; of course they would object to its applying to past contracts, but provided it only applied to future contracts, they would not object.

3988. I thought taxation in Ireland had very much increased of late years, and I think you stated that you had no figures previous to the year 1865?—The statistics have not been collected on a uniform plan before 1865.

3989. We will take the years 1867 and 1868; has there been any very considerable increase in the amount of local taxation as between those two last years in your return?—About 200,000 l.

3990. So that in one year the increase of local taxation in Ireland has exceeded 200,000 l.?—Yes.

3991. You mentioned just now that the poundage valuation of rates in Ireland is 4 s. 5 d., while in England it is only 4 s.; can you account for that in this way, that in England we have a revaluation of all lands once in three years, but in Ireland you have only a revaluation once in 14 years?—Not even so often as that; and besides, the principle of valuation is different. In Ireland they are bound to take in the prices of produce, and in England they take the net value.

3992. So that, in Ireland, if an occupier expended 1,000 l. on his holding, he would have nothing beyond to pay in rates till his tenement or his land is valued 14 years to come, whereas in England, if he expends 1,000 l. upon his holding he has to pay increased rates upon it after the third year at the furthest?—That only applies to land.

3993. In the case of buildings on land, how is it?—In the case of buildings in towns they are revised or may be revised every year.

3994. Chairman.] If a man puts farm buildings up on his farm to the value of 1,000 l., are they valued the next year?—No; not for seven years. Buildings in general are liable to be valued, but farm buildings cannot be valued for seven years after being erected.

3995. But, practically, are they?—I do not know the extent to which that revaluation is carried out in the country; it is carried out now very sharply in towns.

3996. They are legally liable to be revalued?—Yes.

3997. Sir Massey Lopes.] What is your local taxation per head in Ireland?—The local taxation in Ireland is only 9 s. 2 d. per head.

3998. What is it in England?—£. 1 – s. 3 d. per head.

3999. Then it is more than double in England to what it is in Ireland?—Yes.

4000. I think I understood you to say that the police in Ireland are paid from the Imperial Exchequer?—Yes.

4001. I think you told us that when free trade was established in this country, the payment for the police in Ireland was considered a compensation for any loss accruing from free trade to that country?—It was so given out by Sir Robert Peel in 1846. Formerly we paid one-half, and that half was given up as a charge.

4002. Then Ireland got some compensation for free trade, while England got none?—Yes, to some extent. I will give the figures, to show the proportion. The cost of the Royal Irish constabulary was 810,000 l., and of that Her Majesty's Treasury are charged with 781,000 l.

4003. Then half 781,000 l. per annum or 390,000 l. is the compensation which Ireland got for adopting free trade?—Yes; the Dublin metropolis police cost 93,000 l.; of that the Treasury paid 51,000 l., and from all other local sources, 41,000 l.

4004. What is the total amount which the Imperial Legislature pays for the police in Ireland?—They pay 832,000 l.

4005. That is the sum total which they pay?—Yes.

4006. And that is the compensation which Ireland got for the adoption of free trade?—No, only half of it. In England and Wales the cost of the police is 1,920,000 l., and of that the general taxpayers pay 457,000 l., and from local sources 1,463,000 l. is paid.

4007. I think you said that the charges for infirmaries and lunatic asylums are paid by the occupiers?—Yes, entirely by the occupiers.

4008. And they amount to 107,000 l.?—Yes.

4009. Was not it proposed last year that those being national purposes should be paid from another fund?—It was proposed that those being charitable purposes and paid out of a tax that falls principally on the poor, it would be a good application of the surplus Irish Church funds.

4010. Mr. Seely.] You stated that you thought that the Poor Law in Ireland worked extremely well; will you state what you meant by the term "Well"?—I mean that the collection and audit, and administration of the money, is extremely well done. I did not speak in the least as to relief. I looked at it merely as a mode of collecting and administering taxation; not in the least as to the Poor Law question.

4011. You do not mean economically when you speak of its working well?—Yes, I do. I do not consider it as any question of policy as to outdoor relief or indoor relief, but as a simple official management of 800,000 l. to 900,000 l. of public taxation. I believe it is well and prudently and economically managed, and carefully watched. It shows that a representative board, in managing the fund that is charged equally between landlord and tenant, is successful as an administrative board, and that that same principle could be advantageously applied to other local taxes.

4012. Mr. Birley.] I understood you to say that you believed that the owners were quite willing to accept the principle of half the rate being paid in future arrangements by the owner, and half by the occupier?—What I meant to convey was, that I have heard no strong opposition to it.

4013. Has it occurred to you that the owners would have any collateral benefit by such an arrangement, because persons do not usually desire to pay money unless at least they get some collateral benefit?—They would really get it in increased rent; it would be merely a mode of collecting money.

4014. Do you think that the amount would be added to the rent?—Yes, it would; it would not vary; the burthen of it is merely a mode of administration.

4015. Mr. Corrance.] I find that, deducting the highway rate from the county cess, it amounts to only 561,000*l.*, and the poor rate stands at 921,000*l.* This proportion, of course, is very different from what exists in England, namely, that the poor rate stands at 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound, while the whole of the county rate, including nearly the same items, is only 2*d.* or 3*d.* in the pound; perhaps you can give us some explanation of that remarkable fact?—That is from the extraordinary amount of outdoor relief that you give in England. In 1867, out of 931,000 persons receiving relief in England, 137,000 received indoor relief, and 794,000 received outdoor relief. This would give, for a portion of the population of England and Wales equal to that of Ireland, 238,850, with 35,208 indoor, and 203,650 out; but the average daily number relieved in Ireland in 1868–9 was 70,619, in all 53,757 in workhouses, and 16,862 outdoor, so the workhouse relief in Ireland was 18,000 above the corresponding proportion of the population in England in 1867; and the outdoor relief was 186,000 below it.

4016. You attribute it entirely to that fact?—I believe so, to the more liberal outdoor relief in England.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir JOHN THWAITES, Knight, Examined.

Sir J. Thwaites.

3 May 1870.

4017. Chairman.] YOU have given considerable attention, have you not, in your position as Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, to the subject of local rating?—Yes, as affecting the metropolis.

4018. I think the question of rating the owner for a portion of the rates has suggested itself to your mind?—Yes.

4019. If I remember rightly, in some of the reports of the Metropolitan Board of Works, or in some evidence that you have given, you stated that opinion?—Yes; I gave evidence before a Committee in 1866 and 1867 on that question, and the Committee reported to the House in favour of the principle of charging the owner with a portion of the municipal burthen.

4020. Whom did the Committee mean by the owner; was that point considered at all by the Committee, whether the receiver of the rack-rent, or the ground landlord?—Probably my answer on that occasion I might repeat now, as it will really answer the question which you have raised: "I therefore suggest that the Board should have power to levy, I will not call it a property rate, but a rate on property; and that all proprietors, whatever interest they may enjoy in any property, should pay in proportion to the interest which they have; and that it shall not be lawful for them to object, or to cast that burden on the occupier; and that the principle to be adopted should follow the practice in respect of the property tax, where it is not lawful for the landlord to compel the tenant to pay; you would then take the property at this rate, namely, at its full net annual value, and you would travel down, catching every interest, whether it was to a mortgagee, or a person who has a beneficial lease, until you come to the ground landlord, each party paying in proportion to the property or interest which he might have in the building."

4021. In fact, you would settle the question as to who is the owner in the same way as it is settled with the income tax, you would tax every one who has a beneficial interest?—Yes; if, for example, a house built on ground paying a ground-rent of 20 l. a year is let to A., the lessee, and he builds on that ground, and lets it for 150 l. a year; B., the ground landlord, would pay on the 20 l., and A., the lessee, would pay on the 150 l., and any further beneficial interest that might be created.

4022. Have you considered that that plan should be adopted for any particular rate that you had in view?—I was giving evidence in favour of another form of taxation for the metropolis for metropolitan purposes; it had nothing whatever to do with the parochial rating, but for municipal purposes.

4023. Was it your view that it was to be a new rate; not in substitution of existing rates?—I proposed that one moiety should be cast upon the owner, and the other upon the occupier.

4024. That is to say, one moiety of the rates levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works?—Yes, the improvement rates.

4025. Did you consider at that time whether you would put that improvement rate upon existing ground rents?—Yes, I proposed that it should be universal in its application.

4026. Did you consider the point as to how far such an enactment would have contravened contracts which stated that all rates and taxes should be paid by the tenants?—Yes; I proposed that it should be partly a new liability on the owner. Having regard to the enormous improvements that have been carried out, and must shortly be carried out in the metropolis, and the amount of taxation that must necessarily follow, it appeared to me to be a just principle to call upon the owners to bear a portion of the municipal burden; first, because they so greatly benefit by the metropolitan expenditure that although leases might still be running, and have to run for 20 or 30 years, the value of the reversion to the owner was considerable, and the property greatly improved, and it appeared to me perfectly just that the owner should bear a portion of the burden.

4027. Those were your reasons for making the Act as it were retrospective; will you state generally what your views are as regards the fairness and the expediency of taxing the owner?—For the reasons that I have given, that the owner greatly benefits by the expenditure, and every reletting improves the beneficial interest that the owner has in obtaining a larger rental. For example, you cannot improve the sanitary condition of any town, improve its roads, and embellish that town, without increasing the value of property proportionately, and it is a hard case to cast the whole burthen upon the occupier, which seems to be the tendency of recent legislation, and also the tendency of private agreements between landlord and tenant.

4028. But would your remark as regards the taxation of the owner, be confined generally to rates which would cover the expenditure made for the purpose of improvement?—It was to that point that my attention was particularly called, and on that point I gave evidence.

4029. Your evidence so far goes to the point of that which is spent in the improvement of the metropolis; not money spent in the discharge of burdens such as the poor rate, and others?—It is quite clear that in the one case the property of the owner is greatly improved in value by the expenditure for metropolitan improvements, but in the other case in the expenditure for the relief of the poor, property is not improved.

4030. Therefore those two classes of rates stand upon a different footing?—Quite so.

4031. Would you maintain that nearly all the improvements made in the metropolis, although desirable in themselves, actually improve the property to that extent that it would command a higher rent?—I was speaking generally; of course there are exceptions as to locality, but generally speaking the improvement of a town by widening its roads, and forming new ones, and improving its sanitary condition, must greatly improve the value of property.

4032. We will take as an illustration the case of the Thames Embankment; what would be your views as to the taxation, say of the owners or the occupiers in Bethnal Green?—We must take a comprehensive view of the metropolis; if you break up the metropolis into sections, and ask me abstract questions, whether section A. will benefit equally with section B., there may be some difference of opinion; but we must deal with the metropolis as a whole, as one large town covered by an immense number of houses, and a population of 3,000,000 of people, and that what generally will improve the health of that vast population, and facilitate the traffic in the public streets, and promote the extension of commerce, must be a great benefit to the town as a whole.

4033. Would you consider it a fair argument to say that it is the occupiers, who, during their occupation, mainly enjoy the advantages secured by those improvements, and that it is they who ought to pay?—Not exclusively, certainly.

4034. They do clearly enjoy a certain share of advantages during the pendency of their lease?—Yes, to the extent of one-half, according to the evidence which I have given.

4035. So that you rest your view upon the double assumption that the occupiers gain the advantage during their temporary occupancies, and the owners gain a permanent advantage by the improvement of the town in which their property is situate?—Yes.

4036. Do you think if a clause were to be introduced into an Act prohibiting the landlords from contracting with their tenants that the tenants should pay the rates, such a clause would remain a dead letter?—No, I do not.

4037. On what do you ground that view?—I think that the question of rates, although in some cases it may be a consideration in the re-letting, as a rule is not a consideration with the landlord, nor is it a special consideration with the tenant. I believe that those renewals take place, disregarding, in a great measure, the increase or decrease of the taxation. Of course where you have a man who very carefully looks at the matter, he says, "I must have a larger rent if an additional burden is cast upon me;" but I do not think that those exceptions will destroy the rule which prevails, from my observation that landlords are not guided by the question of rating, nor are tenants guided absolutely by the question of rating. It is rather a tax upon their profit than considered as a part of the rental.

4038. Whose profit?—The profit of the occupier. I can give an instance in my own case. I rented a house of 280 l. a-year, covenanting to pay in the ordinary way the sewers rate and the land tax. I did not make inquiry as to what the amount of the land tax was at the time, but I found shortly afterwards that the land tax was 2 s. 10½ d. in the pound, therefore I had to pay a very large amount for land tax; it was no part of the rental, nor any part of the consideration, but it was actually out of my own property that I paid it.

4039. That 2 s. 10½ d. in the pound made almost a difference of 15 per cent. more?—Yes; there are a variety of questions that determine the rental. If it should be business premises, of course there are many considerations. The actual value of the house may be a small matter as compared with other elements, that a commercial man would have regard to.

4040. Do your remarks with regard to the rates being omitted from consideration in taking a house, apply chiefly to residential property in the west end, or to business property, or to property in the east end?—My remarks apply in a general way; I do not think that any of the large proprietors, for example, to whom my attention was directed in the consideration of the metropolitan taxation, and a more equitable basis on which the metropolitan fund might be raised, are in the habit of dealing with the mere question of whether the rates have been increased a penny in the pound, or decreased a penny in the pound; but it is simply a question of the improvement, and if the general improvement of the metropolis has increased the value, then the value of property in the metropolis has naturally risen at the period of re-letting; but I do not think, as it has been alleged, that the question of rates affects very much either the tenant or the landlord in entering into a second agreement.

4041. Can you state to the Committee quite roughly the average rate in the pound of all the rates in the metropolis; would it be 4 s. in the pound?—I am unable to say it off-hand; my observations apply to the metropolitan improvements which, as you are aware, constitute a very small portion of the taxation of the metropolis.

4042. But your observations, so far as they proceed upon general grounds, would apply, would they not, to all rates; that is to say, in your evidence you have not assumed that persons taking houses would omit from consideration the improvement rate, but that they would consider the other rates; your remarks apply generally to all taxation, I presume?—For example, if there is a heavy poor rate upon a particular district, and that district is notorious for its high taxation, you would have a diminished rent as a consequence;

quence; but that is not a direct hardship upon the owner, because those things are not brought about in 10 years, but are the result of ages in many cases; where you have parish A. highly rated, and parish B. lightly rated, the owner in parish B. purchases on the principle of a higher rent, by reason of the condition of the rating in that particular parish, and the owner in parish A. purchases on the condition that the rate is excessive; therefore it averages itself in time.

4043. Do you assent to the view that it is fair to take the whole of the rates falling upon a house as paid by the occupier of that house?—I think, as a general answer, I believe that that is mainly so; the occupier does pay the rates.

4044. And the whole rate?—Yes; and I think those rates are paid not in the shape of rent, or a reduction of rent, but in most cases they are paid out of the capital of the tenant, or that which ought to be the accruing capital.

4045. Take this case to test your answer; supposing there to be a house let from week to week, on which there is a rate in the pound of 5 s., and that rate then to be swept away, and the house to be relieved of that rate, would the owner raise the rent or not?—If the tenant were relieved from that charge, probably some shrewd owner would suppose that he had a right to raise the rent and would adopt that course, but there are many owners who would never enter into the question at all of the increase or decrease of rating.

4046. But in a highly rated parish, if by any legislation, or otherwise, the rates were lowered, would not that tend to increase the rents; would there not be more margin for profit for the owner?—Probably that would be so. Take for instance, Lowndes-square, to which reference has been made; all the houses on one side of the square are in Chelsea, and on the other in St. George, Hanover-square; the one is highly rated, and the other is very moderately rated, as we know. The variation of the rental on the one side and the other is marked undoubtedly, and due to that fact in a great measure.

4047. We will take the east end of London; supposing that a man is paying 5 s. a week for his rooms in the east end, and his landlord is paying the rates for him, if the landlord were relieved of those rates, would the tenant get any advantage?—That would depend on competition; it would balance itself in time; perhaps there would be no immediate relief, but if it were general, of course it could not get relieved, unless the whole district were relieved, and then competition would enter into play, and relieve the tenant from the conduct of the landlord.

4048. Do you dissent from the view that ultimately, as the phrase has generally been, the rates come from the pocket of the owner?—Yes, certainly I dissent from that.

4049. And do you think, therefore, that the arguments which have been built upon that view, namely, that it is unfair to readjust the taxation in various districts, as you would only relieve one at the expense of the other, are fallacious?—I think so. I am speaking generally; there are, of course, exceptions; some landlords are so wide awake to their own interest that they will take advantage of every penny, but I am speaking generally.

4050. Could the landlords, in your view, universally take advantage of it if they chose?—They are doing so now, and that is one of the grievances that I suggest this remedy for, namely, that they are seeking practically to cast the burden upon the occupier by covenants. Let us take any one of the large proprietors in this metropolis, the Duke of Bedford or the Marquis of Westminster, or any of the large proprietors. Supposing leases were granted for 50 years, 20 of which are expired, would anyone suppose that those lessees at the time when those leases were granted in which they convenanted to pay the sewers rate, for example, could have contemplated the expenditure, or the special charge which has been cast upon that rate of 3 d. in the pound for main drainage purposes. It is quite clear that it never entered into the consideration of A. and B. contracting 20 years prior to that imposition by Parliament, and this, therefore, is cast upon the occupier, and he has to pay it notwithstanding the agreement into which he has entered.

4051. Do you believe that if an Act of Parliament were to prevent the landlord from covenanting with his tenant, that the tenant should pay the rates, and that the owner should be compelled to retain the liability for a portion, he would exact a higher rent in consequence?—In some cases no doubt that would be the result, but I believe in the majority of cases in this metropolis that consequence would not follow; and I also believe that, if the plan which I suggested in my evidence, to which I have referred, and which I now repeat, were adopted, looking upon the increased taxation of the metropolis, and especially for metropolitan improvements, the owners of property would be prepared, in some degree, to accept it as an additional charge, as a special contribution from property towards those improvements, which ultimately increase the value of their own property.

4052. Some witnesses before this Committee have taken the view that practically, in the long run, the owners pay the rates now, and that therefore it would not be placing any additional taxation upon them if they had to pay one-half of it directly instead of indirectly; you recommend that a portion should be paid by the owners, but with the idea that the burden would be shifted from the occupier to the owner, and justly shifted?—Yes, certainly.

4053. It would not be a mere change of form, but a change of fact?—Yes; a change in substance, and I should propose it as such.

4054. Supposing that a tenant has been paying 5 s. rent for his rooms, and he is paying 1 s. rates, if that 1 s. were taken off, would he continue to pay only 5 s., or would the landlord not raise his rent?—In all those cases you refer now to compound property, where it is let weekly, the landlord paying all the rates and taxes.

4055. Take a yearly tenancy, not under composition, but where the tenant pays the rates, and the rates are heavy; if he, at the end of the year, is relieved of the rate, or of the heavier portion of it, would not the landlord necessarily raise his rent?—Some landlords of the character I have described would, but I think, as a rule, they would not.

4056. Would the owners fairly argue, "We have let houses to them at a low rent because the rates have been high, and now that the rates have become low we must put them back to where they would be if they were in an average district"?—Yes; that I can understand; but if a reduction in the taxation takes place in a particular district, it must apply universally, universally, and immediately that general reduction takes place, of course you will have a balancing by the law of supply and demand.

Sir J. Thwaites.
3 May 1870.

4057. Then, as far as there are differences between one portion of the metropolis and the other, the owners might, to a certain extent, readjust the rents if those differences were swept away; but looking upon the metropolis as a whole, do you believe that, if the burdens on house property were reduced, the tenant would gain a large proportion of the advantage?—Yes, I believe he would.

4058. And that not by the increase of building, but by the action of the landlords themselves; the landlords would not take advantage of it to raise the rents universally?—There would be an uncertain action by the landlords; some would undoubtedly take advantage of it, and others might not, and, I believe, would not.

4059. But would not competition prevent some landlords taking advantage of it if others did not?—It would; as I said before, competition of course would get rid of the evil of an attempt, on the part of individual landlords, to impose unfair terms.

4060. Would you consider it to be unfair that, if the rates upon property were lessened or abolished, the landlord should share in the advantage?—You must assume that the original letting was subject to this taxation; I do not assume that.

4061. You assume that, as the occupiers have had to bear the increased burdens in consequence of the legislation, if those increased burdens were reduced, they ought in justice to have the benefit, and that it ought not to go to the advantage of the owner?—Yes; what I mean is that the contract between landlord and tenant is not dealt with in the form that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deal with it; there are certain rates to be paid, and you agree to pay the rates, and to pay such-and-such a rent; I do not think that the particulars of the rate, whether it is high or low, are really a substantial element, or so substantial as to alter the actual terms of the rent as between A. and B.

4062. Mr. Hunt.] At the beginning of your evidence you stated that the owner, whatever his beneficial interest was, ought to be charged pro ratâ for a part, at all events, of the rates?—Yes, in proportion to his interest.

4063. In the case of property leased at a ground rent, do you think that the owner of the ground rent ought to pay his share?—Certainly.

4064. Have you considered the question of the present owner of ground rent being a life tenant?—No; I have not had regard to that fact.

4065. Take this imaginary case: say that a man leaves by will property which is worth 1,000*l.* a year upon the aggregate, and that property is let out on ground rents, and that the ground rents are worth, capitalised, 300*l.*, and the reversion is worth 700*l.*; supposing that a rate is made for the purpose of improvement, the owner of the ground rent would get no benefit would he, supposing him to be a different person from the owner of the fee in reversion?—He would get the benefit during his life.

4066. I am supposing that the property is let, and that he is merely the owner of the ground rent; what benefit would the owner of the ground rent, not being the reversioner, get from the improvement rate?—No doubt, in the case which you now put, it is quite clear that, if his interest were determined by agreement, and at the end of that term his own interest passed, he would have no benefit.

4067. I am putting the case of a person who has left property by will, and has left a life interest in ground rents to A., and the reversion to B., and I want to know what benefit does A. get, who is the life tenant of the ground rent, from any improvement effected out of the rates?—He gets no pecuniary benefit; the only benefit that he realises is, in common with the inhabitants of the district, in the improvement of the town.

4068. I am taking the case of a man who does not reside upon the property, who is merely the owner of the ground rent, a person residing at a distance, who is merely the recipient of an annual sum for his life; what benefit does he get by the improvement of the property?—None at all.

4069. Then any improvement goes to the reversioner?—Clearly so.

4070. That being the case, where would be the equity of charging the owner of the ground rent, who is a life tenant, with part of the rate, the whole of the improvement at the end going to the reversioner?—There would appear to be an injustice in that case. Those would be exceptions, and exceptions occur in all taxation, imperial and parochial, you must have cases where hardship undoubtedly would follow the adoption of a particular principle.

4071. Might not the hardship be so great as to reduce the man's income very considerably indeed?—If those cases were multiplied, and became a large class, then it might be a question whether Parliament should not specially relieve them.

4072. It is a fact, is it not, that what you want to get at is the person who is ultimately benefited?—Yes, clearly so.

4073. You think that it is unfair that the occupier should pay the whole rate for that which is a permanent improvement to the property?—Yes.

4074. Is not the person who ultimately ought to be charged, the person whose property is ultimately improved?—No doubt. Take, for example, the reverse proposition to that which you have put; A. is the lessee, he has to pay a very large sum for the improvement of the metropolis, the reversion will be in the hands of his landlord, his term of seven years expires, and he has been paying clearly for a reversion, in which he has no interest.

4075. The only way in which you could equitably apportion that charge, would be by making the reversioner pay when his benefit occurred, would it not?—That might be adopted.

4076. Might it not be done in this way, by borrowing a sum upon the security of the reversion, and then on the falling in of the ground lease, making the reversioner pay such an annual sum as would pay for the rate and interest for the money borrowed?—I see no difficulty in compounding for that.

4077. Do you think that that arrangement could practically be carried out?—I think it might, to relieve the special case to which you refer.

4078. In that case there would be no injustice done to anybody, would there?—No, I do not see how then you could do any injustice to anybody; I am only anxious to catch those who now escape taxation, and whose property is improved.

4079. But without an arrangement of that kind, or something equivalent, your proposition would would bear very hardly, would it not, upon the life tenant of ground rents?—In that case it would, clearly.

4080. Mr. Rathbone.] If I understand you, the disadvantage and injustice which you conceive to arise from the present system is, that it enables the large landowners in towns practically to withdraw their property from the local taxation by which they are really benefited?—Yes.

4081. With respect to another point, you spoke of competition as regulating the rise and fall of rent to a certain extent, provided that a considerable portion of the increased rates fell upon the occupier; would not the rent fluctuate in proportion to the rise and fall of the rates only in places where there was no building going on, and therefore no fresh competition; in other places would not the fall of rates which would enable a lower sum of rates and rents together to yield a fair remuneration to the invester, be a positive relief to the occupier?—No doubt, if all competition was stopped; that is to say, supposing the population were increasing in any particular town, and the capacity of housing were diminished by reason of the increase of the population, then landlords would say, "As the demand increases so shall we increase our rent;" but they would not increase the rent because the taxes were reduced, nor would they diminish the rent because the taxes were increased; they would be governed by the broad commercial principle of supply and demand.

4082. Of course in most large towns now that is not the case; houses are increasing, and therefore what I want to get at is the price which the occupier has to pay for his rent and rates together, and is not that regulated by the cost which it would take to build a new house?—Competition is regulated by the building of new houses undoubtedly.

4083. And the price at which a man can build a new house will, to a certain extent, depend, will it not, upon the rates which are to be paid?—The question of demand is not quite a question of rates. I do not concur in that general statement, that a builder before he commences building will determine that question on the ground of high or low rating; it is rather a question of demand. If there is a general demand for houses, commercial or private dwellings, in any particular locality, that question will determine the builder in commencing and carrying out certain structural works.

4084. But will not he calculate his net return from those houses?—I do not think that, as a rule, builders would consider that an influencing element in determining them to build other houses, but rather they take the larger question of a general demand for house property. That is my impression.

4085. Do you think that they would not go into minute calculations of what returns they would get for their money?—A wise builder would hardly go into a parish and commence building a number of houses where the rates were 10 s. in the pound; but that is an extreme case; I am now speaking generally.

4086. Colonel Brise.] When you stated that, as the occupier has had to bear the increased burdens, any relief in the rating should go to the occupier, were you speaking then of annual tenants or of occupiers on lease?—Of all tenants.

4087. In the case of annual tenants, do not you think that the landlord, without being considered a very hard landlord, could very fairly look upon that relief as properly coming to him?—Some landlords would take advantage of it, and probably not unfairly, and would say, "I have that additional burden cast upon me, and I must have such-and-such a rent;" but competition would regulate that question. It is not in the power of the landlord to determine the particular rent, he must take that which is the fair average of the district.

Sir J. Thwaites.

3 May 1870.

4088. I think you said that shifting one-half the burden on the owner would not be a relief only obtained in form, but also obtained in substance; would it be attained in substance with a hard landlord as well as with an easy going landlord?—I do think it would be a change in substance. My desire is that there should be an additional tax; but I am now speaking of the metropolis; I do not profess to be able to give evidence upon other parts of the country, but having regard to the important costly improvements that must be carried out in the metropolis, it does appear to me to be right and just that the owner of property, who has the great benefit, should bear a proportion of that burden; therefore, I am rather disposed to associate with the suggestion of an additional tax upon the occupier, a share of it on the owner; a tax upon property, if you please.

4089. You were speaking of leases for 50 years in the metropolis in some particular instances, 30 years of which are unexpired, and you think that the occupier could not foresee what the rates would be at the present time; do not you think that when the occupier took that lease, he calculated, in all probability, that there would either be an increase or a diminution of the rates?—I believe that in 16 cases out of 20 the thought never enters the brain of a tenant when he is entering into those covenants. I merely instance this special taxation imposed by Parliament, which could not have been foreseen by any tenant entering into a covenant with his landlord at the time I have stated.

4090. In the case of your own house, I think you said that you paid 280 l. a year for rent, but did I understand you rightly that there has been an increase in the sewer rate and land tax of 2 s. 10½ d. in the pound?—I entered into a covenant to pay all rates and taxes, parochial and Parliamentary, including sewers rate and land tax; probably from a want of intelligent industry on my part; I ought to have made inquiry, but I did not, but I accepted those terms, as they are accepted in thousands of cases, without consideration at all, and I found, after I had accepted and entered into those covenants, that the land tax, instead of being a halfpenny or a farthing, as it is in Marylebone, happened to be 2 s. 10½ d. in the pound. Therefore it was a great burthen upon me, which formed no element in the arrangement with my landlord.

4091. That was your own fault, was it not, for not having made ample inquiry?—It only shows, of course, that people do not go into minute calculations about the probable increase of rates, but they enter into an engagement, and take the liability.

4092. Chairman.] Did not you feel that it was rather hard upon you that your attention had not been called to the fact?—My feelings would have been better described then than now.

4093. You said that the tendency of recent legislation and the tendency of agreements between landlord and tenant, are to cast the burden on the occupier; will you explain what you mean by the tendency of agreements between landlord and tenant to cast the burdens upon the occupier?—I mean this. Take the sewers rate, for example, which, in law, is a landlord's tax; it has become the rule now, in all leases and agreements to call upon the tenant to pay the sewers rate, and thus the landlord dislodges that which the Act of Henry the 8th and Elizabeth imposed upon the property and not upon the occupier simply. It may be said, it is quite true that the landlord is dislodging this particular charge and casting it on the tenant, but he proportionately reduces the rent. I entirely disagree with that proposition as a general one, because I have found that with property of like capacity and value in a particular street, certainly, tenants have covenanted, where they are tenants of a landlord who looks after his own interest very specially, to pay the sewers rate; but there are tenants taking the same class of house precisely, who did not covenant to pay those rates, and therefore, in my judgment, it is not an answer to that question to say that the landlord has proportionately reduced his rent, because he has cast this particular burden upon the tenant; he has, upon the face of it, but it is not so in practice.

Sir J. Thwaites.

3 May 1870.

4094. Sir James Lawrence.] I think I gathered from you, that the landlords do not reduce their rents as a rule, if the rates in a particular district become higher?—No, I think not; there are a rather hard class of landlords who would not look at that element.

4095. On the other hand, they do not raise the rents merely because the rates may have fallen from their original high amount?—My general answer was this, that I do not think that landlords take into consideration either a rise or a fall of rates, not even when they enter into fresh arrangements for the purpose of covenanting between the tenant and the landlord.

4096. Did I rightly understand you, that if by any fresh regulation the rates at present paid by the occupier were divided equally between the owner and the occupier, as a rule the occupier would gain an advantage by such a re-arrangement?—Yes, he would be relieved from that moiety of the burden, and I think that would, for many years, be an accepted charge on property, and they would not seek to cast it, and ought not to have the power to cast it, on their tenants.

4097. Mr. Seely.] In the case of existing contracts, which bind the occupier to pay all the rates, you would only think it just, I suppose, to interfere with those contracts in the case of any new rate not contemplated at the time the contract was made?—I am speaking now of taxation for metropolitan improvements, and I am eliminating that question from all others in the metropolis; the relief of the poor, the paving, the lighting, and the cleansing, and all questions of that kind. I simply tie up my proposition to the justice of the owners contributing a portion towards those improvements, by which improvements their property is greatly increased in value; and therefore I desire that it may be looked upon as a fresh and distinct charge cast upon property by Parliament, and therefore I would include all leases that would not affect covenants between A. and B.

4098. And you would not think it just to interfere with a contract binding the tenant to pay the rates, or would you think it just to interfere in the case of a rate which was in existence at the time the contract was made?—When you speak of a rate, it is a question of degree; the rate in form was in existence, but the rate in amount was not; I might answer that question by a reference to the income tax; it is not lawful for the landlord to cast that burden on his tenant, as you are aware. You might say, "Do not you consider it an injustice that Parliament should impose that, where the tenant has undertaken to pay all Parliamentary and parochial taxation?" I say, certainly not; it is a fresh imposition cast upon the owner of property for weighty and sufficient reason by Parliament, and therfore he must accept his liability.

4099. Chairman.] Would there not be occasionally considerable difficulty where leases were made within the last two years with the full knowledge of the present aggregate of taxation?—I do not know who is to prophesy what will be the condition of taxation in the metropolis, but the governing body has to do its duty, and carry out those improvements, which are absolutely required, and I do not think, as I said before, that even with respect to leases within two years the contracting parties have directed their attention very much to the question of rates in determining contracts between them.

4100. Mr. Gregory.] You contemplate, do you not, a deduction from the mortgagee on account of rates on property?—My suggestion is, that we should follow strictly the practice of the income tax, that all parties having an interest should pay in proportion to that interest.

4101. That is on the principle, I suppose, of all persons interested in property contributing to the payment of those rates?—Yes.

4102. Would you take the net rental as a test of rating?—That is subject to conditions; there are repairs and a variety of outgoings, which must be deducted before you arrive at the net annual value.

4103. I assume that the net annual value is the value subject to those deductions; you would take that, would you, as a test of rating?—Yes, clearly.

4104. But there is an interest in the property, is there not, far beyond that net rental?—I do not know what interest you are alluding to.

4105. Take a large trading establishment, a large banking house; when that property is sold there is a goodwill attached to it, is there not?—No doubt.

4106. Or if compensation is claimed, there is a large claim for goodwill attached to that property?—Yes.

4107. But that is the value of the property beyond the rental of the property, is it not?—We are now speaking of structural property which is let at its net annual value, and rateable on the basis of the poor's rate. Whether that basis is the proper basis is another question, but all my observations apply to that basis.

4108. I am taking you on your own principle, of all interest in property contributing to the rating?—Yes, but it is an interest in the house, the structural building, and not in the goodwill of the business.

4109. Would not that fall within your principle of all interest paying?—No, unless it altered the basis of taxation altogether; and my principle is this, that every man having an interest in a house shall bear the burthen, or a portion of the burthen, for municipal purposes, according to the interest interest that he may have in the question, whether as ground landlord, or any other interest that he may have. It is tied up to structural building, it has nothing whatever to do with goodwill.

4110. Goodwill surely is an interest in a house?—But it is not to be understood in law, and certainly not in practice in this country, to tax a man because he happens to be carrying on a flourishing trade in a particular house; you have regard to the capacity, and the net annual value of the house.

4111. In respect of the income tax, you tax him in his trade?—Yes, because it is a question of trade profit; you tax him on his house in the one schedule, and you tax him upon his trade in the other.

4112. You would tax him upon his interest in the house?—I am taking the interest in the value of the house.

4113. Is not good-will, which is an essential element in the value of that house upon a sale, an interest in that house?—No, that is not associated with the structural building.

4114. I am carrying it beyond the structural building; I am taking your principle of interest?—I cannot bring in that element unless I alter the basis of taxation altogether. If you say that property should be taxed generally whether it is in the structural form of a house, or whether it is at a man's bankers or in his business, and the profit shall be equally chargeable with the rates as well as structural building, then I might have my view upon it, but I am tied up now to the question of ordinary rateable property, and the rule that regulates rating.

4115. I am only asking you how far your principle would carry you; you said that a lessee taking a lease 20 years ago, for instance, covenanting in the usual form for the payment of rates, never contemplated the increase that has taken place in metropolitan taxation; I suppose the lessee equally never contemplated the increase in the rates in granting that lease?—No, and probably he did not contemplate the great improvements to his own property that would be the result.

4116. It was not a matter of contemplation on either side; I presume the lessee, taking a long term at that time, would also have an increase in the value of his interest in the property, would he not, from the metropolitan outlay?—No doubt; and I am charging him with one moiety of the rate for the evident interest which he has, and I am charging the owner of the reversion with one moiety of the rate.

4117. Would you make any alteration in the representation with respect to this property?—Yes; and I might just say that it is part of my system if I charged one moiety upon the owner, and one moiety upon the occupier, to give the owner just the same number of votes as I should give to the occupier, and they should both vote alike for the representatives who should have the control of the expenditure of the fund; I may just say so much.

4118. Mr. Birley.] Where owners and occupiers enter into covenants for leases, is it not usually the object of the owner to obtain a definite sum by way of rent, and has not the occupier of the property to accept the uncertainties of rates or taxes?—Undoubtedly, on the very face of the agreement it shows that the owner is entitled to a certain sum free of all taxes, and so on.

4119. If, during the continuance of the lease, a portion of the rates is unexpectedly thrown upon the owner by Act of Parliament, would he not at the end of the lease, when the question of renewal came on, add to the rent in order to cover himself from that either certain or uncertain charge?—I think some landlords would undoubtedly do so.

4120. Would not they do it habitually?—No, I do not think so generally, because I do not believe that the question of rates is so serious an element in determining the arrangement between A. and B., as is generally alleged.

4121. Do you not think that it is customary in the metropolis at the termination of a lease, that the owner looks for an enlarged rent?—Yes, but that is on the supposition that property in the metropolis has improved in value, and property generally has improved in value, rather than the question of high or low rating.

4122. But that improvement is often brought about by those metropolitan improvements?—No doubt.

4123. Mr. St. Aubyn.] There is some confusion about the word "owner"; the Committee generally have understood the word "owner" to mean the person who received the rackrent; but in answer to a question just now, I understood you to say that you would divide the rate equally between the occupier and the owner of the reversion?—Yes; in all leasehold properties, for example, you must have two owners; you have the owner of the fee, the ground landlord, then you have the building owner, that is, the lessee who erects the building.

4124. Whom do you refer to?—I mean the owner. For instance, supposing A. to be the occupier at a rackrent; he takes it of B., who is the lessee; a charge of 10*l.* a year is made upon A.; he says to B., "I have paid 10*l.*, and you are, under the Act of Parliament, to bear one moiety of this"; and he says "Certainly, you are to deduct it"; but B. is the lessee of C., who is the ground landlord, and he says to C., "You are to bear a moiety of this tax in proportion to your interest"; so that it is carried down with all the certainty of the income tax.

4125. Then the occupier for the time being is to pay half, and the owner's half is to be apportioned amongst the respective persons who, in your opinion, make up the owner?—Yes.

4126. Chairman.] Can you put in a paper showing the aggregate local taxation of the metropolis?—Yes; this is a paper showing the taxation and the population, and a variety of matters of general interest. It is not an official document of the Metropolitan Board, but it was prepared with great labour by our clerk, Mr. Pollard; and although it is only up to the date of 1867, I think the Committee will find it useful in dealing with the question if they will permit me to put it in.—(The same was delivered in, vide Appendix.)

Mr. JAMES CAIRD, C.B., was called in; and Examined.

4127. Chairman.] YOU have had considerable experience in farming, have you not, both in Scotland and in England?—I have.

4128. And some in Ireland?—Not in farming, although I know something of Ireland.

4129. Do you know something of the local taxation of Ireland?—Only generally; I had an opportunity of seeing something of the working of the system of local taxation in Ireland in 1849, immediately after the famine; I know something of it in that way, but not otherwise.

Mr. J. Caird. 3 May 1870.

4130. Have you had an opportunity of contrasting the systems of local taxation in Scotland and England?—Yes, I have.

4131. In Scotland the system has been adopted to a large extent of rating the owner, and not the occupier?—The system in Scotland was to rate the owner uniformly till within recent years, when the present Poor Law was passed. I think about 25 years ago the system was partially changed for the first time. The occupier then had to pay half the rates for the first time. That, however, was not altogether a new payment, though it was a payment in a different manner; because formerly, before there was any Poor Law, the paupers were allowed to beg in the country. They had the privilege of begging, and were supplied in kind by the farmers, and that payment in kind was, to some extent, converted into a payment in money under the new Poor Law. That was the first introduction of the farmers becoming ratepayers in Scotland.

4132. At present the poor rate is divided, is it not, between the owner and the occupier?—Equally.

4133. A certain portion being placed upon the owner, and collected from the owner, and the other portion placed upon the occupier, and collected from the occupier?—Quite so.

4134. As regards roads, we have had a general statement placed before the Committee that most of the expenditure for new roads is placed upon the owners, and that the repairs of the roads are charged partly upon the owners and partly upon the occupiers?—In those counties which have themselves adopted a new Road Act, that has been, I believe, uniformly the principle which has been adopted, but where counties have not done away with their toll-bars, but continued to conduct the business under the old Acts, a road contribution is partially got from the tenant in the shape of labour; and exactly as happened in the case of the poor the change which has taken place of imposing upon the occupier a portion of the rate has been in principle the conversion of that which he contributed in kind, in the shape of labour, into a payment in money.

4135. The principle, however, seems to have been thoroughly adopted in Scotland, that a portion of the local taxation ought to be thrown upon the owner?—That is the universal principle, with those exceptions.

4136. As regards education rates, can you state anything to the Committee?—It was very often a matter of bargain between the owner and the occupier that the parish schoolmaster's salary was paid by the tenant.

4137. Were the occupiers free, or not free, to pay it as they chose?—They contracted to pay it.

4138. Under what words did they contract?—In Scotland they are almost invariably written contracts, leases between owner and occupier.

4139. But there would be a number of occupiers to make written contracts?—No, each occupier makes his own contract with the landlord.

4140. That he will pay the amount of the salary?—That very often is so; I do not think it is universal, but I can speak of cases which I know myself where it was so.

4141. Is this school salary levied separately from any other rate?—Yes; it is a payment to the parish schoolmaster to which he is entitled by statute.

4142. Who pays him the money?—Very often the tenant.

4143. I understand that the payment to the schoolmaster is not a fixed sum paid by one person by whom he is employed, but it is made to him in a number of little payments like Easter dues in England?—It is made in a number of little payments, but it is made once a year by individual occupiers, whether they employ him or not; in many cases, even though that contract may subsist, in order to save the schoolmaster trouble, a large proprietor pays it in one sum, and collects it from the occupier when he receives his rent.

4144. On whom is the charge legally fixed of paying the salary of the schoolmaster?—I am not quite able to say that; it is a charge on the land, and I think it is put on the landlord by the statute.

4145. Are there any other rates connected with education in Scotland except that?—I think not.

4146. To go back to the system of roads, the general condition of things in England is in evidence before the Committee, so that I will not ask you to state your view in that respect, but will you state to the Committee your view as to the Scotch system and the English system?—I am not familiar with the working of the English system. I have never done anything but pay my rate, and therefore I know nothing as to how it is applied, but I am familiar with the Scotch system. Under the present system, which I know, the mode that has been adopted has worked remarkably well. The occupier pays for his share of all repairs; each parish has representatives of the occupiers upon the Highway Board, and the working of the thing is found to be extremely satisfactory; the interest and the knowledge which those practical men bring to the Board is found to be very advantageous.

4147. Would you recommend the adoption of the system of rating the owner for the roads in England?—I think it would be very proper; at least as far as my experience of Scotland goes it seems to have answered very well.

4148. In whole or in part?—As a matter of principle, I fancy that the owner really pays all rates, but I think that you usefully bring in the personal interest of the occupier by making him, to some extent, share the payment.

4149. The proportion being a matter on which it would be difficult to give any exact evidence?—I think it is immaterial, because it will be accounted for in the rent.

4150. Has there ever been any objection on the part of owners in Scotland to the charges that are placed upon them as distinguished from the occupiers; I do not mean as compared with Imperial taxation, but have they considered that the occupiers ought to pay more, and that they themselves ought to pay less?—I do not think so; I think that they are perfectly satisfied.

4151. They assume, possibly, do they not, that if the rates were placed upon the occupier, they would get so much less rent?—No doubt.

4152. In Scotland do the owners of property, in fixing their rents, look at all to the local taxation, as far as your experience goes?—When you speak of the owner fixing his rent, I do not think that that the owner does fix the rent, it is the competition of those who wish to get farms that fixes the rent.

4153. You are acquainted with farming in England; does that remark apply with the same force to England as to Scotland?—Not in the same direct manner, but it does apply to some extent.

4154. Do you think that in Scotland rent approaches more nearly what it would be fixed at by competition, than it does in England?—No doubt of it.

4155. You consider that in Scotland the rent is settled more upon the commercial and competitive system than in the majority of cases in England?—No doubt of it.

4156. In England, rents being allowed to continue with less changes and less disturbance so long as the tenants remain the same?—The tenants-at-will in England on the large estates are very seldom disturbed; but although the common system in Scotland is for tenants to have leases, there is generally a review of the whole circumstances of the matter at the termination of the lease.

4157. Leases in Scotland are for how many years?—Nineteen or 21 years.

4158. As an ordinary practice, at the end of the lease the rent is changed?—Yes, certainly, the ordinary practice; I do not mean that it is always acted upon.

4159. Are you acquainted with those parts of Scotland where leasing does not prevail to the same extent?—They are very rare.

4160. Has there been much increase in the local taxation in Scotland?—Yes, the poor rate tends to increase.

4161. Has that increase at all affected the rents?—I do not think so.

4162. Even though the poor rate is paid one-half by the tenant?—It has not increased to such an extent as sensibly to affect the rents.

4163. Turning your attention on the same point to England, do you agree, as regards the agricultural population of England, with the evidence of the previous witness, which I believe you heard, that in fixing the rents the rates are not taken into consideration?—I think the previous witness was dealing exclusively with town property, and I am speaking of agricultural property.

4164. Would the same remark apply to agricultural property, that the rates are not taken into consideration when fixing the rents?—Certainly not; the rates are taken into consideration.

4165. Would 9 out of 10 farmers, in taking a farm, consider what the rates were as one of the regular and ordinary calculations necessary?—Yes, necessarily, as a matter of business.

4166. Would the amount of rates which there were upon the property affect the rent that he would give?—Certainly.

4167. Do you hold at all that in the readjustment of the rent between a landlord and a tenant in agricultural holdings the whole of the rates practically go in diminution of the rent?—On an agricultural tenancy, I should say they do.

4168. The excess over those rates, or the diminution afterwards going to the benefit or to the charge of the tenant?—Yes, during the period of his tenancy.

4169. With regard to what may be called the hereditary charges upon land, do you consider that those charges which have always been upon that property, county rates and poor rates, do practically come out of the pocket of the occupier or of the owner?—Out of the owner's pocket, no doubt.

4170. Then do you consider, that when the occupiers are complaining of the high rates, they are only so far justified in complaining, that it is an excess over the rate which existed when they took their holding?—I should say so.

4171. Would you go further than that, and say that the rents might have been raised upon them, if those rates had not increased?—Other circumstances might certainly lead to a rise of rent quite irrespective of rates.

4172. Do you think, in the case of an increase which has arisen since a tenant came into his holding, that he bears it, or does the owner bear it; I am speaking, of course, not of leases but of annual tenancies?—That depends quite upon whether the value of his farm has increased to him to a proportion quite equal to the increase of the rates which he is called upon to pay.

4173. Do you think that there are many cases where it has increased in that manner?—Yes, certainly.

4174. Do you consider that the profits of farmers have increased proportionately with the increase of local taxation?—That is a very difficult question to answer. I should say that you must look to the competition for farms, to answer that question in certain districts of the country.

4175. Has competition for farms decreased or increased within your experience?—Greatly increased.

4176. Has that had the effect of raising the rents?—I think so; that I believe is what raises the rents.

4177. I understand you that the principle of competition, as regards land, has not entirely had free play, but that there are other considerations which prevent it?—There is very great difference in different estates; you will find some estates in which it has been the practice not to raise the rent, and competition has no effect there.

4178. Are you aware of any case where the rents have been reduced in consequence of the increase of local taxation?—No, I am not; but it may be, although I am not aware of any case.

4179. When the Union Chargeability Act was passed, and considerable additional burthens were thrown on some parishes, you are not acquainted with any case where, in consequence, the rents were reduced?—I am not acquainted with any such case, but I think it is very probable that such a case may have occurred, because the taxation was certainly most unequal in consequence of the close parishes.

4180. If the rents were reduced, then the additional taxation would come out of the pocket of the owner, would it not?—Yes.

4181. If rents were not reduced, the additional taxation would come out of the pocket of the occupier?—Yes.

4182. Would that latter statement be subject to this modification, that it might have come out of the pocket of the occupier, if he, having to pay those rates, had not escaped the rise in the rent which otherwise would have taken place?—That is quite clear. I answered the question as you put it to me, that any increase of rates must first come out of his pocket; whether he is otherwise recouped is another question.

4183. Have you considered the point as to whether the occupiers are practically paying an excess in the pressure of the rates, beyond what they were paying when they came into the farms, if their rents have been continued at the same rate from the commencement of their tenancy?—That depends very much upon when their tenancy commenced. If you take some estates where the tenancy commenced at the beginning of this century, I should say that the tenant is better off to pay an increased rate than an increased rent, and there may be many other instances of a similar character of a much more recent date.

4184. But as a matter of fact, as far as your experience goes, would an owner change the rent to his tenant from year to year, according as there was an increase or a decrease of local taxation?—I suppose that if that were becoming at all the notion, there would immediately arise on the part of the tenants a demand for a lease, and that there should be fixity as to what he should pay during a certain term.

4185. Therefore, generally speaking, the chances of the rate rising and falling belong to the occupier, after he has once established himself in his farm?—Yes; until a change of bargain between him and his landlord takes place.

4186. And those bargains are not very frequent?—I think the tenant does not generally wish to have them revised.

4187. I rather gather from your evidence that you think that the tenant would have bargained for a revision of his rent, in consequence of his increased local taxation, except for the end which you pointed out, that the rents were not excessively high, and he therefore preferred remaining as he was?—I think tenants generally, both in England and in Scotland, are very desirous of standing on very friendly terms with their landlords; and though they might have reason to complain on small matters of that kind, they would prefer to suffer a little rather than have any difficulty or disturbance.

4188. Have you considered the question of the propriety of placing a portion of the local rates in England upon the owners?—Yes, I think it would be very advisable to do so to some extent.

4189. Will you state your opinion to the Committee as to how far you think it would be just?—In Scotland, we have found that the owner, from being directly called upon to pay a large proportion of the rates, takes a very active interest in their administration, and I think that has led to much economy, and also probably to a more liberal and far-seeing view of the position of affairs in the district, than would be the case when it falls entirely upon the occupying tenant.

4190. Then, independently of the question of shifting of the burthens, you think that there would be administrative advantages in putting a portion of the rate upon the owner?—I think that is the principal advantage, in my mind.

4191. Holding that the rate ultimately comes out of the pocket of the owner, you do not think that it matters much financially upon whom it is placed?—I do not.

4192. Do the occupiers, as far as you are aware, think that they pay the rates in most cases now?—I cannot answer for others.

4193. If they think that they are paying the whole of the rates, do you think that they are wrong in that idea?—I do not know that the occupiers think so; a man who takes a farm always takes care to inform himself what the rates are, and it is quite as much a part of the rent almost as the rent itself, and he knows that perfectly well.

4194. Therefore there would be no real shifting of the burthens in placing them upon the owner, provided that you have due regard to existing leases?—I think, taking it quite in the abstract, it would be better if it was all placed upon the owner; but I think there is a great advantage in getting the occupier to feel an interest as far as the management of the labouring poor and of roads are concerned, because there are many cases in which he has a very direct interest, and a great deal of knowledge of the matter. I think it is of very great advantage to get this personal interest in the administration of those matters.

4195. Does that extend to the county rate, in your opinion, or have you considered that point as regards the county rate?—As far as I can see, I think that there is a great advantage in getting the occupier's assistance in administering the poor rate and the highway rate.

4196. As regards other agricultural rates, you would not recommend putting them exclusively on the owners?—I should not. I do not mean to say that I would recommend a total change in the old established system; but if you are beginning anew, I should certainly be inclined to adopt that plan; I do not think it is worth while to make a change for any advantage that would be had otherwise.

4197. Would you consider it an advantage if all rates could be similarly dealt with, so as to have one collection and one principle for the whole?—I should say so.

4198. And that it might be worth while to sacrifice any little advantage of theoretically placing separate rates upon the owner or the occupier, in order to get one general system; that is to say, to have one consolidated rate for all purposes which might be dealt with broadly?—You might have one system, and you might have the occupier to pay the whole rate, and yet allow the occupier to recover one-half of that rate from his rent, and still have one uniform system.

4199. Mr. Corrance.] Or any other proportion?—Yes, or any other proportion.

4200. Chairman.] The rates in which you think it would be most advisable to retain a large interest on the part of the occupier would be the poor's rate and the highway rate?—Yes.

4201. Would you levy those rates exclusively upon the occupiers?—No; I should propose to divide them.

4202. And you think it an advantage to introduce the element of the owner in the poor rate and in the highway rate, and to retain the present interest of the occupier?—Yes, certainly.

4203. Do you think there would be any difficulty, as regards existing arrangements, in carrying out such a plan?—I think there would be, certainly, a difficulty with regard to all leaseholds; in yearly tenancies and tenancies-at-will I do not see that there would be any serious difficulties.

4204. Would it lead to a readjustment of rents generally?—No doubt of it.

4205. Do you think that that would be a reason that might possibly make a change generally unpopular?—I do not think that any occupier is ever fond of a readjustment of rent; it generally means a rise, I think.

4206. Might there be this feeling, if a plan of this kind were introduced, that while a part of the rates would be placed upon the owners, the readjustment which might take place in consequence quence would go beyond the amount of the rates, and might lead to an inquiry into what was the fair rent of the day?—I think it is generally admitted, as comparing England with Scotland, that the rent of land in England of equal quality is lower than in Scotland; and it has been, I believe, hitherto held that the cause of that is that the occupier in England, paying all the rates, must keep to himself a sufficient margin to cover them all.

4208. The owner at present is suffering by a lower rent for the margin resting with the tenant?—I suppose it is a tax which he pays for throwing upon the tenant the whole burthen of administering those rates. I do not know what other view you can take of it.

4209. Then, so far as the existing system of local taxation is a grievance, it ought rather to be an owner's grievance than an occupier's grievance?—Excepting in cases where there has been a considerable increase of rates in consequence of recent legislation to which the occupier is called upon to pay, and from which he has no relief.

4210. That would apply with particular force to all property that is held under lease, would it not?—Yes.

4211. Of course the increase of taxation upon property held under lease would fall exclusively upon the occupier without redress?—Yes, unless there was some redress provided by the Act of Parliament which caused the change.

4212. But that would be dealing with existing contracts, would it not?—Yes.

4213. Would you hold, if tenants at the commencement of their tenancies, had bargained to pay all rates, that it would be fair to put a portion of them upon the owners now?—I do not think it would be fair.

4214. Would you hold that they entered into it with their eyes open, and that the increase in agricultural rates is not of such a character that it could be said of them that they were a new taxation, and were not foreseen at the commencement of the contract?—The total change, and such a change as you are hinting at now, certainly could not have been foreseen by either party, because it had always been the habit, as regards England, that the poor rate should be paid by the occupier.

4215. I was rather alluding to the principle thrown out by the previous witness, which applied to towns, that the increased rate could not have been foreseen by either contracting party at the commencement of their agreement, and that therefore it would be fair to place a portion of it upon the owner; would that apply to agricultural rates?—I do not think so. I think agricultural tenants have made contracts under existing circumstances, and of those circumstances, so long as they are not changed by law, I think there is no reason to complain. The imposition of any new rate would, of course, alter the circumstances.

4216. Where there had been a contract that all rates and taxes should be paid by the tenant, do you hold that it would be fair to enact that a portion of them should be thrown upon the owner in the case of existing leases?—I do not think it would be fair.

4217. Have you considered at all whether the constitution of the bodies administering the rates ought to be changed in consequence of any alterations in the law, throwing a portion of the taxation upon the owners?—In Scotland we have found, where the occupier for the first time has been called upon to pay the rates, it has been a very useful thing indeed that he should also have a share in the administration of them and, as I have already said, the representatives of the occupiers are found very useful members of either the Highway or the Poor Law Board.

4218. And vice versâ you would desire that in England, if the rates should be thrown partly upon the owner, the owner should be secured a certain amount of representation?—Certainly, I think that is very important.

4219. It would be almost unfair, would it not, to charge the owner directly with rates without giving him a portion of representation?—Yes.

4220. Are you a guardian of the poor?—No.

4221. Are you aware at all how the ex officio element acts in the administration of the poor law?—I am not conversant with the management of the poor in England.

4222. Nor with the management of highways?—No.

4223. You would state generally your view that the owners ought to be admitted to a fair share in the representation?—Yes, I think it would be most useful and proper.

4224. You have not considered the mode in which it should be allowed them?—No.

4225. You have not considered, for instance, whether it would be desirable that the owners should elect separately?—In Scotland all owners over a certain amount are for that reason administrators of the rate.

4226. And no difficulties have arisen in Scotland in consequence of the position of the owners?—Not the slightest, but that has always been the position of the owners.

4227. Are you aware at all of any antagonism between the representatives of the occupiers and the representatives of the owners in the administration of rates in Scotland?—The only sort of antagonism that I have ever heard of or seen is in this way. The occupiers, as a rule, would prefer paying any extraordinary rate, as it were, by a loan; they do not seem to have the same fear of the consequences of a loan that the owners would have, but that I should imagine is the only case in which any one could say that there is really antagonism between them.

4228. The occupiers, having only a temporary interest, do not wish to pay for improvements which would naturally be charged to capital account?—They do not think it fair that the whole of the capital expended should fall upon them.

4229. They having only a temporary interest?—Yes.

4230. So far as that applies to the expenditure under the county rate for the erection of lunatic asylums, and so on, the same argument might apply, might it not, to England?—I should imagine so generally.

4231. The argument in favour of charging the owners with those rates which affect permanent improvements is even stronger than that of charging the owners with rates for current expenditure?—Yes, clearly so.

Mr. J. Caird.

3 May 1870.

4232. Can you state to the Committee any view that you have formed as regards local taxation in Ireland?—I remember during the time of the famine, in 1848 and 1849, cases in which very fine land went entirely out of cultivation, in consequence of the rates being all thrown upon the occupier, and the whole value of the produce was not equal to the amount of the rates, the land was deserted, and nobody dared to occupy it on account of the arrears of rates payable by the occupier.

4233. But in Ireland a portion of the rates is thrown upon the owner, is it not?—It is now divided.

4234. Will you state to the Committee when that was first done?—I think it was in 1848 or 1849 that the rates were divided; they were divided subsequently to the famine upon the new Irish poor law being passed.

4235. As far as you are aware does that division act well in Ireland?—I believe it acts very well.

4236. So that, looking at the division both in Scotland and in Ireland, you see no reason why it should not be introduced into England?—I think it would be very advantageous.

4237. Mr. Acland.] It has been alleged that the pressure of local taxation and the apprehension of its increase, discourages the application of capital to agriculture, do you agree in that opinion?—I have not myself met with any instance in which I have observed it.

4238. In the course of your evidence we have been speaking all along as if all the land was divided between two persons, the owner and the occupier; you have not given any evidence on the case of a yeoman or statesman who farms his own land, and it is especially in that case that the argument is put in this way; if a man inherits a legacy of 1,000*l.* from a relation, if he puts it into a shop in a country village it would not be taxed, but if he puts it into property, farm buildings or drainage, it would be taxed; and it is argued from that, that the application of capital to the improvement of people's land, who farm their own land is discouraged; do you think that that is confirmed by experience?—I dare say that the effect is such as you have indicated in your question, but I do not think that in the practical working it would really much affect the question of laying out money upon the improvement of land; I dare say there may be something in it, but I do not think that it affects the question practically, as far as my experience goes.

4239. You do not think practically that it has much effect in that direction?—I do not think it has.

4240. You have been asked a great many questions about the compensation which occupying farmers have received of late years in the gradual improvement in the value of land, to meet the increase of local rates; do you think, or do you not think, that the improvement of agricultural machinery, which is due no doubt to the energies of the farmers themselves and their friends, has to a very great extent diminished the cost of farming since the adoption of free trade?—I think it has very considerably increased the power of the farmer to produce.

4241. And therefore it has diminished the cost in proportion?—Yes, in proportion to the produce, I have no doubt it has diminished the cost; but probably not diminished it in proportion to the acreage of his farm to the produce; and I think it very likely that you may, by the application of steam power, get a much larger return from the same acreage at a less cost upon the produce, but not upon the acres.

4242. But, even prior to the introduction of steam, is it not the fact that the great development of agricultural machinery, which we have seen since the foundation of the Royal Agricultural Society, we may say, has enabled the farmers to produce more at comparatively less cost?—I believe it has.

4243. Is it not the fact also, that the introduction of portable manures has operated to a very large extent in the same direction?—No doubt it has.

4244. Could you give anything like an approximate estimate per acre what has been the advantage of the employment of portable manures as compared with the old system of manuring?—I think that it has enabled the farmers to grow very extensive green crops of excellent quality, where in former times it was impossible that they could do so.

4245. Might we not give some kind of estimate of the cost of manure, when you had to haul 20 tons of dung to the acre?—That has of course cheapened, and greatly cheapened, the cost of manure; the introduction of guano into this country has had an immense effect upon the increase of produce.

4246. Do not all these circumstances tend to show that there are a great many facts to be taken into account in estimating what has been the pressure of local taxation upon the practical farmer?—In Scotland all those circumstances have gone very much, I believe, to increase the rent, and the farmer has therefore paid to the landowner a very considerable portion of that which, in England, has remained with the tenant in many cases.

4247. You stated that you thought that the two most important rates to be divided between the landlord and the tenant, were the rates for the relief of the poor, and for the improvement of the roads; do you not think that, with respect to the coming rate for education, it is desirable that it should be divided?—Yes, I think that would be very desirable also.

4248. If the law which regulates the basis of rating is entirely altered, and the rate is divided between landlord and tenant, would not the same law, do you suppose, provide that there should be some arrangement where farms were held under lease for adjusting that burthen; that is to say, if the rates on a farm were 100*l.*, now paid entirely by the tenant, and the law declared that 50*l.* a year of that amount should in future be paid by the landlord, do you not conceive that same Act of Parliament should make some arrangement for adjusting that burthen?—It did not do so in Scotland when the tenant for the first time was called upon to pay the whole rate in money; there was no reference then to existing leases, and it was thought an injustice on the part of the farmer; many considered that they suffered an injustice for the time.

4249. Then it was no rate, but we are now supposing existing rates which were paid to the extent of 100*l.* a year by the farmer, farming a small farm, and that in future 50*l.* is to be charged upon the landlord; surely it would be a great injustice, if it were not also provided that some arrangements should be made about th the rent?—I think it would be just that some such arrangement should be made.

4250. Could not some arrangement be made upon the basis of the average of rates over a certain number of years?—I should imagine so.

4251. Do you apprehend that sensible business-like men, whether farmers or landlords, would have much difficulty in adjusting that matter?—I do not think they would.

4252. Mr. Corrance.] I think you are well acquainted with statistics of all sorts?—With agricultural statistics.

4253. With all the knowledge that you possess upon that point, do you think you could reduce into a few series of questions such as might be put to you here, any data upon which we might form an opinion from what causes the increase of rent has proceeded?—The general prosperity of the country, I think.

4254. You would not refer to any two, three, four, or five circumstances, as being sufficient to account for it?—In some cases there are exceptional circumstances; for instance, you may find a very great estate where there has been no increase of rent for a long period; and an increase of rent there would not be solely from the general prosperity of the country, but also from the fact that for such a long period no increase had taken place, in fact that the land was let below what it would bring in the market.

4255. In Scotland, particularly, I suppose you would attribute it to the great improvement in agriculture?—And the great competition for land as well.

4256. But the state of cultivation in Scotland has been enormously improved within your recollection, has it not?—Yes, very greatly.

4257. And you have increased the gross produce immensely?—Yes, but I do not think that the best agriculture of Scotland is superior to the best agriculture of England; I do not for a moment say so.

4258. And that increase has been produced by the application of capital to the land?—Yes.

4259. That capital has been applied by the tenant generally, has it not?—Very seldom has the permanent capital been applied by a tenant; the buildings, drainage, fences, roads, and so on, as a rule, are made by the landowner; the floating capital is all the tenant's property.

4260. But at the end of a 19 or 21 years' lease, which is usual in Scotland, there would be some amount of improvement that the tenant left behind him, would there not?—Yes, certainly.

4261. And this becomes the property of the landlord?—That is, I suppose, in some degree considered in the length of the lease. But no doubt the circumstance that such improvements at present pass to the landlord, without compensation, deters tenants from continuing to make them towards the end of the lease.

4262. I suppose, if the landlord had to re-let the farm, you would consider him justified in obtaining an increase of rent to the extent of those improvements?—Such is the practice; but I think he should compensate the tenant for their actual value at the time of his removal. It would be wise to amend the law on that point which presumes, often contrary to the fact, that all improvements belong to the landlord.

4263. That has been the gradual process which has conducted you to a high state of prosperity in agriculture in Scotland?—I think there is an over-competition for land encouraged in Scotland by the system of letting by tender.

4264. But, on the other hand, occurring as it does very seldom, only once in 19 years, of course the tenants are not sufferers to any great extent; a farm is only let once in 19 years, and therefore the rent would not be raised during the whole period, involving in the 19 years from letting to letting?—Yes, that is so.

4265. Therefore it would not press very hard upon any existing tenant?—He probably might not continue to be the tenant, and very often he does not; a new tenant comes in at probably a much increased rent; it often happens, indeed, that the rent which the new tenant offers (who in many cases is a stranger), the old tenant, who has been a very good farmer, refuses to pay; and he leaves the farm, and such improvements as may have been left in it through his exertions, for the benefit of the landowner. Very often the new tenant, having offered too much, cannot pay all that additional rent, and there are many cases in which private arrangements have been made between the landowner and the tenant to reduce this high rent that he may have offered; and that, I say, is one evil effect of the too common system of letting by tender.

4266. But, upon the whole, Scotch farmers are quite content that that should be the result of their arrangements?—I think that Scotch farmers are quite content that there should be competition, but they think it unfair that the competition should from any circumstance be unduly increased.

4267. In fact, they would put a limit to free contract?—No, I do not think that is the desire of the tenants at all.

4268. But what would putting any checks on competition be but a limit to free contract?—There is this circumstance in Scotland that the Law of Hypothec has an undue effect in increasing the competition for farms; it enables men of very small means to be pitted against men of capital. A man of that description runs great risks rather than lose what he considers to be a good farm; and a man of capital, who cannot afford to run that risk, thinks himself unfairly pitted against such a man by the present state of the law.

4269. They would like to establish a monopoly of capitalists, would they not?—No, I think there is no such desire: all that they object to is the unfair competition; fair competition they have not the least objection to.

4270. Fair competition in their opinion, of course as bidders, would be to exclude a certain number?—I do not think they object to anyone who has really the capital necessary to conduct the business. What they do object to is, that the law should give inducements and advantages to landlords to enable them, without risk, to encourage men of straw to compete, men whom under a different state of the law they would not accept as possible tenants. My only interest now in Scotland is as a proprietor. But I feel very strongly that the present arrangement of the law places the tenant at an unfair disadvantage in making his contract, and that, while its removal would be just to tenants, it would not take from landlords anything they are entitled to, or that, on the average, in the course of years, they could actually realise. For when a man without means gets a farm at a rent which, in the end, he cannot pay, his failure has a very bad effect on the landlord's interest, and the consequent loss is often far greater than the temporary gain.

4271. You have drawn a very broad distinction between poor rates and highway rates, and any other rates, but I do not think you assign any data for it?—I think that the farmer is more directly interested in the question of the labourer and his employment, and also in the management of the roads, than in anything else in the county expenditure.

4272. Do you think that the occupier exercises a stronger controlling influence over the expenditure of the poor rates through being an employer of labour?—I think he is a very useful man to be there, from his local and personal knowledge.

4273. Do you think that as an employer of labour he has great power of exercising control over the poor rates?—I do not exactly see what you desire me to answer.

4274. I think in answer to the honourable Member for North Devon, you stated that you did not think that local taxation, or any taxation, influence the application of capital to anything; is that your opinion?—I spoke only of agriculture.

4275. But do you draw a distinction in that respect between farming and any other employment?—Not in principle.

4276. What was the argument in the case of free trade, for instance; was it not this, that it indirectly taxes the production of a certain class?—Yes.

4277. Would it not be your assumption that if one trade was heavily taxed, and another was not, the capital would seek out more productive employment?—No doubt.

4278. If by such means you rendered farming less productive than some neighbouring employment, some manufacture in the neighbourhood, the capital would necessarily be diverted from its former channel, would it not?—You must not, in thinking of farming, forget the fact that many people prefer it as an occupation to others, and that to a certain extent influences their views of what would be a fair return upon their capital.

4279. Is not that rather sentimental than practical?—No, I do not think it is; I think it is very substantial.

4280. Then you take it out of the ordinary operations of economy?—To that extent no doubt.

4281. Would there be any difficulty in reserving the rights of existing tenants in the case of any change of the incidence of the rates?—I have already answered the honourable Member for North Devon, that I think not.

4282. Have you known any instances where it has occurred in any change of agreement?—Nothing of the kind has ever taken place under my knowledge.

4283. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] I think you told the Right Honourable Chairman, that you have not made up your mind, supposing the owner paid half the rates in England, what share of representation he should have at the board?—I have not considered the question, because in Scotland all the owners, you may say, are administrators of the rate.

4284. Sir William Tite.] Do you know that, practically, great estates in Ireland belong to the London companies?—I know very little about them.

4285. Do you know the nature of the covenants that they exact from the tenants?—I do not.

4286. Is there anything like that in Scotland; that is to say, corporate estates which are leased, having heavy duties to be performed by the trustees who hold them?—There are certain estates, the Heriots Hospital Estate in Edinburgh, for instance, and other estates of a similar character, but they are not on the same grand scale as the London corporations' estates are.

4287. However, be they great or small, I take it that they exact from their tenants that the rent shall be paid, and that all the rates shall be paid?—They are administered exactly as any other estate in Scotland.

4288. What is the nature of that administration?—The landowner pays all the rates, except half the poor rate and a proportion of the highway rate.

4289. Do you know the English practice in connection with the letting of estates round London, which are so very much held by the great corporations?—No, I do not.

4290. Nor the nature of the covenant which they make?—No.

4291. If they take the form of an exact covenant that the tenant shall pay every charge, be it what it may, and the rent shall be paid net to the landowner in that case, the corporators or trustees, how do you imagine that the matter could be adjusted, if it was resolved upon that the landlord should, notwithstanding that covenant, pay half of a certain rate?—I have no doubt that, to that extent, the rent would be increased on renewing the letting. The Act might provide that in peculiar cases of that kind the existing practice should continue till the end of the term for which the lands are let.

4292. The owner having let upon lease, say 400 or 500 acres of land, upon the covenant that the rating shall all be paid by the tenant, if it was resolved by Parliament that one-half of a certain rate, the poor rate, for example, should be paid by the landlord, and not by the tenant who had so covenanted to pay everything, would not it be a very difficult machinery to arrange?—It does not appear to me that it would be difficult to ascertain what had been the average payment during a period of years by the tenant on account of that particular rate, and if one-half is now to be borne by the landowner, to that extent there should be an increase in his rent.

4293. In fact, do you know the practice in England?—The practice in England is that the tenant pays everything.

4294. And takes all his chances?—Yes.

4295. You conceive that some machinery must be arranged by an Act of Parliament by which this matter should be inquired into, and the burden of the tenant either relieved or increased, as the case might be?—Yes, or, as I have suggested, the alteration of the law might be made to take effect on expiry of the lease.

4296. Do you see any practical difficulty in that?—I do not.

4297. Mr. Birley.] You have not considered how that is to be done?—I have not; there are difficulties in any re-arrangement of that kind, no doubt, but it does not seem to me to be impossible.

4298. I suppose the lease would have to be brought to book and arranged according to some average of a certain number of years, probably?—There would be difficulties, no doubt.

4299. Mr. Gregory.] I do not know whether your your experience agrees with mine, but according to mine, when a tenant proposes to take a farm, the first thing he does is to look at the land?—Yes.

4300. The second thing is to go to the rate book?—Yes.

4301. And he then makes an accurate calculation of the rates that he would be liable to pay?—Certainly.

4302. And he leaves himself a margin over and above to cover contingencies?—I should think that he takes the land as cheaply as he can get it.

4303. The result, therefore, is that he deducts the rates that he finds, and something to cover some small increase of those rates, in calculating his rent?—I have no doubt he takes it all into account.

4304. With respect to the representation of the landowners in Scotland upon those boards, you may have a landowner for a large district, for instance, which may cover an area of several parishes, but as to the occupiers, you would have an occupier in every parish, I presume?—Yes.

4305. But the landowner would be only one individual?—Yes.

4306. Has he only himself as the representative of all that district, or does he put in nominees for the several parishes?—He generally has his factor or resident agent, who is entitled to act along with himself; but wherever such circumstances as you have mentioned have arisen, of a large landowner being the only landowner, and the whole of the ratepayers his tenants, there would be no difficulty as to the influence which that landowner would exercise.

4307. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Whether he let on lease or otherwise?—Yes, In practice a great landowner has no difficulty in maintaining ample influence in such circumstances.

4308. Mr. Gregory.] It is the system in Scotland to put up a farm to public auction, is it not?—No; to tender. It is not universal, but it is very common on a change of tenancy.

4309. When you talk of a change of tenancy, is it upon the determination of the period of holding, or is it upon a surrender by the tenant?—Upon the determination of the lease.

4310. Are you aware that it is a common practice in England, upon a determination of that kind, to have the farm revalued, and to give the refusal to the occupying tenant?—In Scotland, as a rule, the occupying tenant would generally have the refusal, unless there were some special circumstances.

4311. Before the farm is put up to tender?—Generally he would. The rule, I should say, would be, in all well-managed estates, that the rent would be considered, and that rent would be mentioned to the occupying tenant, and if he declined it, the farm would then very likely be offered to tender.

4312. A public roup is an auction, is it not?—Yes, the same as an English auction; but that is very seldom done. I never saw it done myself.

4313. Sir William Tite.] But if it were, would it be put up at the upset price or otherwise?—I never saw it done.

4314. Colonel Brise.] I think you said that in Scotland it was not the owner that fixed the rent, but the competition of those who wanted the farm that fixed the rent; in that case, if the rates rise, the owner has not the power of raising the rent?—He may ask a higher rent, if he likes, but he is not at all sure to get it unless there is competition.

4315. You stated, did you not, that the owner in Scotland takes considerable interest in the expenditure of the rates?—A great interest, and a very useful interest, I think.

4316. Do you think that his paying the rate has any effect in making him take an interest in the expenditure?—I think it has.

4317. But in England, on the other hand, I think you said the landowner fixes the rent?—I think competition has its effect in England also, but not in the same direct manner that it has in Scotland.

4318. At any rate, you hold that with the English landlords the rent is not the only consideration that enters their mind upon letting farms?—I think that there is no difference between English and Scotch landlords in that regard.

4319. Do you think that English landowners will take as much interest in the rates as the landowners in Scotland do?—I think if they had to pay them directly, as the owners in Scotland have, in a certain proportion, it would give them a greater personal interest in their administration.

4320. But the English landowners have the power of increasing their rent, which the Scotch landowners have not?—I do not think that either the one or the other has any absolute power of increasing their rents; I think that depends upon competition; in other words, on there being a demand for their land. Practically, a landowner may increase the rent up to the amount which other tenants would give for it. But if he were to fix a rent above what the land would bring in the open market, he would soon discover the limits of his power in that respect.

4321. You recommend, do you not, that the poor rate and the highway rate should be paid by the occupier, and considered as occupiers' rates?—Yes; half of them.

4322. As to the county rates and other rates, how would you recommend that they should be paid, do you consider them owners' rates?—I do not feel myself capable of answering that question. In Scotland the owners always pay those rates and administer them themselves, and that system has worked remarkably well. In England you have a different system, and probably in adopting a change you may prefer something of uniformity, and say that half of all the rates should be laid upon each.

4323. You stated that in Scotland the improvements in agriculture, in manures, in the application of steam, and so on, have all gone to the landowner in the shape of rent; but it was not so in England, as I understand you to say?—I do not remember that I said that they had all gone to the landlord, but I say that a very large proportion certainly does go in increased rent; in England, wherever there is much competition, no doubt the same result would follow.

4324. But it has not followed so much, you think, as in Scotland?—No, it has not.

4325. Do you think that the occupier has all the advantage of the improvements in England?—I think the fact that there is so much land still held at yearly tenancy in England has prevented that rise of rents which has occurred where leases have been prevalent.

4326. Do you think that the rise of the rents is not in a great measure owing to the outlay for improvements as well as to competition?—I fancy that that competition for land arises from its having been found that there was a profitable investment to be obtained in it, which can only be done by a considerable outlay in improvements, and in high farming on poor land.

Mr. J. Caird.

3 May 1870.

4327. In the case of an occupier who lays out 10,000*l.*, we will say, on the improvement of his occupation, have you expressed any opinion as to whether that 10,000*l.* should be subject to rates, and he should pay rates on that outlay?—I am not aware that he does.

4328. I presume that this 10,000*l.* has improved the value of his farm, and therefore the assessment committee increases the assessment on that occupation, and he pays rates on that 10,000*l.*, does he not?—No doubt he may do so.

4330. With regard to the salaries of schoolmasters, does the tenant pay them in a rate, or are they a voluntary contribution, or in what form does he pay them?—A parish schoolmaster in Scotland has a fixed salary, payable by the land, much in the same way as a parish clergyman has; and that in some cases is paid directly by the landlord, but in some cases it is paid by the tenant; and so far as my own knowledge of it goes, I think it is a matter of contract between the two parties, the owner and the occupier. I am not positive as to whether the law imposes it upon the landowner or not, but it certainly is laid upon the land; it is a payment imposed upon the land, it is not voluntary.

4331. Mr. Pell.] Do you think that in Scotland contribution and control go together with regard to rates?—I think it is not a complaint on the part of the occupiers that they do not go together.

4332. I am afraid, with regard to the education rate, you cannot tell us whether that is really chargeable to the owner or to the occupier; we will take the contribution to the county rate, by whom is that paid?—It is paid by the owner; it is a charge upon the land.

4333. Can it be recovered from the land, or from the chattels upon it?—I cannot answer that question; in practice I have never known it to arise. It is paid by the landlord unless the tenant has contracted to relieve him.

4334. With regard to the poor rate, that is paid in Scotland, is it not, by the occupier?—It is paid by the occupier and the owner equally.

4335. Is it true that it is paid, in the first instance, by the occupier, and that afterwards he is entitled to recover half of it from the owner?—No; it is paid directly by both owner and occupier.

4336. Then are there two receipts given, and two collections made?—Yes, generally.

4337. Do you think that that tends to care in the administration of the finances?—It has not been found practically to be at all troublesome to make such a collection; and I think that it is very useful in its administration.

4338. Observing the result of that in Scotland, do you think that we should receive benefit from a change of that sort in England?—I am quite sure that it works very well in Scotland.

4339. Do you think there is a better attendance of the owners at the board of management in Scotland?—No doubt. Either the owner or his factor attends; in a great many very large estates in Scotland there is a professional man who is the resident factor on the estate, and either he or the owner, and very likely both, may attend.

4340. With regard to road rates in Scotland, are they collected in a similar manner?—Under the recent Acts of Parliament, where the different counties have themselves obtained new road Acts, and have done away with the toll system, the principle which has been established has been generally this, that for all new works the owner pays altogether, and for all repairs the owner and occupier pay equally.

4341. Was not there a Commission in 1858 upon that subject?—Yes; they were never able to arrive at such a satisfactory conclusion as to make a general Road Act for the whole country, and for that reason various counties have themselves obtained Acts to regulate their own county.

4342. So that the practice is very much more varied in Scotland than in England?—It is very much more varied; but I think that wherever they have adopted a new Act it proceeds upon the principle that formerly many roads were maintained by statute labour, and that is why it has been commuted into an assessment.

4343. Who controls the expenditure of the road rate in Scotland?—All owners of above 100*l.* in value, and the representatives of tenants and occupiers, one from each parish.

4344. Do not your quarter sessions in Scotland, or a body analogous to our quarter sessions, control the whole of the roads?—They did, but now it is put upon a different footing. Where the new Act has been adopted they have county boards and district boards, and they are partly composed of owners over a certain amount, and the representatives of the occupiers.

4345. How often are the assessments of hereditaments in Scotland changed?—Once a year; there is a return every year. I happen to have received a form of return this very day sent to me as an owner in Scotland, which gives the particulars of the whole of our rental.

4346. In Scotland, where you have done so much to improve the surface of the land by the application of farming capital, does the effect of this revaluation of the hereditaments annually operate as a check to farmers putting on additional capital on their land?—Not in the slightest degree, because when a farm is let on lease, at a fair rent, the rent so established is accepted as the value during the lease, notwithstanding any expenditure of tenants' capital. I dare say the common sense of the people has had as much to do with that practice as the provisions of statute.

4347. You are not the least afraid of that?—No, not in the least.

4348. Supposing that upon a holding in Scotland you expended a considerable sum of money in manure which would not be exhausted in two years, the first year after it has been applied to the land would make it more valuable than it would have been before?—No doubt.

4349. Because there is a portion of it unexhausted, would you, upon the gentleman who occupied the land under those circumstances, raise the value of that hereditament upon the score of the increased value of the land?—No, this return is based upon the actual rental, and those rentals have relation to what it may be during the currency of the lease, and the temporary raising of the quality quality of the land for one or two years would never be touched at all.

4350. You are aware that in England the assessment committee frequently assess a farm at considerably above the rent, though it may be upon a yearly holding paid by the tenant for his farm?—I am not familiar with the question in England.

4351. But such is not the case in Scotland?—No, the real rent is almost uniformly taken in Scotland as the basis of assessment; no imaginary rent, but the real rent. There is an annual assessment, but not a revaluation; you have to give an annual return, because you may have changed your tenancies upon your property.

4252. It is to catch the changes, in fact?—Yes, they have it corrected every year, but there is no question of revaluation.

4353. In the case of a leasehold farm in Scotland, a man might fearlessly, at the commencement of his lease, so work his land that he raised the annual value of it immediately, and under your law, or under your practice, in Scotland, he would not have his assessment raised until his rent was raised at the termination of his lease?—Certainly not.

4354. Sir Massey Lopes.] Some 25 years ago the old mode of rating in Scotland was according to a man's means and substance, was it not?—Poor rates were leviable on means and substance, but in practice the rent was taken as the measure or test of a man's means. The system of charging on means and substance has ceased.

4355. That was the original rule in Scotland with regard to all assessments, was it not?—Yes.

4356. When we speak of means and substance, that means personal property as well as real?—Yes.

4357. But the principle of means and substance was valuing according to a man's means or ability; that was the object to be attained?—Yes, that would be so; but even while it existed the rent was practically the rule in country parishes, and even in towns the rent of a man's dwelling was accepted as a test of his means. Direct estimate of means was tried for a short time, but was found intolerable. All that has ceased.

4358. Your Board of Supervision in Scotland have instituted a different system by classifying property?—I believe that is so.

4359. And by that means they have endeavoured to obtain the same end, though in another way, from the old system?—I believe there was a great hardship felt in the practice of assessing means and substance in towns, and that led, in some cases, to persons of wealth being deterred from settling in places where they would otherwise have been very glad to have settled, because their whole property became assessed where probably their liabilities otherwise should not have required it.

4360. The Board of Supervision in Scotland, in substitution for that, would rate a man's mansion, for instance, at a higher rate than a farmhouse, or perhaps any other sort of premises?—The Board of Supervision do, under the Act, sanction such arrangements in towns. The actual rent is taken, but a higher per-centage of rates is charged on dwellings than on places of business in towns and localities where such special arrangements have been judged advisable. The mode of assessment which, I believe, is now universal over the country is this: there is an assessor appointed, and that assessor is an official man who sends round such documents as this every year to every owner of property, and gets a return of the real rental, and upon that he bases the assessment. And where distinctive per-centage of rates have been established these are charged on the actual rent. I do not think that the Board of Supervision otherwise interfere at at all in the matter.

4361. Do you suppose that, if any division of rates took place between the owners and the occupiers, there would be any pecuniary benefit at all to the occupiers?—If the rates have had a tendency to rise, or in such instances as have been mentioned, where the late Act of Parliament has extended the area of chargeability, and thereby imposed an unexpected hardship upon persons who did not pay the same rate previously, no doubt a change of that kind would be beneficial to the tenant relieved, but ultimately and in the long run I think it is a matter of no importance.

4362. But if a law to that effect was passed to-morrow, it would tend, would it not, to disturb existing arrangements as between landlord and tenant?—Yes, no doubt, unless made to take effect from the termination of existing leases.

4363. I understand you to say that that would probably lead to a revaluation or a readjustment of rent?—I think that is most likely.

4364. Your opinion, as I understand it, was, that a revaluation or a readjustment would generally, for the most part, lead to an increase of rent?—I should say so.

4365. Is it your opinion that, if an arrangement of that kind took place, in making a fresh arrangement the landlord would take care to put on as much more in the shape of rent as the tenant was likely to pay during his tenancy in the shape of increased rates?—I do not accept that principle of the landlord being able to put on anything arbitrarily in the shape of rent; I think it is a question purely of competition, or demand and supply; but I think where that competition was sufficient to enable him to do so, he could undoubtedly recoup himself for all that he would suffer in that way.

4366. Local taxation, I think you said, had increased a great deal more in England than in Scotland?—So I understand.

4367. You also mentioned that rents, generally speaking, are lower in England than in Scotland?—With regard to the increase of rents, it happens that I am able to speak with some knowledge with reference to the three countries. On looking into the Irish question, I thought it necessary to get some information upon that point. During the last seven years the rise of rent in England, as shown by the Income Tax Returns, has been 7 per cent. over the whole country; the rise of rents in Scotland during the same period has been 8 per cent., and the rise of rent in Ireland, I believe, during the last seven years, is not quite 5 per cent.

4368. Do you think that the very fact of local taxation having so much increased in England beyond what it has in Scotland, may, to a certain extent, be some reason for the increase of the rents in Scotland rather more than has been the case in England?—I think that the increase of rent in England was much longer of beginning, as it were, and that they had probably a greater space over which to travel, and therefore I apprehend that we may see a greater increase of rents during the next few years in England than in Scotland.

4369. The Right honourable Chairman asked you whether you considered that the profits of farmers had increased in the same proportion as the increase of local taxation; are you of that opinion?—I have no sufficient data to answer the question.

3 May 1870.

4370. Even admitting that they have increased, or, at all events, that land has increased in value, do not you consider that that in a great measure may be accounted for by the vast sums of personal property which have been of late years invested in land, in building new farmhouses, in drainage, and reclaiming land, and so on?—No doubt to a great extent that is so.

4371. Do you consider that the profits of farming have so much increased of late years: take Scotland, with which you are more conversant; there are a great many corn rents in Scotland, are there not?—Yes.

4372. That used to be the general system of letting in Scotland, used it not?—Yes, pretty general in some localities, but I think it has fallen very much into disfavour of late years.

4373. But speaking as it is now; corn is about 40 s., and you can recollect it about 100 s.?—Yes.

4374. That certainly has not added to the increase of the profits of the farmer?—Certainly not; I should say that at present farmers are making but a poor living of it.

4375. What would you consider a fair per centage for a farmer to make as profits upon his capital?—I should say probably 10 per cent.; I think farmers would look for that as a trade profit.

4376. We had it in evidence the other day from a very able and practical farmer, that in no two years had he ever made 10 per cent. profit upon his outlay of capital; do you agree with that statement, as far as you know?—It is quite impossible for me to say what he may do.

4377. Do you think that a fair statement?—I daresay if you take 10 per cent. as a clear profit, without making any account of the advantage of living rent free in your house, and other matters of that kind, very few farmers probably do make that as the average; I think you must take everything into account in order to make that out.

4378. Chairman.] You mean that you would take into consideration his living and his house, and so on, as a portion of his profits?—Yes, certainly, that should form part of the 10 per cent.; I think that it may be fairly reckoned that that would be part of the 10 per cent.

4379. Mr. Pell.] You would give credit in the farm ledger for house rent?—Yes.

4380. Sir Massey Lopes.] Is it your opinion, that 10 per cent. would be a very fair average for a tenant to make over a series of years, including his house and his living?—I think that with a tenant like any other trader, a great deal will depend upon his good sense, his good management, his intelligence, his command of capital, and his activity; you may get one man who would make 15 per cent., and another who on the same farm would not make five.

4381. You think there is no rule in the matter; that it must very much depend in the first place, upon his having a good farm; in the second place, on his having made a fair bargain with his landlord, and thirdly, on his having plenty of industry, intelligence, and capital to carry it on?—Yes.

4382. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Would you say, as a general rule, that it would be the man's own own fault if he did not make 10 per cent.?—I do not say that; it may very often be the landlord's fault.

4383. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you think that high rates have a more injurious effect upon poor land than upon good land?—No doubt.

4384. Do you think that high rates act as a great discouragement to the improvement of poor land, and to the investment of capital in the cultivation of that land?—I do not think that it much matters, because if the rates are high the rent must be proportionately low.

4385. But is there not some poor land that scarcely leaves a margin for cultivation of any kind at all?—I should think in that case it is not occupied by anybody.

4386. But take a very low class of land that may afford to pay the expenses of cultivation; but yet nevertheless that could not afford to pay any rent?—Then it is not worth the landlord's while to let it; he would probably plant trees upon it.

4387. If it is cultivated it pays rates; but it does not pay rates when it is not in hand?—Then it would be unwise of any landlord to reclaim it.

4388. I ask you if it is not a great discouragement to the laying out of money in reclaiming that land?—Because the land is naturally so poor that it would not pay for reclaiming; it seems to me that that is rather the point, for it cannot be desirable to encourage the outlay of money on supposed improvements which, by the hypothesis put, cannot pay.

4389. I think you said that there was a good deal of land in Ireland during the time of the famine, where the rates were so high that the landlords could not get any rent at all?—Yes, but that was very fine land.

4390. In Scotland, I think, you mentioned that you had a re-valuation at certain periods?—New assessments which are based upon the real rent.

4391. In England, I dare say, you know that we have a re-valuation every three years?—Yes.

4392. A man takes a farm in Scotland for the ordinary period of 19 or 21 years, and he gets no revaluation for his rates during that period?—No, because his assessment is upon his actual rent.

4393. It is very different in England, as every third year all farms are revalued, and if a man expends, we will say, 1,000 l. of personal property upon his land in reclaiming or improving it, he is immediately rated upon that expenditure, whereas, in the case of a man in Scotland, who has 19 years' lease, and who chooses to invest any amount of personal property in improving his estate, he pays nothing more in the shape of local taxation during the whole of his holding?—No; but he has taken his farm on consideration of his having a lease for a period of years, and he pays, probably, a proportionately higher rent, and thus, during the whole period of that lease, he will be assessed at a corresponding increase of value.

4394. But it is not altered during that time?—No. It would discourage a tenant's expenditure very much if his rates were immediately increased on account of it.

4395. But do you think it just in this country, that where a man invests a large amount of money in the improvement of his farm, immediately that sum of money is sunk in his estate, he should be taxed so many per cent. for it?—I should not like it, certainly. I think it unwise and impolitic. That was one great objection to the old system of drawing tithes in England, and tithes were commuted to avoid it.

Mr. HENRY ARTHUR HUNT was called in; and further Examined.

Mr. H. A. Hunt.

3 May 1870.

4396. Chairman.] WHEN you were examined before, you gave the Committee some evidence with regard to the value of property in London and elsewhere, and you stated broadly your view that rates practically came out of the pockets of the owners?—Yes.

4397. And, consequently, that high or low rating entered considerably into the question of what rent could be got for a house?—Yes.

4398. You also dealt with the question of ground-rents, and you gave instances to the Committee of houses in various parts of the metropolis, such as in Bloomsbury-square, on the one hand, and in the West End, on the other, and showed that the ground-rent in one place was much higher than in the other, in consequence of the advantages of situation?—Yes.

4399. You further stated to the Committee that while, on the one hand, the geographical situation of certain houses increased the ground-rents, the heavier taxation in other localities would decrease the ground-rents?—Yes.

4400. That in any new arrangements the interest out of which the increased taxation would primarily come, would be the ground rent?—Yes.

4401. You also gave the Committee two instances; could you repeat those instances?—The instances to which I referred, in my previous examination, were in the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, and the parish of St. George, Hanover-square: one side of Lowndes-square being in St. Luke's, Chelsea, and the other in St. George's, Hanover-square; the rates in one parish are very high compared with the rates in the other, and of course the value of property, so situated, all other things being equal, must be less in the parish of St. Luke than it would be in St. George.

4402. Sir William Tite.] With regard to the case of Lowndes-square, do you know the nature of the assessment in those two parishes?—No; I do not.

4403. You do not know that Chelsea not only has a very much heavier rating, but rates to the extreme value of the property?—I think it is very likely.

4404. Do you know what is done in that respect in St. George's, Hanover-square?—St. George's, Hanover-square, has been very unequally assessed up to the present time. I lived in St. George's, Hanover-square, 20 years ago, in a house that was then worth 230 l. a year, and it was rated at 80 l.; I moved into another part of the same parish, where I now live, and the house was not then of so high a rental value, but it was rated at 180 l.; there was great inequality in the rating of St. George's, Hanover-square; but that has been to a great extent recently remedied by a re-valuation.

4405. You have had great experience; do you imagine that the assessment, the basis of rating, is it all equally distributed throughout London?—I think it is not.

4406. In some cases where there is a system of apparent favouritism, it does not so much matter as it does in the case of Chelsea, where an enormous amount is raised for a very poor parish, and is collected from the whole population?—No doubt there has been great inequality of assessment throughout the metropolis, and a considerable want of principle in assessing the value of property, arising chiefly from the persons who have had to do with the assessment. Persons to assess property properly, should be skilled persons unbiassed by local prejudices, and having simply a professional duty to perform; that has not hitherto, as far as I know, been the case in many parishes in London; it has been done by a deputation, or a committee of the ratepayers, or a committee of the vestry, or some other persons not competent to judge what the true value of the property is. Under the Parochial Assessment Act, reductions are made for repairs and a variety of other things which are right enough in the East end of London, but in St. George's, Hanover-square, the rateable value ought, I think, to be the rent which could be obtained on lease for a term of 21 years, the lessee taking upon himself all repairs and other outgoings. I do not know whether the Act of Parliament of last Session alters the state of things in that respect, but I believe it does.

4407. Do you know what has been done in the City of London actually by the Assessment Committee?—No, I do not.

4408. Do you know whether they are advised by any professional man at all?—I think Mr. Hudson, a competent surveyor, has advised the City.

4409. With regard to those rates falling upon the ground landlord, you do not mean that to apply to the case where a house has been built, and absolutely let upon a long lease?—No; that I endeavoured to explain to the Committee the last time I was here. There was, in fact, generally speaking, two owners, namely, the owner of the land and the building owner. The man who took a lease of the land upon which to build a house at that time calculated, or ought to have calculated, what the rates and taxes on the house he proposed to build would be, and he would then see what ground rent he could afford to give for the house. The landlord, looking to his own interest, perfectly well knows that he could not get a higher rent if he kept his land, and therefore he lets him have it at that price. Subsequently, if the rates and taxes are raised, the building owner would have to bear them, but if they are diminished, the building owner would get the benefit; so also the building owner would get the benefit if the house from any cause increased in value. Suppose it was anticipated that the house proposed to be built would let for 60 l. a year, subject to rates and taxes, and from circumstances it increased in value to the extent of 80 l. a year, the ground landlord would get no benefit out of that increase; consequently the man who takes a building lease takes his chance whether the property will improve or diminish in value, or whether the rates will increase or diminish.

4410. You do not mean broadly to state, as it appears to have been understood, that the rate and taxes fall upon the landlord where the land has changed hands, and a house has been built and capital embarked in a variety of ways; all your arguments appear at the present moment to apply to a man taking a speculation to cover land, and going on with that speculation?—Yes, precisely so.

4411. Take the case of a house in Lowndes-square; the original ground rent to Mr. Lowndes was 7 l. 10 s., and the ground rent to Mr. Cubitt, who built the house, from the man who occupies the house at the present moment, is about 60 l.?—Yes.

Mr. H. A. Hunt.

3 May 1870.

4412. I apprehend that you do not mean to say that the rating falls upon either the one or the other of those gentlemen?—Certainly not; the man who occupies has a lease for 70 or 80 years, and has contracted to pay all outgoings; but at the end of that term the outgoings will fall upon the freeholder of the house; in other words, upon the land.

4413. If it is let on a very long lease, 60 or 70 years, it would be postponed to that extent?—Yes, bearing in mind always this, that where a man has parted with his land for a lease of 99 years, he parts with it for better or for worse, and you cannot without altering the law of the land alter the existing contract between the parties, because if at the time the land was granted upon a building lease, the rates were 5 s. in the pound, and they ultimately go up to 7 s., you could not fairly ask the ground landlord to pay a portion of the additional 2 s., unless you also gave him a corresponding advantage by a diminution of those rates; and in such a case there would be a constant balancing of accounts between the building owner, and the owner of the land.

4414. Therefore those rates would fall upon the owner, just in proportion to the value of the holding between him and his under tenant; if he has let it for the whole of his term, that would not affect him?—No, not the ground landlord.

4415. If he had let it for 40 years, it would affect him very distantly, but if he had let it for five or seven years, it would very soon fall upon him?—Yes.

4416. Chairman.] The rate in the parish in which Lowndes-square is situated at the time when the ground rent was first settled, would have been taken into consideration, would it not, in fixing that ground rent?—No doubt.

4417. So that you would hold that as regards the ground rent, so much of the rates as existed at the time when the contract was made, comes out of the pocket of the ground landlord, the balance of course being paid by other interests?—Certainly.

4418. Those other interests being affected in the same way, that so much of the rates would come out of the owner's pocket as existed when he let his house, the balance during the lease of the house being paid again by the occupier?—Yes, or an equivalent in diminution.

4419. Your theory being, that at the time of every contract, whether between a ground landlord and a builder, or between the builder who has got the house and the occupier who is willing to take it, the amount of rates is taken into consideration, and goes in diminution of the first ground rent when that contract is made, or else in diminution of the rent for the house when that contract is made?—Clearly: that is to say, a house agreed to be let for 21 years at a 100 l. a year, the rates and taxes being represented by 20 l. a year, the lessee practically pays 120 l. a year rent, or which may be called rent and taxes; if the rates and taxes reach 25 l. a year, he in point of fact is paying 5 l. a year more than he expected to pay; and if they fall 5 l., he gets off for 115 l. instead of 120 l., because my proposition is that if there were no rates and taxes, no local taxation, and no burdens, the house would have let for 120 l. a year.

4421. We have had evidence given us to-day, that in the opinion of one of the witnesses, the tenants do not take the amount of rates which they pay into account in the same way as they do the amount of rent; is that your experience?—It is not my experience; I think every sensible man would inquire; those who come to me for advice as to purchasing a house ask what the rates and taxes are, and what they are likely to reach. A man who is about to take a house at 50 l. or 60 l. a year, or even lower than that, makes a point of ascertaining what the rates and taxes will amount to.

4423. Sir William Tite.] But in point of fact the land tax in the City of London proper, is a very important element, and a very heavy charge?—Yes.

4424. Whereas, take the parish of St. Pancras, or the parish of Chelsea, it is nothing at all; the proportion of the land tax goes for nothing?—Precisely so; it is well known by surveyors that the first thing a prudent man does, if he is about to improve his property, is to redeem the land tax before the tax is assessed upon the higher rental value. For instance, suppose you were going to lay out a tract of land for building purposes, the first thing you would ask is, what is the land tax upon it, and you would forthwith redeem it, as you can do according to law, before you put any property upon it.

4425. I asked a question of the witness who came before you, whether he knew the practice of the great corporations in London, as to letting property, whether they do not exact by covenant with great vigour the net rent, and that all taxes should be paid by the tenant; are you aware whether that is the case?—That is so.

4426. The effect therefore of increased taxation would reach those tenants by means of a re-arrangement of rent; as long as the rent remained under the covenants of a lease of an ordinary length it would not reach them, but it would eventually reach them?—No doubt.

4427. It must come in fact out of the rent?—It comes out of the property, and when the property is in the hands of the freeholder, or in the hands of the leaseholder, it comes out of the leaseholder's pocket over and above what it was when the lease was granted, and ultimately it comes out of the freeholder's pocket.

4428. However, in the main, in London, as far as your experience goes, of course with all the poorer class of houses, the rates are paid by the landlord, whether let by the week, the month, or the year?—Yes.

4429. In the main you admit that the holding in London is very much of that character?—Yes, the rates and taxes of poor houses are paid by the landlord.

4430. But in the better class of houses, they are paid by the tenants?—Yes.

4431. But, whether by the one or the other, you mean to argue that it has the same effect upon the value of the property?—Yes. Suppose I have houses in the East end of London, being the freeholder in possession, and I let them at 9 s. a-week, and pay the rates and taxes, if there were no rates and taxes I should still get the 9 s. a-week; therefore all that I pay in rates and taxes comes off the 9 s. a-week, and falls upon the land.

4432. If, perforce, by Act of Parliament, half the rate were at once to fall upon the landlord, would there be any difficulty, in your mind, in adjusting that question as between landlord and tenant, by some machinery?—I do not think that any machinery could be invented that would meet such a case as that.

4433. You mean that it would interfere with so many bargains?—Yes, it would interfere with so many bargains, and it would give rise to so many of the questions that I put just now. Suppose, for instance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer took off the house duty, it would have to be adjusted between the landlord and the tenant, provided the landlord is to bear any part of the local burdens.

4434. However, you mean that there would be great difficulty in inventing machinery that would adjust matters in the case of such opposition?—I think there would be very great difficulty.

4435. Chairman.] Supposing the house duty were abolished, who would have the advantage of the reduction, the occupier or the owner?—The occupier would for the duration of his lease, but the owner eventually.

4436. All houses above 20 l. are subject to house duty now, but where they are let out in apartments to occupiers, would the occupiers get any proportion of the relief?—Not a halfpenny.

4437. Would not the fact of the taxation on house property being decreased, make it easier for a builder to build where the ground-rent is low, seeing that the charge bears only a small proportion to the cost of building?—If you were to take off the local taxation altogether, my view is that the owner of the land would put it upon the price of the land, and the occupier would get no benefit by it. The way I put it is this: suppose an owner of land builds a house and lets it from year to year, or lets it upon an agreement for three years; he gets the best rent he can; and if the tenant pays a rent of 40 l. a year, and the taxes are 10 l. a year, the landlord gets only 40 l. for his house, whereas if the taxes were taken off, as I said just now, he would get 50 l.

4438. Let me put this case: how low, in some portions of the metropolis, would you consider the proportion of the ground-rent to be to the aggregate rent; is it ever as low as one-tenth?—I cannot call to mind any particular instances.

4439. Would the ground-rent be as low occasionally as 6 l. in a house that would let at 60 l.?—That must depend entirely upon a variety of circumstances. You may let ground at 6 l. a year, and the house may realise more than was anticipated, so that you cannot draw any particular line as to the proportion.

4440. Assuming, as is the case in very poor neighbourhoods, that the ground rent bears a proportion of one-tenth to the total rent, if that were so, and the local taxation amounted to 20 per cent. of the rack rent, and the whole ground rent was only 10 per cent. of the rack rent, then it would be clear that the ground rent could not bear the whole of the taxation?—No, it could not.

4441. And therefore the balance of that taxation would have to fall upon the builder?—In that case it would.

4442. May we, therefore, take this exception to your general rule, that where the ground rent is exceedingly low, and the taxation is exceedingly high, a portion of the taxation would fall upon the builder?—In that extreme case it would, no doubt.

4443. But are you able to state the proportion which the ground rent bears to the rack rent in the east end of London?—It varies very considerably, so that you cannot lay down any specific rule.

4444. In the country districts, I presume, the proportion is not very high?—In the country districts (I am speaking now of within a radius of seven miles of St. Paul's Cathedral), I should think the ground rent is about one-fifth or one-sixth of the rack value.

4445. Would this represent fairly your view that so long as there is any ground rent that ground rent bears, in the readjustment of agreements, the whole of the taxation, and where the taxation exceeds the ground rent, then it falls upon the builder?—Yes, in those extreme cases.

4446. Mr. Gregory.] The rent of a house stands at what practically is the rent of the house, plus rates and taxes?—Yes.

4447. If you were purchasing a leasehold house, you would calculate the amount of rates and taxes as an element on which that purchase was to be made?—Certainly.

4448. With respect to ground rent, most of the leases upon which ground rents are reserved are leases for 99 years, are they not?—Yes.

4449. When a man parts with the possession of that, all that he contemplates is a certain ground rent which he reserves from it?—Yes.

4450. The reversion is inappreciable at that period, and for a good many years afterwards?—Quite so.

4451. We have heard a good deal of the addition to the value of property by means of the metropolitan improvements; but in a long lease of that kind, the reversioner being the one who is to enjoy the addition to the value, his reversion is useless to him?—Yes.

4452. Does not the question of rate vary very considerably; the value of the property at that period elapses?—Yes, quite so.

4453. With regard to the reversioner, as the period approximates so does his liability to this increased taxation become more apparent?—Yes; and in the meanwhile the owner of the leasehold has had all the benefit arising from those metropolitan improvements.

4454. Because he can increase his annual rent?—Yes, certainly.

4455. Mr. Seely.] You said just now that in certain extreme cases the rates would fall upon the builder; but, on the other hand, he would not build in that particular district unless he got the same profit that he would in another district?—It is an extreme case that the Right honourable Chairman put, where the ground rent was so small and the rates and taxes so high, that the builder, in point of fact, could not realise the same same interest for his money upon the expenditure of his bricks and mortar as he would have a right to expect; in point of fact, to give him a fair interest upon his outlay, he ought not to pay any ground rent at all; and that is the reason why small houses cannot be built. If you take a house that cost 120*l.* to build, and the builder expects to get 10 per cent. for his money, that is, 12*l.* a year, add to that 20 or 25 per cent. for rates and taxes, which is equivalent to 15*l.* a year; that is what the ultimate cost would be if he wants to let it; 12*l.* for the interest of his money, and 3*l.* for rates and taxes; you would let that house for 6*s.* a week, and that would be 15*l.* a year. He has to pay no ground rent, and he cannot afford to pay any if he is to have a fair interest for his money.

Mr. H. A. Hunt.

3 May 1870.

4456. I presume he will not build unless he gets a fair interest for his money?—No.

4457. Would it not be the case that where the rates and taxes are increased the ground rent would fall until, as the rates went on increasing, the ground rent would cease; and if they continued increasing, the building would cease from the fact that the builder would lose his money, and he would give over building?—Certainly, it would not be worth his while to build; he would not get any interest for his money.

4458. You did not quite accurately express what you meant when you said, in reply to the Chairman, that there were instances where the builder paid the rates and taxes?—I mean an equivalent.

4459. Chairman.] Did you not mean this, that as between the owner of the land and the owner of the house, the rate will fall upon the owner of the land; but that if the ground rent is not equivalent to the whole of the rates, that the balance will fall upon the builder?—Yes, but that would be in diminution of the interest of his capital.

4460. And therefore, it would tend to diminish the supply of houses?—Unquestionably; because it would not be worth his while to build.

4461. And therefore, the other rents would more or less rise in consequence in the neighbourhood, because of the stoppage of the supply of new houses?—The stopping of the supply of that class of houses.

4462. Mr. Rathbone.] That would tend to raise the rents, would it not?—Unquestionably it would tend to increase the demand for accommodation in houses, and hence the crowding which takes place in the houses that are already built, such as putting three or four people in one room. The only way to remedy that is instead of building houses for a labourer who gets 16*s.* a week, he must be content to live in barracks, or houses built in flats and let at low rents.

4463. Chairman.] Then notwithstanding your view that the owners of land ultimately pay all the rates, it is conceivable that in certain districts where the class of property is very low, and where ground rents are low, and where taxation is high, that taxation may rather interfere with the supply of dwellings for the working classes?—Yes, of houses of that class.

4464. Mr. Rathbone.] And thereby increase the rent that is to be paid by that class?—Increase the rent of the houses which that class would occupy in the absence of other houses that would be built.

4465. And thereby the taxation comes out of the pocket of the occupier in that case?—To that extent it does, because the supply does not keep pace with the demand, but simply on that ground.

4466. Mr. Seely.] You say that the rents are raised by the rates, because it causes the houses to cease being built; do you really think that the people who own houses do not, as a rule for that class of houses, always get as high a rent as they can?—Yes, always.

4467. As a matter of fact, the owners of that class of small houses always will get as high a rent as they possibly can?—Of course they will.

4468. Do the occupiers of those houses always try to pay as small a rent as possible?—Yes.

4469. They can very easily shift their dwellings; it is very little trouble for them to move from one house to another?—There is some inconvenience and some trouble to them unquestionably.

4470. The lower the rent of a house the less trouble it is proportionately for a man to move; one house is as good for a poor man as another?—Yes, but of course there is trouble and expense to a poor man to move his chairs and tables, and all that kind of thing.

4471. Then a poor man lives in a particular district because it is convenient for his work, does it not?—I suppose so.

4472. And the landlord gets as much as he possibly can?—Yes.

4473. How can any rates and taxes fall upon the poor man?—According to my contention they do not.

4474. But in reply to the Honourable Member for Liverpool, you said that the rates did fall upon the occupier?—I said in that extreme case which the Chairman put.

4475. If the landlord always gets as high a rent as he can, and the tenant always pays as small a rent as he can, how possibly can the rate fall upon the tenant?—It falls upon him in the shape of rent.

4476. But if the rate had not existed, the landlord would have got more money in the shape of rent?—He gets the same, because the landlord pays the rates and taxes; if no new houses are built, and the population increases, and the increased population is put into the existing houses, of course the rents would go up.

4477. Mr. Pell.] Practically, in London, there are two persons receiving a rent for the same hereditament; that is to say, the person who owns the land, and indeed the house, and has let his land out at a certain period for building on, and there is also the person who built upon that land who receives another rent?—Yes.

4478. We will call that second person the house-owner or builder; the rent that he receives from the person who inhabits the house, includes, I suppose, the rent which he has paid to the owner of the land, that is, if he is a good man of business?—Yes.

4479. Passing from that to the point of view that the parish would take of it, the party that would make assessment, the assessment that is made with respect to that hereditament is upon the rent, or upon the value of the hereditament after the builder has put his bricks and mortar on it?—Yes, what it will let for.

4480. And I suppose therefore that includes the ground rent?—Certainly.

4481. Could you as a valuer make a separate assessment for the ground rent, unless you made an equivalent reduction from the assessment as it would stand in the rate-book at present?—You must divide it.

4482. Supposing

4482. Supposing you proceeded to assess the owner of the land, you would have to take off something from the assessment of the house-owner as it is now?—Yes, equivalent to the rent which he has paid for it.

4483. Do you consider that at present the ground rent is assessed to the poor-rate?—Yes.

4484. A good deal has been said with regard to who ultimately pays those rates, and a very extreme case has been put to you by the Chairman, but still not an impossible one, that the rates might be so high that really they might pass into a form that never could have been considered at the time the land was let by the landlord, and therefore really they do fall, if they are to be paid at all, upon the person who occupies the house?—Or upon the man who built the house.

4485. All we can say of that is, I suppose, that the builder made a very bad bargain?—That is all that can be said of it.

4486. If he had known that such a contingency would happen, he never would have given any ground rent at all?—Quite so.

4487. Mr. Rathbone.] You rather assumed, I think, in fact you stated it broadly, that a man fixed the price that he would give for his house, and that that price was divided between the ground landlord and the rackrent owner; can a man always fix the price that he will give for his house; does not he often give a great deal more than he likes or intends to give for it?—Yes.

4488. In the case of a working man, if he has to pay a higher price for a house, he would have to live more poorly, or go further off from his work?—Yes; the rents are fixed by the parties themselves, according to their ability to pay. A workman, for instance, pays 9*s.* or 7*s.* a week; if he cannot afford that, he must go into other places in which he can get accommodation for 5*s.* a week. The rents are regulated by the demand, and by the ability of the various classes of society to pay the rents.

4489. You stated that the case put by the Chairman was an extreme case?—Quite an extreme case.

4490. I confess that my experience would rather go to the contrary; but, to a certain extent, does not what the Chairman put arise in every case in which the population has increased beyond the supply of houses to meet its wants, and where, therefore, that population has to induce fresh capital to come in and fresh houses to be built?—According to my experience, houses have always been provided where the population has increased and the demand has increased.

4491. But, to induce those houses to be built, a certain rate of net rent, free of taxation, has to be paid to the builders of those houses?—Yes, certainly.

4492. When fresh houses are required to be built, is not the occupier who requires those fresh houses to be built obliged to pay an amount of rent and rates together which will leave a net rent to the builder sufficient to allow those houses to be built?—Certainly.

4493. Therefore if they are obliged to pay that greater fixed rent, and if those taxes are increased, the most of that money must come out of their pockets?—That does not follow at all, because the increased taxation may be such as to prevent the landlord getting a higher rent, proportionate to that increase.

4494. Then he would not build houses according to that principle?—That is a very extreme case; whereas I put to the honourable Member the case where the rents were so low, that unless you build them in flats, or in barracks, you cannot build separate houses for persons at rent so low, but you may build them in blocks.

4495. Excuse me, I understood you to admit that when occupiers wanted fresh houses to be built, they must pay for the building of those houses a net rent sufficient to repay them for that investment?—Quite so, and I say that still.

4496. Then if that is the case the amount that the occupier would have to pay for rent and taxes together, must be sufficiently large to admit of that net rent; and if the taxes are increased, and his net rent is a fixed sum, which he must pay of course, that increased taxation will come out of the occupier's pocket?—But the occupier would not pay it; he would say, "I cannot afford to pay it; I think the man has made a bad bargain."

4497. I am speaking of before houses are built, to induce the houses to be built; most clearly the rents of that district must rise to such a rate as will repay a man the net sum, must they not?—Yes.

4498. If rents rise, the people who pay the rents must pay then?—Yes, of course they do if they can afford to pay them; if they can live in the houses they pay the rents; but there are cases where it is not worth while for a man to build a house, because he cannot get any fair return for his money.

4499. Chairman.] In such a case they must take it out of some other item of expenditure?—Yes; they must live in a house of less dimensions or become lodgers.

4500. Therefore although this increased taxation may not raise the rents because a man cannot pay more, he may have to pay more by the reduced comfort or inconveniences to which he is subjected?—Yes; or go into lodgings and not have a house.

4501. That affects the dwelling of the people, and to a certain extent it might affect their mode of life?—Yes.

4502. Sir H. Williamson.] Do you agree with Sir John Thwaites about the metropolitan improvement rate, that it would be right that the Bethnal Green people should pay their share of their metropolitan rate; I mean for the construction of the Thames Embankment, to be raised partly from the owners, and partly from the occupiers?—They benefit by it indirectly, I suppose.

4503. But very indirectly?—Yes, very indirectly certainly.

4504. And they ought not in fairness to pay the same share as people who would benefit more directly?—I think in fairness that may be so; in fact, the metropolitan improvements have been partially paid out of the wine and coal duties, which seems to me to be a legitimate source from which to draw the money for such projects.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN HAYWARD, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Hayward. 6 May 1870.

4505. Chairman.] YOU are Clerk to the Commissioners of Sewers for the district near Dartford?—From Lombard's Wall to Gravesend Bridge.

4506. Could you state to the Committee the constitution of that Commission?—It is by a Commission issued by the Crown, and they act under this Commission and under the Laws of Sewers from the time of Henry the Eighth, and the different Acts since that period.

4507. Is the Commission issued by the Lord Chancellor?—It comes from Chancery.

4508. What is the date of your Commission?—The 27th of July 1861.

4509-10. Could you read to the Committee the leading paragraphs as to the duties of the Commissioners, and as to their rating powers?—It is first directed to certain specified persons who are constituted Commissioners under it. It says, "Greeting. Know ye, that forasmuch as the walls, ditches, banks, gutters, sewers, gates, calcies, bridges, streams, and other defences by the coasts of the sea and marsh grounds lying and being within the limits extending from Lombard's Wall to Gravesend Bridge, in our county of Kent, or in the borders or confines of the same, by rage of the sea flowing and re-flowing, and by means of the trenches of freshwaters descending and having course by divers ways to the sea, be so dirupt, lacerate and broken, and also the common passages for ships, ballangers, and boats in the rivers, streams, and other floods within the said limits, or in the borders or confines of the same by means of setting up, erecting, and making of streams, mills, bridges, ponds, fish-garths, mill-dams, locks, hibbing wears, locks and floodgates, or other like letts, impediments, or annoyances, be letted and interrupted, so that great and inestimable damage for default of reparation of the said walls, ditches, banks, fences, sewers, gates, gutters, calcies, bridges, and streams; and also by means of setting up, erecting, making, and enlarging of the said fish-garths, mill dams, locks, hebbing wears, locks, floodgates, and other like annoyances in times past hath happened, and yet is to be feared that far greater hurt, loss, and damage is like to ensue unless that speedy remedy be provided in that behalf: We therefore, for that by reason of our dignity and prerogative Royal, we be bound to provide for the safety and preservation of our realm of England, willing that speedy remedy be had in the premises, have assigned you our justices to carry into execution within the said limits the powers and provisions of 'The Land Drainage Act, 1861;'" and then they assign them powers to perform all that is necessary for keeping up those works, but especially the Thames Embankment.

4511. Who are the Commissioners?—They begin with the Lord Lieutenant of the county, the Earl of Romney, the Earl of Darnley, Viscount Sydney, the Lord Bishop of Rochester, Lord Wynford, Lord Tredegar, the late Sir Thomas Wilson, Sir Percyvall Dyke, Sir Joseph Hawley, Sir Lyon Goldsmid, Sir Frederick Currie, the Bailiff of Romney Marsh, the Expenditors of five Waterings, Mr. Urquhart Arbuthnot, Mr. Henry Hulse Berens, Mr. Richard Benyon Berens, Mr. Frederick Barne, Mr. Robert Bradford, Mr. James Chapman, Mr. William Greenwood Chapman, and a great many others. There are altogether, I think, nearly 100, and those comprise all the owners of land in the district, and the magistrates.

4512. When you say that it comprises all the owners, is it a selection of owners, or is it every freeholder in the district?—No, it is not that; I am not quite correct in saying perhaps every owner, because there are some small owners that are not on the commission, but it comprises all the principal owners and others that are not owners who are specified.

4513. Are they all justices?—No, not all.

4514. According to your knowledge of the matter, is it an arbitrary selection of the Lord Chancellor's?—He generally takes the list forwarded by the acting Commissioners, but it is arbitrary, no doubt.

4515. When you say that the list is forwarded by the acting Commissioners, do they change from year to year?—No, but there are generally a certain number; for instance, many of those noblemen that I have mentioned never come near the place, but those round about and in the district attend.

4516. He

4516. He takes the list of the acting Commissioners; but in 1861, when this Commission was appointed, how was the selection made?—This has gone on ever since the time of Henry the Eighth; it is only a renewal.

4517. It was only a renewal in 1861?—No, only a renewal.

4518. But a Commission has existed for that neighbourhood for a very much longer time?—Yes, since the time of Henry the Eighth.

4519. What was the Commission which was issued in 1861?—The Commission before that expiring, which they all do in 10 years, there was a new Commission appointed.

4520. Does this Commission expire in 10 years?—No, since the last Act, the Act of the year before last, they are made perpetual, and they do not expire.

4321. As a matter of fact, those Commissioners are simply nominees?—Yes.

4522. Does the law require them to be interested in the district?—It requires a qualification of about 100 l. a year freehold in the district.

4523. Does the Commission grant any rating powers, or do they get their rating powers under the Act?—The Commission authorises them to levy rates in the district for the purposes of the Commission. I may say that their duties are, "To survey the walls, streams, ditches, banks, gutters," and so forth; "and the same cause to be made, corrected, repaired, amended, put down, or reformed as the case shall require, after your wisdoms and discretions. And therein, as well to ordain and do after the form, tenor and effect of all and singular the statutes and ordinances made before the first day of March, in the 23rd year of the late King Henry the 8th, touching the premises or any of them, as also to inquire, by the oaths of the honest and lawful men of our said county, place or places, where such defaults or annoyances be (as well within liberties as without) by whom the truth may the rather be known through whose defaults the said hurts and damages have happened, and who hath or holdeth any lands or tenements or common of pasture or profit of fishing, or hath or may have any hurt, loss or disadvantage by any manner of means in the said places as well near to the said dangers, letts and impediments so inhabiting or dwelling thereabouts, by the said walls, ditches, banks, gutters, gates, sewers, trenches and other the said impediments and annoyances; and all those persons and every of them to tax, assess, charge, distrain, and punish as well within the metes, limits and bounds of old time accustomed or otherwise or elsewhere within our realm of England, after the quantity of their lands, tenements, and rents by the number of acres and perches after the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit, or after the quantity of their common of pasture or profit of fishing or other commodities there, by such ways and means and in such manner and form as you shall see most convenient to be ordained and done for redress and reformation to be had in the premises."

4524. Sir J. Lawrence.] Did I rightly gather that they are to tax profits of fishings?—Yes, "common of pasture or profit of fishing." I may say that that has never been done in this district.

4525. Chairman.] Will you state to the Committee, not in technical language, but practically, how you levy the rates?—We levy a wallscot, which is an acreage scot every year. Within this district there are 17 different levels from Lombard's Wall at Charlton, near Woolwich, to Gravesend Bridge, which is practically in the parish of Northfleet; that is a distance of about 25 miles. There are 17 different levels varying in acreage, and varying, of course, in position, and the wallscot in respect of each also varying in amount.

4526. How do you levy your rates?—The Commissioners once in the year before making the rate, make a personal survey of each level; six Commissioners are required to make a personal survey, attended by our surveyor and the clerk, and they take an account of the repairs that are necessary for keeping up the Thames Embankment, and for the maintenance of the common sewers in those levels. Having done that, they meet afterwards and take those estimates into account, and then they arrive at a certain sum for each level, and then they issue a warrant for the collection of that amount.

4527. Upon whom do they levy the rate?—Upon the owner.

4528. Do they serve the notice upon the owner?—Yes.

4529. Not upon the occupier?—This is the form of levy: "We whose hands and seals are hereunto subscribed and set, being justices and Commissioners of Sewers for our Sovereign Lady the Queen," for such-and-such limits, "to Charles Beadle, and to all and every the owners and occupiers of marsh lands lying within Wheatley Level, in the parish of Erith"; and the sum of 2 l. 9 s. 6 d. it would appear this year is directed to be paid at a certain place on the 1st of December, and notice of that is affixed on the church door, and that the collector will attend in the porch (that is the old form) on a certain day; and that is the only notice that is given, beyond the subsequent demand which is made practically through the occupier, I have no doubt.

4530. Is there any appeal against the rate?—To the Commissioners there is, not elsewhere; at least, not as to the amount.

4531. They must pay what the Commissioners impose upon them?—Yes.

4532. Is there any rate in the pound beyond which you cannot go?—No, it is unlimited.

4533. The theory, I presume, is that they are the owners in the district, and that they are taxing themselves?—Yes.

4534. But there is no legal requirement enacting that all the owners are to be represented?—No.

4535. And the number of the Commissioners is left entirely open?—Yes, quite so.

4536. What is the highest rate in the pound, that you have levied in any of your levels?—Twenty shillings per acre in Stone Little Level last year, and they have been very much higher. There are 40 acres in Stone Little.

4537. Probably an acre itself would not be worth more to rent?—The average rental there is 40 s. per acre, the tenant paying the scot.

4538. Therefore he would have to pay 40 s. for his rent, and 20 s. for his wallscot?—Yes.

4539. That is for one particular year, I presume?—Yes; the average throughout the whole district is about 10 s. per acre annually.

4540. That represents, in fact, the cost for the maintaining of the defences against inundations and so forth?—Yes, and the common sewers for taking taking off what was originally called the superfluous water.

Mr. J. Hayward.

6 May 1870.

4541. What are the common sewers?—They are the sewers that run through the different levels, some sewers taking in one or two levels, and they take off the water from the uplands.

4542. Are the Committee to understand that the main duties performed by those commissioners have nothing to do with what we generally call the sewering of towns?—No, nothing.

4543. They have simply to deal with the protection against the inundations of the sea or the river and waters?—Yes; and carrying off the waters which come down from the uplands into the marshes, which is a very material thing.

4544. When you say that it is charged upon the owner, does the owner make an arrangement that it shall be paid by the occupier?—It varies in practice; in some cases the tenants take the land, paying the wallscot, and, in other cases, they take it, the landlord paying the scot.

4545. Do they give notice to you as to who is going to pay it?—No.

4546. Then do you go to the owner in all cases?—No; we go to the occupier, practically, because the owner lives away. We go to the occupier, and he pays the scot, and we do not know how that is dealt with afterwards.

4547. But have you legally got a remedy against the occupier?—Only so far that we can distrain upon the land in whosesoever occupation it is.

4548. Is that under the power of the Commission, or under the powers of an Act of Parliament?—We have power to distrain under the commission, and also under the Act.

4549. You would distrain upon the land?—Yes; we do upon the land.

4550. You could not, I presume, go to the personal goods of the occupier?—Not off the land.

4551. Can you go personally against the owner?—Yes; we can go against the owner's goods anywhere in England.

4552. It is a debt due to you from the owner, but you have the security of the land as against the occupier too?—It is on the land, and it would affect the occupier. This, practically, would be the case. Suppose the scot were in arrear; a distress warrant would be issued to the collector to levy the amount, and he would go upon the land, and whatever stock he found there he could take.

4553. Has the occupier got a legal remedy against the owner for recovering it?—I should think he would have, if the owner had agreed to pay the wallscot, but that would be a private arrangement amongst themselves.

4554. But you have no legal remedy against the occupier, except so far as you find stock of his upon the land of the owner?—Quite so.

4555. Will you read the paragraph in the Commission bearing upon that point?—This is the form of the warrant: "We, the said commissioners of sewers, do by these indented presents or warrants of commission, ordain and decree that every owner and owners of the marsh lands lying and being within the said level shall at or upon the 1st day of December next ensuing, the date of these indented presents or warrants of commission in the church porch of the parish aforesaid, between the hours of 8 and 11 of the clock in the forenoon, and two and five of the afternoon of the same day, pay and deliver into the hands and custody of the aforesaid Charles Beadle or his lawful deputy" (he is the collector); "which said Charles Beadle we do by these indented presents or warrants of commission ordain, make, and appoint to be collector and expenditor of the said level, for every acre of marsh land lying within the said level whereof he, she, or they, on the 14th day of November 1866, was, where, are, or to be owner or owners, the sum of 1*s.* 6*d.*, of lawful money of England for his, her, or their tax or scot, over and above all other sum and sums before the date of these indented presents, by virtue of the above-named commission, have been legally taxed or assessed on the marsh lands lying and being within the said level or levy. And if upon the said 1st day of December and between the afore-limited hours, at the aforesaid place, default be made in payment of the said monies so taxed and assessed, within three days next after the afore-limited 1st day of December, or at any time after, during the continuance of these indented presents or warrants of commission, to distrain the goods and chattels of all and every the owner or owners so making default or upon their lands, in whose occupation soever they be lying within the said level, or elsewhere, within the said county of Kent."

4556. Does it say that you can seize the stock belonging to the occupier?—That would be an incident that the law of distress would give you.

4557. Have you ever had any case where you have proceeded to distrain?—Yes.

4558. And have you distrained against the goods of the occupier within your recollection?—We have taken the stock that was then upon the land; it has not been frequent, but I have known it done.

4559. Mr. Pell.] Was the occupier a separate person from the owner in that case?—We did not inquire as to the ownership of the stock at all, but we found it there, and we took it.

4560. Chairman.] Do you happen to remember whether the stock was sold to pay the rate, or whether it was released upon payment?—I remember one instance where it was sold, but I think only one.

4561. You do not trouble yourself as to whether it belongs to the owner or to the occupier; you only know what the general law is, and not the arrangements between the owner and the occupier for the payment of this wallscot?—Precisely; we know nothing really on that subject.

4562. Can you state to the Committee what is the annual average amount that you raise?—£. 4,851; the scot levied is about 2,000 l. for the whole of the levels; then that would be, as I stated, about 10*s.* per acre.

4563. Has that rate been 10*s.* in your neighbourhood for a long time?—Yes, it has for some years; I remember it very much higher, but I am speaking of many years ago.

4564. How long have you been connected with the Commission?—More than 40 years.

4565. And within that time it has been generally a matter of 10*s.* in the pound, or higher?—Yes, but very seldom higher; sometimes it would be higher, when there is a new sluice to be put in, or any extraordinary works.

4566. Can you state the rate per acre in the various levels?—Yes, in Crabtree Level 2*s.* 6*d.* an acre, Cornmarsh 17*s.* an acre, Church Level 3*s.* 6*d.*, Abbey 8*s.* 6*d.*, Great Breach 6*s.*, Green 10*s.*,

10 s., West Marsh 10 s., Crayford 10 s. 6 d., Stone Great 10 s. 6 d., Stone Little 20 s., Dartford Salt 8 s., Dartfort Fresh 10 s. 6 d., Swanscombe 12 s., Northfleet 5 s., Wheatley 5 s.

4567. How do you arrange your levels; is it arbitrary with the commissioners to divide the whole district?—There is the power, but the levels never have been varied since I have been connected with the Commission.

4568. The variety of those rates arises, does it not, from the difference in the amount of work which has to be done upon those different levels?—Yes; and the number of acres; they vary very much in level, and also from this circumstance materially, where the levels front the Thames. One level has a very much larger frontage of the Thames Embankment than another, and those are the heavy levels.

4569. Would the Commission have power to throw all those 17 levels into one, and to levy one rate over the whole?—I think there would be the power if there were proper reasons for doing it.

4570. Supposing they did so, and there were improper reasons, would the owners have any appeal?—I think they might then remove the proceedings into the Court of Queen's Bench.

4571. But would it be within their full lawful authority to do it?—I think it is within their legal authority, but I think that they would be bound to exercise discretion, because those lands in the different levels no doubt have changed ownership from time to time upon the calculation of the average amount of scot.

4572. Will you state to the Committee what system there is for auditing the accounts?—There is a separate account kept for each level, and once a year the levels being credited with the scot received, and vouchers given for the expenditure for the levels, they are audited by a public auditor, who is, in this case, Mr. Arnold, the auditor for the West Kent poor law district.

4573. Is it compulsory upon the commissioners of sewers to employ a public auditor?—No.

4574. Do you happen to know whether it is universal with other commissions?—I do not know, but I rather think not, because we have only done so for the last year or two.

4575. Before that last year or two, what was the audit?—The audit then was by the commissioners at an annual meeting after the works had been done.

4576. The commissioners auditing their own accounts?—Yes.

4577. You are not bound, you say, to employ an auditor; can you legally apply the funds to the payment of an auditor?—We have thought so; there is power to appoint officers generally.

4578. Are the commissioners of sewers responsible to anybody at all?—They would, like other public bodies, be responsible for arbitrary acts, I apprehend, but they would not be personally liable if they took due and proper caution.

4579. What I mean is, that they are supreme as far as their acts are concerned; they do not stand under the Home Office?—No.

4580. And there is no public department that can overhaul them?—No, except the Court of Queen's Bench, by the removal of the accounts there. Supposing they were to attempt to levy a rate for an illegal purpose, then the accounts might be removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, and they would get the rate quashed if they were not justified.

4581. Have they power to appoint officers without any limit as to expenditure?—Yes.

4582. But they have no control over their accounts, except so far as they choose to appoint an auditor of their own free-will?—No, except as I said, the Court of Queen's Bench might interfere.

4583. But the Court of Queen's Bench could not compel them to appoint an auditor, I presume?—No, I apprehend not; but I mean, supposing they made any illegal outlay, they might be controlled then by the Court of Queen's Bench.

4584. So soon as they go beyond their powers, they would of course be amenable to the law like anyone else?—Yes.

4585. But so far as their powers go they are supreme?—Yes.

4586. And their rating powers are perfectly uncontrolled by law?—Yes.

4587. Can you give evidence about any other part of England as regards these commissioners of sewers, except Kent?—No, I cannot.

4588. Do you know whether the proceedings are similar in Kent generally to what they are elsewhere?—Not the mode of proceeding; that is not, I think.

4589. There is no general code drawn up for the various commissioners of sewers?—No.

4590. I presume that you act by tradition?—With regard to repairs, when I came there, and just prior to that, there was a different system in force; the repairs were surveyed by a jury on every occasion every year. A jury of 24 used to present the works that they deemed necessary, and so forth. The commission thought that that was not a desirable course, as the jury were composed of the trades-persons in the neighbourhood, and they then dispensed with the jury, except upon the commencement of each commission, when the jury make a presentment finding what lands are liable to scot, and the owners and occupiers in respect of those lands. That is now the only resort that there is to a jury, except upon extraordinary occasions. You will remember the explosion in the Erith Marshes a few years ago, when there was a very large additional outlay; then it was deemed expedient that a jury should be summoned to state upon whom that outlay ought to fall; because, although the breaking away of a part of the wall occurred only in one level, yet if the water had come in it would have gone over a very much larger district than was comprised in that level; and the commissioners were advised by the then law officers of the Crown that they should make a presentation as to the owners of the portions of the land that either did avoid damage or received benefit from the works that were then done, and the scot then was levied, not on the specific level in which the injury occurred, but over a very much larger proportion of land, and then there was a presentation by a jury.

4591. That proves that where the case warranted, the commissioners are not bound to keep to any special system of rating according to geographical limits?—Precisely so; that is what I intended rather to convey to you, that on extraordinary occasions they would do so; but they would not be justified, I think, in capriciously varying the levels.

4592. The appointment of commissioners themselves is an honorary appointment, is it not?—Yes.

4593. What is the staff?—There is a clerk, a surveyor, surveyor, and the collectors of the scot, who are termed expenditors, but they are really collectors.

Mr. J. Hayward.

6 May 1870.

4594. You make a return, do you not, to the Home Office, once a year, of your expenditure?—Yes.

4595. I see by that that your salaries and the management cost about 350 l.?—That is so.

4596. And you expend 1,350 l. for ordinary works and maintenance?—It is rather more; but it might have been a year when there was little laid out, but I have the amount for the year 1869.

4597. What is the amount in that year?—It would be 2,300 l., including the salaries and expenses.

4598. Does that include the new works and improvements?—There are no new works.

4599. I see in the Local Taxation Returns, you return your expenditure under four columns; "for ordinary works and maintenance," "for new works and improvements," "salaries and management," and "other expenditure;" have you the figures before you of those four columns for 1868?—No.

4600. Will you state if you can to the Committee the expenditure of 1869?—The expenditure of 1869 will amount to 2,300 l. as near as may be, and of that there is about 350 l. for expenses of management.

4601. Where do the commissioners meet?—Dartford is the place for the general meeting; but in making the first survey, they walk from Erith to Charlton. The second survey is from Erith to Deptford, which takes the small level, the Crayford Level, and then they walk from Dartford down to Northfleet.

4602. Are there a certain number of commissioners who every year perform the duties, or is it left very much to the surveyor?—Very much the same officers attend. There must be six to survey, and there are generally seven or eight.

4603. But a very large number of the hundred do not attend at all?—Precisely so.

4604. Will you state under what Acts of Parliament you act?—There is the Act of Henry VIII., and there is the Sewers Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 22, and then there is the Drainage Act of 1861.

4605. Is it a fact in your district, as it is in some others, that a difference is made in the mode of levying the rate for permanent works, and for the current expenditure?—No, the same system is pursued.

4606. How do those varying Acts apply to you?—The 3 & 4 Will. 4, varies the mode of proceeding in some respects.

4607. Can you state any particular variation in the law that is made by the 3 & 4 Will. 4?—No, it was for the purpose of giving greater facilities for carrying out the Act; there was no change in substance. Then the Act of 1861, as you are aware, had more reference to the drainage of land for agricultural purposes.

4608. Does that Act affect you?—It would if it had been adopted, but it never has been adopted in this district; the land is very well drained.

4609. Did the Drainage Act of 1861 render your Commission permanent?—No, it was an Act passed, I think, the year before last, which enacted that it should not be necessary to apply for a renewal of those commissions at the expiration of 10 years, but that they should go on.

4610. Will you state to the Committee, when a commissioner dies, how his successor is appointed?—There is not immediately any appointment; but when the attendance becomes few, then, by petition, other names can be sent up to be included in the commission.

4611. Practically it is a self-elected body, so far as the commissioners send up a name, and the Lord Chancellor generally adopts that name?—Yes; I have never known any variation in the name.

4613. Do you see any reason why the adjoining level should not be thrown in when the rate is made, in order that the burden might be thrown more lightly over the whole district which is benefited?—The reason would be this: suppose that you have land in a level that had always been charged, on the average, 3*s.* 6*d.* per acre, you would not like it to be put into a level which would immediately become chargeable to 1*l.* I think the reason originally was this, that the levels were taken in many years ago from time to time, and the river frontage is very disproportionate in some of the levels.

4614. You have stated that the commissioners took that into consideration in one instance; but does not it frequently happen that, when there is an irruption of the river and the land is damaged, if it is immediately repaired the adjoining level is benefited likewise?—That has never occurred, except on the occasion of the explosion at Erith, and then we took the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, who were of opinion that it was an extraordinary event that was not attributable to any negligence or accident, and that therefore the ordinary repairs did not extend to a case of that extent, and that it should be spread over a larger area; just the area that was spared any damage by the work that was done. In that case the landowners did, I know, practically bear the additional outlay, and even in those instances where the tenant had to pay the scot, yet practically the landlords felt it to be an extraordinary case and bore the outlay.

4615. Mr. Seely.] Are the owners and the occupiers who pay those rates quite satisfied with the constitution of the body?—We have had them before us on several occasions, and I think they are generally satisfied and do not wish alterations. It has been a question with the commissioners whether it would not be beneficial to raise a larger sum of money under the borrowing powers of the Sewers Act, and do more efficiently at once the repairs, and we have summoned the owners on several occasions to get their consent to do it, but they have never given it.

4616. I am not speaking of their satisfaction with any particular act of the commissioners, but with the general constitution of the board?—We have never had any complaint on that score.

4617. Sir H. Williamson.] Have you borrowed any money on the security of your rates?—No.

4618. Have you always money in hand?—Except whatever may be in the treasurer's hands.

4619. Supposing

Mr. J. Hayward.

6 May 1870.

4619. Supposing that those ratepayers were aggrieved, or thought themselves aggrieved with what they might think was want of duty on your part, would you go to a court of law?—Yes.

4620. Supposing those ratepayers persuaded the jury that they were right, how would they get compensation?—If the commissioners had exceeded their duty and authority they would be personally liable no doubt; otherwise, if they act within the limits of their power, they would not be.

4621. Mr. Birley.] Do the commissioners substantially proceed now under the Act of Henry VIII.?—Yes.

4622. With hardly any variation?—They do substantially proceed under that Act.

4623. Do you always collect the whole rate, or have you defaulters?—No, never; we have no defaulters.

4624. You spoke of the acreage; how do you reckon the acreage; you have a lineal measure by the bank of the river, but how deep do you go?—The limit is a limit that has existed from time immemorial. We have a plan of the whole level.

4625. In the time of Henry VIII. was a plan made of the district?—I do not know that.

4626. However, some time or other a plan has been made of the district, and the tax is levied upon the land which was then declared to be subject to the tax?—Yes, the map upon which we act now was made about 50 years ago.

4627. Mr. Smith.] You spoke of the maintenance of bridges; do you maintain the bridges within the limits of the level where any of those limits would fall upon the county?—No, we do not maintain the bridges. It is mentioned in the commission in general terms, because the commission is issued in different districts throughout England, but we have not a single bridge.

4628. Do not the drains of which you spoke, that carry off the water from the high land, generally benefit the lands beyond the limits of the level?—Yes, very much no doubt.

4629. And that land does not in anyway contribute?—No, it does not.

4631. The result is that, at the expense of the limited area of the levels, the adjoining property has been very considerably increased in value?—Yes, it has, no doubt. The whole district has really been benefited, because, comparing that district now with what I remember of it 40 years ago, ague has almost entirely disappeared, and that improvement in health would benefit the upland, particularly for building purposes.

4632. Mr. Walter.] When you proposed to borrow money for the purpose of making permanent works, which should have the effect of reducing the rate, to what extent do you think those rates will be reduced by the construction of such works?—I cannot quite accurately answer your question, but it would be a very material reduction.

4633. Did you propose to throw the annual charge of that loan equally on the levels, or in rateable proportion to the amount they pay at present?—We should have taken, I have no doubt, the rateable proportion to what they pay now.

4634. But they objected to that rate?—Yes; they objected to raising the present amount.

4635. By what consideration is the size of the various levels determined; is it by engineering, or by what means?—They have always been continued the same.

4636. By what were they originally determined?—I can only conjecture that, because we have no account of the origin of the levels. They must have been taken in from the river, from time to time; one level, and then another, and so they assumed their present size.

4637. There was no reference to either any engineering difficulties or to the cost of maintaining the works upon those levels?—Not at all. That is indicated by the fact that there were counter-walls throughout this district; that is, one level would be surrounded by a wall, and another by another. The commissioners having now given great attention to the repair of the Thames Embankment, those counter-walls have been allowed to sink and disappear in a great extent as unnecessary; but, evidently, they were originally the protection of that particular level.

4638. They were inclosures, in fact?—Yes.

Mr. JAMES GRANT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Grant.

4639. Chairman.] YOU are Clerk to the Guardians of the Lancaster Union, are you not?—I am.

4640. Have you held any other parochial or public offices of any kind?—I am clerk to the assessment committee of the same union, and the superintendent registrar.

4641. Have you been brought into contact at all with municipal affairs?—I have held no office in connection with municipal affairs; but having held office so many years, 30 years, I have given considerable attention to the question of rating generally.

4642. You are acquainted, more or less, are you not, with the rating, both as regards the poor rate and the borough rate?—To some extent.

4643. Has not Lancaster also a local board?—It has.

4644. Have you a general district rate levied in Lancaster?—Yes.

4645. Is there a public water supply rate?—There is.

4646. Perhaps you will be able to state to the Committee the various rates levied at present in Lancaster?—In the first place there is the poor rate, which would average probably 1 s. 4 d. in the pound, and perhaps a little more. Then there is the general district rate, under the Public Health Act and the Local Government Act; and in the case of houses and buildings of above 5 l. rateable value, that rate has been 2 s. in the pound for the last seven years. Under a Local Act, the 5th of George 4, cap. 26, houses under 5 l. rateable value enjoyed exemption from rating for certain purposes. That exemption was continued by the subsequent General Acts. Such houses pay only 8 d. in the pound, and that is for severage and water works.

Mr. J. Grant.

6 May 1870.

4647. Are there any other rates?—The land and the railways are only charged upon one-fourth of their rateable value, at 1 s. 8 d. in the pound, being exempt from the lighting rate, which is 4 d. in the borough of Lancaster.

4648. That lighting rate being included in the 2 s. which you mentioned before?—Yes, it is; there is no borough rate; the corporation do not levy a borough rate; they have property of their own, and consequently the whole of the rates are levied by the board of health; there has not been a borough rate for a number of years.

4649. They have power to levy a borough rate, I presume?—Of course, and they did so formerly, but they have not required to do so for some time.

4650. Do you remember how long ago they levied a borough rate?—I think it must have been some 20 years ago; I cannot speak with certainty.

4651. Soon after their constitution possibly?—It was levied by the corporation, not by the board of health, that is to say, the council of the borough.

4652. Have they levied a borough rate under the Municipal Corporation Act of 1834?—Yes, they have since 1835; but it must be 20 years, I think, speaking from impression, since a borough rate was levied.

4653. Do you know whether they had power to levy a borough rate previous to that under the Local Act?—Yes; under the Act of the 5 Geo. 4, they were called then commissioners; the corporation did not lay that rate, but the body of commissioners; any person, in fact, who was an owner or an occupier of property of a certain amount, was eligible to be a commissioner, and that body was superseded by the adoption of the Public Health Act.

4654. Am I right in supposing that there are two rates which could be levied at Lancaster quite separately; there is the power of the General Board of Health to levy a general district rate, and which is actually levied, and there is also power to the corporation, if their own funds do not suffice, to levy a borough rate?—I believe that is so under the Corporation Acts.

4655. If they levied that borough rate the exemption would not, I presume, hold good as regards the houses below 5 l.?—I think not, but I do not speak with certainty, for I have not applied my mind to it. I must explain that I came here very hastily, not having been prepared at all. I have a general knowledge and information upon these points, but I have not prepared it specially.

4656. What other rates are there besides those which you have enumerated?—No other rates in the township of Lancaster.

4657. Is there not a public water supply rate?—That is, so far as the rate is concerned, included in the general district rate. There is a charge for water rents which people take or not as they choose; I have a table here showing the charge for water supply, but that is rather a charge for the use of the commodity.

4658. I see in the returns made by the local board that they separate the general district rate from the public water supply rate, but you have no knowledge upon the subject; in collecting them they collect them together, do they not?—No, there are separate collectors; the general district rate is levied upon all property in the manner that I speak of, but the water rent is only charged to the persons who actually use the water; it is very generally used, because the people have applied for it.

4659. But how is it with regard to the rate put on originally for building the waterworks of the town?—That is included in the general district rate, and is part of the 2 s. that I speak of.

4660. Could you say how much it is of the 2 s.?—I do not know that, but it goes in liquidation of the debt; the waterworks have been very prosperous.

4661. How are the police paid in Lancaster?—By a watch committee, consisting of members of the corporation.

4662. And the expense is supplied, is it, out of the property of the corporation?—Yes, except such proportion as the Government allows.

4663. Do you happen to know what the receipts of the corporation are, more or less?—They have an income from property, tolls markets, and other sources of about 1,700 l. or 1,800 l., exclusive of the Government allowance for the police.

4664. Have they any property in land?—They have part property in land and in houses, and they advanced a large sum on loan to the Board of Health for their works.

4665. I presume that their property arises from the rents of houses and of land?—It is so chiefly.

4666. The lighting and paving is managed, is it not, by the local board?—It is.

4667. But the police is managed by the corporation?—The persons are the same; the borough and the local board district and the township of Lancaster are co-extensive.

4668. Is the corporation the local board?—It is so.

4669. Are their officers the same?—There is the town clerk, who acts as clerk to the corporation; they have another person for the clerk to the board of health, and they have a person who collects the water rents, and a person who collects the general district rate; the board of health have also a surveyor.

4670. But though they are identically the same persons, they act under different Acts of Parliament?—They do.

4671. And they keep, I presume, entirely separate accounts?—They do.

4672. The two administrations, so to speak, are entirely distinct?—It is so; the clerk to the board of health is accountant to the corporation, but I may observe that the meetings are at the same time, and when the corporation meeting is ended they resolve themselves into a board of health, and then transact the business of the board of health.

4673. Can you see any possible object in keeping the two bodies distinct in that way?—None whatever.

4674. Have you ever heard of instances of their duties at all clashing; has there been any doubt as to what duties attach to the one, and what duties attach to the other?—I do not remember anything of that kind having occurred but it has often appeared very puzzling to me although I am so well acquainted with the details of their administration. They seem to me to be mixed up together in such a manner that one can hardly understand how they stand; the town clerk is the solicitor to the local board of health, and that seems to amalgamate the duties even still more.

4675. As far as you are aware, have they a separate treasurer?—I believe not.

4676. Do they keep separate balances of their funds at the bank?—I should think they do.

4677. Are you acquainted with the system of audit in the two cases?—Yes; there are two auditors appointed annually, nominally by the burgesses, and they receive two guineas each, but the burgesses have never exercised their votes upon the appointments.

4678. They are not professional auditors?—No, not at all; I was once appointed auditor myself some years ago; it is a common practice for two gentlemen to be appointed, and to give the fee to a local charity; in fact, the audit is very much inferior to the poor law audit, and to the audit of the board of health in another part of the union under the poor law district auditor.

4679. Is it an amateur audit?—It is quite so.

4680. How long does it take to audit the accounts?—I cannot say; it depends upon the conscience of the individual appointed: in some cases I dare say it is not a very long affair.

4681. It is not what you might call a skilled audit at all, is it?—It is not by any means what you would call a skilled professional audit; in fact, the legality of the charges I should say is very little gone into.

4682. The vouchers are looked at and compared, are they not?—Yes, I should think so.

4683. But it is not at all minutely conducted?—I should think by no means, generally speaking; but it is a great many years since I had any connection with it.

4684. But the local board of health is under a different system of audit, I presume?—The accounts are not audited by a professional auditor.

4685. Are you positive upon that?—Yes.

4686. If they come under the Public Health Act there is a general audit?—As I understand, under the Public Health Act, the accounts of the board of health, where the board of health is not the corporation of the borough, are audited by the poor law district auditor; but in a case like Lancaster they are audited by persons appointed to audit the corporation accounts.

4687. The distinction is this, that where the local board is an independent body, and is simply a local board, there the audit is a professional audit?—That is so.

4688. But where the same body is a corporation, the corporation having been exempted from a public audit, that exemption is extended to their new duties?—I have no doubt that is so.

4689. Are you acquainted with the relations of the borough to the county as regards lunatic asylums?—The borough of Lancaster is associated with the county asylum in the same manner as any other township which has not a separate lunatic asylum; it contributes in the same manner to the expenses of the asylum as any other township of the union, not in the borough, contributes.

4690. Is there a separate rate for the lunatic asylum, or does the borough of Lancaster pay county rate?—The borough of Lancaster pays county rate in respect of the lunatic asylum expenses for its buildings and so forth, and as regards the paupers' maintenance it pays through the union.

4691. But as regards the building, it contributes to the county rate?—Yes, just in the same manner as the others.

4692. But it does not contribute to the other portion of the county rate, which is for the other general county purposes?—With regard to most of the items it does. It does not contribute, for instance, to the police and some items of that kind; but as to most of the items it does.

4693. Does it contribute to the bridges?—No.

4694. Have you a separate quarter sessions?—Not for the borough of Lancaster; it is in the hundred of Lonsdale. There are only four boroughs in the county of Lancaster having a separate quarter sessions.

4695. An account, I presume, is made up as to what charges have to be borne in part by the borough of Lancaster, and it pays in that proportion to the county rate?—I have the accounts for the county of Lancaster for the last year, and they show the total expenditure for the various purposes, whence the money was obtained, and the rate in the pound upon each division of the county in respect of each of the different purposes set forth in the headings.

4696. Can you state generally to the Committee the various divisions that there are in the county on which the rate falls in different proportions?—There are 18 what are called police districts; and there are four boroughs, namely, Bolton, Liverpool, Manchester, and Wigan, in addition, that have separate courts of quarter sessions. There are also several boroughs which have not separate quarter sessions that do not contribute to some of the county rate items charged upon the other parts of the police district in which they are locally situated.

4697. Of those 18 police districts, is Lancaster one?—No; it is in the hundred of Lonsdale, south of the sands, and it contributes in a certain manner to the expenses of the county for various purposes, but it has a separate police of its own. They are called police districts for the purpose of classification, but it contributes to the general purposes of the county rate. For instance, lunatic asylums, lunatic asylums loan account, and the gaols, and the Preston and Kirkdale Houses of Correction, in addition to other matters.

4698. Then the borough of Lancaster contributes to all those purposes?—Yes.

4699. Can you state the purposes to which it does not contribute?—The police, the hundred and county bridges, the chairman of the Salford sessions, the Salford Gaol, and the Manchester assize courts.

4700. With regard to the chairman of the Salford sessions, do you call him a charge?—Yes; his salary forms a separate item in the accounts.

4701. Could you explain what that means?—He receives a salary which is debited to the police districts in the Salford Hundred.

4702. But Lancaster does not pay towards his salary?—No; no part of the union pays to it.

4703. It would appear, would it not, that there are a variety of areas in the county of Lancaster for rating purposes?—That is so. There are about 35 for county rate purposes, the rates in each case being dissimilar.

4704. In the first instance you have 18 districts and four boroughs; will you state in what relation the districts stand to the hundreds; do the districts overlap with the hundreds, or does a hundred contain so many districts?—I think the hundreds are generally divided into so many districts; it is so in the case of the hundred that I belong to. The hundred of Lonsdale is divided into north and south, and I should say that that is the case with all the six hundreds in the county.

Mr. J. Grant.

6 May 1870.

4705. For what purposes is the Lonsdale hundred divided into north and south?—For police purposes; I believe that is the only purpose.

4706. Then the hundred is divided into north and south for police purposes, but the borough of Lancaster does not belong to either?—Not for police purposes.

4707. Then it does not belong to it for those purposes for which the hundred has been divided into north and south?—No.

4708. In all those 18 districts does the county rate vary?—Yes, it generally does; the hundred of Lonsdale South, in which my union is situated, has a rate of something under 4*d.*, including the whole of the items of the county rate, and in some parts, for instance Kirkdale, it is about 7*d.*

4709. I understand that the 4*d.* includes every part of the county rate?—Yes, it does.

4710. Therefore, if the borough of Lancaster does not contribute towards the county police and some other items, the county rate paid by the borough of Lancaster would be less than 4*d.*?—Yes, it would on that account.

4711. Can you state what is the rate in the pound for the county rate in the borough or township of Lancaster?—There is 1½*d.* for police in Lonsdale South, and one-sixth of a penny for general police, and both in that and the other parts of the hundred the rate for the hundred bridges is three-sixteenths of a penny, and for county bridges one-thirty-second; I do not think that there are any other items charged upon our hundred that it does not contribute to.

4712. So that your county rate would be about 2*d.*?—Certainly.

4713. What representation has the borough of Lancaster in the administration of the lunatic asylum to which it contributes?—None whatever; in fact there is no representation. The lunatic asylums are managed by a committee of visitors appointed by the justices of the county.

4714. The borough would have a right, would it not, to one or two members?—No, there is a separate bench of magistrates for the borough. The county magistrates have now also jurisdiction in the borough, although they do not act, but the borough magistrates have no connection with the lunatic asylum whatever, that ever I heard of. They certainly do not act in any way; they do not attend the quarter sessions or act as visitors.

4715. You say that the county magistrates have jurisdiction in the borough, though they do not act?—I understand so.

4716. That is to say, there has been no occasion on which they have acted to your knowledge?—I think not; the same person is clerk for both; several of the county magistrates are also borough magistrates, but I do not think they have ever acted, except in their capacity as borough magistrates.

4717. The corporation have power over the police, have they not?—Yes; they appoint the watch committee, who manage the police entirely.

4718. Is the county rate paid out of the poor rate?—It is.

4719. Do I rightly understand you that yours is a township, not a union?—It is a union with 24 townships; the borough of Lancaster being one.

4720. Do you mean that the borough of Lancaster is one township?—Yes.

4721. But your union is much larger?—Yes, it comprises 24 townships.

4722. Is there any other rate paid out of the poor rate besides the county rate?—The overseers of Lancaster pay a contribution to the cemetery board of Lancaster. A call is made by the burial board annually, and the overseers pay it out of the proceeds of the poor rate.

4723. Will you state to the Committee the nature of the burial board?—A burial board was appointed under Acts that were passed a few years ago, and a cemetery was established for the township of Lancaster; the expenses of the burial board are paid partly by receipts from persons who inter and purchase graves, and the deficiency in their expenses is made up by a call upon the overseers of Lancaster, which they are required to pay, and do pay out of the poor rates

4724. Is that a public Act or a private Act?—It is a public Act under the General Burial Acts.

4725. How is that burial board constituted?—It is appointed by the ratepayers in vestry meeting; I remember being present at the first appointment of members of the burial board, but since that I think it has generally been managed altogether by themselves; when a vacancy occurs, I dare say they have nominated a member, and appointed anyone they thought right; it is done at a vestry meeting.

4726. Is it a numerous board?—I think there are about six or eight appointed from different denominations of professing Christians in the town of Lancaster.

4727. Have they the power to levy a rate?—No, they do not levy a rate; they make an order on the overseers of Lancaster for the payment to them of a certain sum.

4728. They have the power, I think you say, of making a charge upon the overseer?—Yes; the town clerk is clerk to the burial board.

4729. But not in his capacity as town clerk?—Not at all; he is an attorney, and he is appointed clerk to the board.

4730. The call is paid out of the poor rate in the township of Lancaster, but not in any other part of the union; is that so?—There is not a cemetery established in any other part of the union; but if interments take place from any other township, the fees are larger than to the residents in the township of Lancaster.

4731. So that that covers the difference between the charge for interment, and the money which is supplied by the rate?—Yes; and we think sometimes a little more than that; the vicar gets a larger fee from townships in the parish of Lancaster.

4732. Are we to understand that the area of the burial board is the same as that of the township of Lancaster?—That is so.

4733. There is no overlapping there?—No, no overlapping whatever.

4734. You have stated that the bulk of the county rate expenditure is paid out of the poor-rate; are there any other sums which are paid over by the overseer to the county authorities from the board of guardians?—There is a small sum paid by the overseers of the township of Lancaster to the vicar of Lancaster in respect of tithe commutation under a Local Tithe Commutation tion Act; it is only a very small item, and it is supposed to be in respect of the houses.

4735. Is your general district rate levied separately from the poor rate?—Yes, it has no connection with it.

4736. Practically, are the same men appointed as collectors?—No, there are separate collectors; the board of health have two collectors, one for water rents, and another for the general district rate, and the township of Lancaster has a collector also under the 59 Geo. 3.

4737. How often do you collect the poor-rate in the year?—In Lancaster the rate has generally been what would extend over nine months or so, lately, but the poor rate has very greatly decreased; I have known it 4 s. in the pound in Lancaster.

4738. You make a distinction between Lancaster and the union generally; is the poor rate not levied in the township of Lancaster in the same way as it is levied in all the other townships?—Yes, but it is not quite the same amount; there is always a little more loss in collection. Section 4 of the Act of last year, charging the owners, is adopted there in respect of tenements of 8 l. and under, and it has been adopted in some other townships of the union; in those cases the owner has a deduction of 15 per cent.

4739. As regards collection from the occupiers, has your mind ever been turned to the point of taxing the owner either with the occupier, or instead of the occupier?—Yes, I have thought on the subject.

4740. Have you considered the matter as regards the county-rate, or as regards the poor rate, or as regards the general district rate?—My attention has been especially turned to the question of the poor rate, with which I am particularly familiar.

4741. Has your attention also been drawn to the question of the county rate?—To some extent.

4742. Has there been any discussion in your union generally with reference to the administration of the county rate?—There has been a general feeling that there ought to be some representation of the ratepayers in the administration of the county funds. I remember being sent by my board to a meeting at Newton (I think it must be now somewhere above 20 years ago) on that point, and from that time to the present there has been a general disposition on the part of the thinking ratepayers, and those who attend to such matters, to have a representation in the expenditure of the county rate.

4743. Have they been dissatisfied with the expenditure of the county funds, or was it more a theoretical objection to the constitution of the county board?—Occasionally I have heard a remark of dissatisfaction, but not to any great extent: theoretically, perhaps, there have been many, but from my knowledge of the county affairs of Lancaster there has been very much more attention given to the management of the financial business generally, than I have observed in some other parts. The magistrates are most diligent and energetic, and attentive, and the presenting of their accounts in the public manner which they do, exhibits clearly to the ratepayers the real state of facts.

4744. I do not gather that you think that there is any real grievance as regards illegitimate or injudicious expenditure by the county justices?—I have heard the remark made in certain cases, that if there were a representation of the ratepayers, certain items would not have been incurred, and it would have been more satisfactory to the ratepayers generally.

4745. Could you state to the Committee what kind of items your remarks apply to?—I have heard remarks that the Lancaster Lunatic Asylum has been a very costly affair, that it has been supposed to cost more money than the ratepayers think it ought to have done; I do not say that that is my view.

4746. Do the ratepayers believe that they pay the county rate themselves?—I do not think there is very much attention given to that particular question, except by persons like myself, who do think on these matters; I have heard some persons express an opinion one way and some the other.

4747. What is your opinion as to who pays it; does the owner or the occupier really pay?—My view generally speaking is, that in the case of houses the occupier bears the rate, and in the case of land the owner sustains the burden.

4748. Will you state the ground why you make that distinction?—I have made a note on that subject to this effect: in the case of houses the tenant sustains the burden of the rate. Houses, unlike land, may be multiplied to any extent; the supply depends upon the demand, and capital will not be invested in houses to be let, except the rents received are likely to yield what is considered to be a fair rate of interest after all outgoings. The owner is supposed to receive a fair interest at present, the occupier paying the rates. If the owner had to pay the rates, or part of them, the interest upon his capital would be reduced by the sum that he paid, and the investment of capital in the building of houses to let would cease until the rents rose, so as to pay a fair interest, and thus eventually the rate would again fall upon the occupier in the shape of increased rent.

4749. That is to say, until the building had taken place?—When the building had taken place, of course the occupier would pay it again in the shape of increased rent.

4750. Would not the fact of the increase of houses, which you assume, lower the rent again through increasing the supply?—The houses would not be built until the rents rose to such an amount as to be a valuable investment for the money that was spent upon building them, and therefore upon that ground I should say that the occupier would pay the rates.

4751. Do you know anything about the ground rents, and the price of land in your union?—We have very little in the shape of ground rents, next to nothing; our property is nearly all freehold. The land in the township of Lancaster I have a good knowledge of, being clerk to the assessment committee, and of the value of property and of the rents.

4752. When you buy land for building purposes in, we will say, the poorest part of the union, what proportion does the value of the land bear to the cost of a house in the case of houses usually built for the working classes?—A great deal would depend upon the site, and whether there were attached to it a little yard and garden, and so on, but if you will give me any specific case I will endeavour to answer it.

4753. Take the case of a house for which a man would pay 10 l. a year in a part of the town where building would be likely to extend, what would would be the proportion that the builder would have to pay for the land, and for the cost of the house to carry out his speculation in building?—Possibly if a house cost 170 l. or 180 l. he would have to pay 20 l.; I speak with diffidence upon that point, because a good deal depends upon the situation and other circumstances, and perhaps I might give you a more accurate answer if I had time to make a little calculation; 20 l. or 25 l. I should say, speaking roughly.

4754. It would vary between one-eighth and one-tenth?—Yes, something like that possibly.

4755. Do not you hold that, according as the rates were high or low, the builder would give more or less for the plot of ground on which he was going to build?—Possibly he might, but the equalisation brought about by the charge being now distributed over the union would make the land in respect of rates pretty equal in value in most cases.

4756. I presume you would admit that on the borders of union, where there was a difference in the rate between two unions, the value of the plot of ground on which the builder would build would vary according to the rate?—It would be so to some extent.

4757. Do you hold this, that so far as the cost of the land enters into the cost of a house, so far and in that proportion the owner would bear the rates?—I have not very carefully considered the question, and I would not like to venture an opinion without applying my mind a little more to it.

4758. Will you state what you have to say as regards land?—As regards land, with certain exceptions, the case is different. The quantity is fixed, and cannot be increased materially; its value is the worth of the net produce, that is to say, the produce, after all outgoings, such as rates, labour, return for the cultivator's skill and capital, are deducted. The worth of the produce is not affected by the question of rates, and such outgoings; but depends upon the demand for it, and the supplies imported. If the occupier had to pay no rates he could afford to pay more rent, but as he pays rates he pays a corresponding less rent, just as a farmer, who pays a tithe rent-charge, pays less rent by the amount that he pays of rent-charge than his neighbour whose farm is free.

4759. How has your attention been drawn to the matter as regards the land; is there a portion of your union which is agricultural?—A great portion of it is. I thought of the subject in 1849, when it was a question whether to adopt the Small Tenements Rating Act or not, and I wrote a paper at that time upon the question. I have frequently turned my attention to it since, and that is the conclusion which I have arrived at.

4760. As clerk to the assessment committee, your attention has also been drawn to the valuation of farms, I presume?—Very constantly; I have visited farms, and made very diligent inquiry.

4761. Will you state to the Committee what you may know as regards the exemption of houses under 5 l. to which you have alluded?—They are exempt from all the board of health rates excepting the water rate and some other item, the sewers, I think it is; they pay 8 d. in the pound.

4762. Of course they are not exempt from poor rate?—No, not from the poor rate, they are under section 4 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 in Lancaster.

4763. Do the owners pay the rates in Lancaster?—Yes, the poor rates.

4764. Is there any compounding of the general district rate?—Yes, they get one-fifth deducted in consequence of compounding up to 7 l. rateable value, and in the same way one-fourth with regard to the water rent.

4765. Have you turned your attention to the advisability of collecting all the rates together?—Yes; I quite think that that is not only practicable, but very desirable.

4766. If that were done, it would be necessary, would it not, to bring the compounding arrangements, as regards the general district rate, in conformity with the arrangements which affect the poor rate?—It would be so. In fact I remember that the clerk to the local board of health, after we adopted in Lancaster the Act of last session, charging owners up to 8 l., remarked to me that they had the power to go up to the same amount, and instead of 7 l., he thought it would be desirable that they should adopt 8 l., as we did.

4767. At present the owners of some houses are assessed under two different systems, are they not, for the general district rate and for the poor rate?—It is so.

4768. The general district rate differs, does it not, from the poor rate in its incidence as regards market gardens, and various other descriptions of property?—Yes; the lands in general in the township of Lancaster are charged to the general district rate upon one-fourth of their value upon the 1 s. 8 d. rate, whilst other property is charged upon the 2 s., the full value, and the poor rate is charged upon the full value.

4769. Is there much property in Lancaster of that nature?—Yes, I should think, perhaps, a rateable value of 5,000 l. or 7,000 l.

4770. What basis of assessment have they for the general district rate?—They adopt the value that the assessment committee determines.

4771. They adopt the value of the assessment committee of the board of guardians?—Yes.

4772. Then in practice the township of Lancaster adopts, as its valuation for its purely local purposes, a valuation which is made by a committee elected by the guardians of the whole union?—Yes, that is so; and the county rate has been charged upon much the same value. One of the magistrates, who was on the county rate committee, told me that our valuation did not differ 1 per cent. from their last.

4773. But it is not the same valuation?—No; it is made upon a different system.

4774. But the local board of health have adopted your valuation for their own purposes?—Yes; and I may add that the surveyor of taxes has, in some measure, been influenced also by our valuation; we have mutually assisted each other.

4775. Do you supply a copy of your rate book to them?—We allow them to examine our books, and they allow us to examine theirs.

4776. But the local board of health take no measures to make an assessment of their own; they copy your assessment entirely?—Entirely.

4777. And they deduct three-fourths from certain properties?—From land and market gardens, and railways.

4778. Do they employ a certain staff, in order to ascertain what properties are exempt?—Yes; they have their clerk and collector.

4779. Are railways assessed at one-fourth only?—Yes, upon the same principle as market gardens.

4780. As

4780. As regards the board of guardians, have you ex officios in frequent attendance?—Yes, a few; perhaps one-fourth of the whole number give considerable attention to the affairs of the union. We have always had an ex officio as chairman; our present chairman has, since the formation of the union, been chairman all the time, except six years.

4781. Are there a certain number of ex officios who attend as regularly as the elected guardians?—A few.

4782. Has your attention been drawn to the question of dividing the poor rate between the owner and the occupier?—Yes, it has; I have thought of it for some time since it has been spoken of.

4783. What is your opinion?—I think it is unnecessary and unadvisable.

4784. Will you state your grounds why it is unadvisable?—I consider that no case can be made out for disturbing the existing arrangements. If the rates have been increased, it is generally the result of improper administration and disregard of the law and the regulations of the Poor Law Board. The great objection, however, is, in my opinion, that the interest in the administration would be lessened and the expenses increased, to the prejudice, as I believe, of all classes. The alteration would only operate for a time, and I consider that eventually the burden of the rates would remain as at present, as I have previously described in the case of land generally, with few exceptions, upon the owner, and in the case of houses upon the occupier.

4785. Does your view depend upon the assumption that, though you were to place a portion of the rate upon the owners, the administration would remain the same as it is now?—No; I think in any case it would be desirable to give the owner the same standing with regard to the election of guardians and the power to sit as guardian as the occupier has at present; that is to say, he might nominate or be nominated as guardian, and he might vote in the election of guardians, without making the claim that he is now required to do to vote as owner, just as the occupier does at present, in fact standing in the same position.

4786. Have you found that, under the present law, the owner does not now stand in as favourable a position in the election of guardians as the occupier?—He does not. In the first place, without making a claim to vote as an owner, he cannot vote or nominate to the office of guardian. That claim is required to be prepared with some care; in fact, I have known an attorney, and a very sagacious one, make a claim which has not been good; and it is to be made by the 31st January, to be available at the next election of guardians in March. The consequence is, that very few persons make it. If they make it, it will of course enable them to nominate as an owner and to vote as an owner, just on the same scale as a ratepayer, but in no case could a person sit as a guardian, in consequence of being an owner. I think an owner ought to be enabled without a claim, to vote and to nominate, and to sit as a guardian.

4787. The occupiers are registered by a self-acting process, but the owners must take the initiative themselves?—Yes; occupiers are rated by the overseers, and the consequence is, that they can vote, but very few owners indeed have claimed or taken the trouble to claim.

4788. Could you give any figures to the Committee, as to the number of owners who have votes?—I do not think that at present, in the whole of the union, consisting of upwards of 8,000 assessments, there have been, or rather are in existence, 50 claims.

4789. So that the owners, in your opinion, are totally without representation?—Yes, they are.

4790. Of course it is partly by their own fault, but it is a matter of fact that they do not take any trouble?—Many of them do not know about it; there is no requirement on the part of any officer to give them notice. If they ask, of course we give them the information, but generally they do not know.

4791. Could you state how the plurality of votes acts as regards the owners?—It is on the same scale as the occupier. If the rateable value of the tenement or the property that he claims to vote for be under 50 l., he has one vote; if above 50 l. and under 100 l, two votes; if above 100 l., three votes; if above 150 l., four votes; if above 200 l., five votes; and above 250 l., six votes; there it ends; that is, the same scale by the 7 & 8 Vict. as the occupier.

4792. Are there many owners in your union; is house property held in large quantities, or are there a great many small owners?—Speaking of Lancaster and some of the other townships, Morcambe, for instance, the owners are numerous, but in some of the purely agricultural townships they are comparatively few. The admission of owners would elevate and improve both the constituency and the representative board. The constituency has in many cases been much depressed by the operation of the Act of last Session, which gives a vote to the occupiers of cottages rated under it to the owners. Cottagers could not vote under the former Act. In Lancaster there are about 2,100 such cottages, being 55 per cent. of the total number of tenements, but they constitute only 22 per cent. of the rateable value. The owners of them number about 500.

4793. Do you find any more inclination amongst the small owners in the towns to register themselves than you do in the country?—I do not think many of them know of it. Occasionally where there has been some particular question or a little feeling exhibited with regard to the election of guardians, there have been a few claims, but generally it is not noticed; our board act very harmoniously, and we have not often a contest.

4794. But if they chose, with their six votes for property amounting to 250 l., the owners, no doubt, would exercise very considerable influence if they were to act together?—It would be so, undoubtedly 4795. Do you consider, and is it generally considered, as far you are aware, that the ex officio guardians fairly represent the owners?—I scarcely think that that is the case, they are never supposed to represent the owners in our union. I never heard the remark made.

4796. The ex officio members, at all events, would not represent the small cottage owners?—No, they would not represent them.

4797. But they might be held, I presume, to represent, to a certain extent, the landed proprietors of the county?—They would generally be persons in that position in life, and they would rather look upon questions with an owner's view than an occupier's.

4798. Would you think it desirable to strengthen the position of the owners in the bodies administering local rates?—I should to the extent I have suggested.

4799. Independent of the question of putting a certain amount of rate upon the owner?—Yes, I think so, seeing that as regards the rate upon the land it is a charge upon the owner, I should look upon it that it is on that and other grounds advisable.

4800. Would you make any distinction between expenditure for permanent purposes, and expenditure for current expenses?—Certainly I should. My view has always been that certain items of expenditure ought to be a charge upon the owner absolutely and entirely.

4801. Will you state those items?—Public buildings, such as asylums, and, perhaps, with less force I might remark workhouses, and also sewerage, waterworks, and general works of improvement of that kind that are supposed to extend advantages over a large number of years.

4802. Those you would be prepared to put upon the owners; have you ever thought of the machinery for separating that portion of the expenditure from the other?—It occurs to me that it might be done in the same way as the cattle plague rate was done a little while ago. There was then a power to charge, and, in fact, the owner was required to pay a certain amount; on the rate receipt cheque book it was stated what that amount was, and it was collected from the tenant, but could be recovered by the tenant, or stopped in payment of his rent from the owner; but I should like to remark that, in the event of the owner being charged, I should think it is very advisable indeed to extend the period of repayment for those works over a much longer period than at present.

4803. The present period being 30 years?—Yes, 30 years for workhouses; it used to be 20.

4804. To go back to the point of the poor rate, you object to rating the owner for a portion of the poor rate, as I understand, with the exception possibly of that part of the poor rate which goes to build workhouses or permanent structures of some kind or other?—Yes, I object chiefly on the ground of administration. I think there is no need to take money from one man to give it to another; but that is not a question of poor law, but it seems to me that by extending the area of the charge on the persons who pay the rate, you would very much lessen the care and attention given to the administration, and you would increase the rate, in fact, which would be an evil. The administration of the poor laws is a most difficult and important matter.

4805. You mean, by the area of charge extending from the occupier to the owner?—I had rather in my mind the area of chargeability, that is, extending to a county or national rate, or the rating of personal property, or anything of that kind, but the influence would be much in the same way. If you brought in the owner, supposing the rate were divided, it would be to begin with only half the amount, but eventually the expenditure would exceed far beyond what it is now.

4806. Are we to understand you to mean that the pressure of the poor rate is a useful screw for keeping down expense?—It makes people take more care, and that is one of the grounds upon which the expenditure is watched; there is so much liability to get wrong in the administration of the poor laws, especially if you are not spending your own money.

4807. At present, in the country at least, according to your own views, the occupiers are spending the owner's money?—That is not felt, for this reason, that the occupier has to pay the rate, and any immediate change would fall upon him. He may be the occupier of a farm upon which he has a lease.

4808. Of course, so long as the existing arrangements exist, no doubt any increase or diminution in the rate goes solely to the occupier?—Of course, that would be so.

4809. Would the same effect not be produced upon the owner if he were rated, that he would then pay more attention to the administration himself?—I think not; I think the rate being so slight the pressure would not be so much felt; there is constantly a disposition to let things take their course, and there is a great deal of pressure from without.

4810. You mean that the owners being a rich class, would not feel the pressure of the rates so much, and that therefore they would not be so careful in administering them?—That is so, of course, to some extent; that would also be the case with the occupier. If a man were to pay 9 d. in the pound instead of 1 s. 6 d., he would feel the pressure less, and be a little more disposed to be careless and lavish.

4811. Did I understand you to say that the poor rate fell from 4 s. to 1 s. 6 d.?—I said that I had known it 4 s. in one or two townships in the union; not regularly, but occasionally; in Lancaster for instance.

4812. Is great attention paid by the ratepayers themselves, at present, to the administration of the poor law; I ask you that in reference to what you say that the pressure of the rates has made them exceedingly careful?—They seem to be pretty well satisfied with what is going on; we give them information from time to time. I may say that the ratepayers of our union geneally seem pretty well satisfied with things as they are carried on; of course some people grumble whatever the rates may be.

4813. Do you see any other objection to the owner paying a share of the poor rate than this, that you fear that the watchfulness of the ratepayers and the guardians, who are their representatives, would be relaxed; that is your chief fear, as I understand?—Yes; I look upon the question of administration as a most important one; the rates in our case do not press so heavily as to be really very burdensome, and they are not so high as they have been; I think, as regards the working classes especially, it is a matter of the greatest importance that the administration should be very careful and judicious.

4814. Do you think that the pressure of rates is really less now than it was, or that the rate in the pound has been diminished, because the aggregate amount of the value of property has increased?—There is a reduction in our own union of something like 30 per cent., in the expenditure, and an increase of something like 40 per cent. in the rateable value of property; this increase has certainly been occasioned in part by railway property, which constitutes about 12 per cent. of our value.

4815. So that you have the advantage in both ways: there has been a very material decrease in your expenditure?—Yes.

4816. Which of course is perfectly irrespective of the rise in the value of property?—Yes; I have ave given those figures down from memory, but have no doubt they are substantially correct.

4817. Within what periods?—From 1843; I ompared it with the first three years of the union, hich was formed in December 1839.

4818. Are you speaking now of the expendiure of the union?—Yes; of the union, including ll the items.

4819. You are speaking of poor relief, not of ther rates?—No; I am speaking of all together; have a classification of all the expenditure as istributed amongst poor relief, and for other urposes. It is in a report which I prepared for he guardians a few years ago, but it is substanially correct now; I have given a number f items, but I have divided the expenditure also nto three general heads. In the first period, that s, in the three years ending March 1843, the roportion connected with relief immediately, as 71·15 per cent. of the total expenditure, and n the second period in 1862 it was 67·11; then here is collection of rates and other purposes, artly connected and partly unconnected with elief, and in the first period these amounted to 3·43 er cent., and in the second period 3·91; for purposes totally unconnected with relief, in the first eriod the amount was 25·42, and in the second eriod 28·98.

4820. Do I rightly gather this to be the purort of your evidence upon this point, that your xpenditure has decreased, and that you attribute he decrease partly to the exertions and vigiance of the ratepayers, and that you are afraid hat by relieving them by their share of the urdens, you might go in a contrary direction?—I attribute it in a great measure to the imroved condition of the law, the existence and he regulations of the Poor Law Board, and to he care and judicious administration of the uardians. We had, on the 1st January 1843, pwards of 2,200 paupers, and at this moment, lthough we have added four townships to the nion, we have only about 860 or 870.

4821. There is one class of rates on which you ave said nothing, that is to say, the highway ate; do you know what is the state of things ith regard to that rate?—I have no official conection with the highway rate, but my intercourse ith people generally gives me a knowledge of t.

4822. Is there a highway rate levied in the nion to which you belong?—In all the townships here is a highway rate except Lancaster, and he township of Poulton Bare and Torrisholme, hich are local boards of health.

4823. Then the highway rate must be added o those other rates which you enumerated in the eginning of your evidence?—Yes.

4824. Is the highway rate high?—I should hink it rarely exceeds 6*d.* in the pound. It is ot a highway board; each township manages its wn highways. They have not adopted the new ct.

4825. When you have spoken of the township f Lancaster, you mean one of the component parts f the union, do you not?—Yes, a place which, beore relief became a union charge, separately aintained its own poor, and now levies its own ates.

4826. Could you state to the Committee the ifference between a township and a parish in ancashire?—There are some parishes in Lanashire precisely the same as you speak of them n the south, where a district maintaining its own highways is co-extensive with the ecclesiastical district; but generally what we call a parish is an ecclesiastical district which has within it several such places, that is to say, places that separately maintained their own poor, levy their own poor rate, keep their own highways in order, and attend to other matters of that kind.

4827. The representatives of the boards of guardians are representatives from the townships, and not from any of the parishes, are they not?—Yes, but I must make a little reservation then, for we have two of those parishes in our union. It is a little confusing, but practically speaking it is so.

4828. You stated to the Committee that there were 24 townships in your union, but you mean, strictly speaking, 22 townships and two parishes?—Yes, but I do not know the difference between parish and township in that respect, except that in the case of the two parishes, the ecclesiastical district does not extend beyond the area of charge of the poor rate, which is not usually the case in Lancashire.

4829. There is a township of Lancaster, is there not?—Yes.

4830. But the parish of Lancaster is not entirely contained in the union of Lancaster?—No.

4831. A portion of the parish lies in the union of Lancaster, and a portion in the union of Preston?—Yes, and some in the union of Garstang.

4832. Therefore, for all administrative purposes it would be best to leave out of view the existence of parishes in your union, and to treat the township practically as equivalent to a parish for poor law purposes?—Yes.

4833. Mr. Pell.] You, no doubt, have taken notice of the register for election purposes?—Yes.

4834. I think, in the heading of every parish you will see "In the parish or township of so and so"?—Yes, there is some heading of that kind.

4835. Can you give any instance to us where a parish and a township are not coterminous?—Yes; Lancaster is not. In every case the overseers make out a list of voters, and return it to the clerk of the peace, whether it be what is called a parish or a township, that is to say, every place where the poor rate is levied separately from any other place.

4836. Do you know what the legal definition of a township is?—I understand that it is a place separately maintaining its own poor, and for which overseers are appointed, and defined to be such under an Act of Charles II.

4837. Is it not a place that appoints its own constables?—It is a place that nominates its own overseers.

4838. Apply it in your own district, and tell me whether that is true; that is the definition which is given in the Law Book, I believe?—They did, under the 5 & 6 Vict., appoint the constables in all the townships in our union except Lancaster. The places that I speak of as townships appointed those constables, or rather nominated them, under the Parish Constables Act; but very lately they have ceased to do so.

4839. But they have still the right, have they not?—Yes, but the magistrates have considered it not necessary.

4840. Then it would be a fair definition, that a township is a place that appoints its own constables?—Yes, it would be proper to say a place of that kind.

Mr. J. Grant.

6 May 1870.

4841. A parish may consist, may it not, of several townships ?—Yes.

4842. But a township never consists of several parishes ?—No.

4843. Chairman.] To what extent of country does your answer apply ?—I am speaking of my own union; I would rather not go beyond that.

4844. Mr. Walter.] I think you read from some memorandum an opinion that in case the rates were entirely done away with, the tenant would be able to afford to pay a higher rent to his landlord for the house he occupied; is that your opinion ?—I did not intend to say so; I have not quoted any opinion but my own; I made a note this morning.

4845. Did that apply to land or to houses; were you expressing an opinion with reference to towns or the country ?—I was speaking of both houses and land, the rate upon houses being really a charge upon the occupier, and in the case of land upon the owner.

4846. Did you not express your opinion with regard to houses, that if the rates were taken off houses, the tenant would be able to pay his landlord higher rent ?—I was speaking of land when I said that if the occupier paid no rates, he would pay more rent; and that the rates were only in the shape of so much rent, because the value of his farm depended upon the value of the produce.

4847. Then that is not your opinion as regards houses ?—No, quite the contrary; I think the burden of the rate is upon the occupier of a house, but not upon the occupier of land.

4848. I think you draw this distinction between land and houses: that in the one case it is the competition for houses that tends to throw the burden of the rates upon the occupier, and on the other hand it is the limited quantity of land in the market that throws the burden upon the owner ?—Houses would not be built for an investment, that is to say, to let, except they paid a proper rate of interest; and if the owner had to pay the rates the rent must rise, which would really be an additional charge upon the occupier; but in the case of land, its value to the tenant depends upon the value of the produce after all his outgoings, rates included, are deducted.

4849. Why do you think that if the owner had a greater command of the market which he must do if the quantity of land is limited, the burden of the rates should be borne by him ?—I do not express any opinion; I say what I think is the actual state of things. I think that the burden of the rate is upon the owner of the land, and that if there were no rates the landlord in fact would have a greater value in his land; he would have more rent for it.

4850. But you stated, did you not, that the reason why the rates in the case of land were borne by the owner and not by the occupier, was, that there was so much greater competition for land and a more limited supply ?—I do not know that I spoke of competition; competition would bring the price of land to what it was really worth; taking into consideration what the value of its produce was, and whether there were more or less rates upon it, would be a question that would not eventually affect the occupier but the owner, as it seems to me.

4851. Admitting that in the case of landed property, the rates ultimately fall upon the owner, why is it that you think they do not fall upon the owner in the case of house property ?—Because houses will only be built to let in the event of their paying a proper rate of interest, and if the owner had to pay the rates he must of necessity have a larger rent, or the building of houses to let would cease until the rents rose to such an extent as to pay him not only for the investment of his capital, but for his outgoings also, rates included.

4852. In Lancaster, are there any tithes on house property ?—The sum of 42 l. 10 s. a year is paid by the overseers out of the rate to the vicar of Lancaster.

4853. Do they form a separate charge upon each house ?—They are paid out of the general rate.

4854. Do you consider that there is any distinction with regard to the incidence of tithes upon property, and the incidence of any other rates; should you not hold that the tithes were paid by the owner ?—Yes, certainly, that is one of my arguments, that the tithes are paid by the owner, and the owner has also to pay the rates just in the same way as regards land.

4855. But supposing there are tithes upon house property, do you consider that the occupier pays the tithes in that case, or the owner ?—The amount is so small, being only 42 l. 10 s. over all the township, that it really amounts to nothing, and I have not applied my mind at all to that point.

4856. Mr. Corrance.] Your attention has been principally directed to poor rates, has it not ?—Chiefly; but of course other rates have incidentally come under my notice, having been long connected with the administration of public affairs.

4857. But you have had more particularly to do with the poor rate than any other series of rates ?—Yes, certainly.

4858. And you object to their division between the owner and the occupier ?—Yes.

4859. Principally upon the ground of administration ?—That is the principal reason.

4860. You think, I suppose, that even if the division took place, the occupier, at all events would be the chief administrator ?—Practically he would take more interest in the matter; the owners generally being of a higher class of persons, especially in the country, would not give so much attention to that particular rate.

4861. But it is of more importance, is it not to the occupier, because he is the employer of labour ?—Yes, and he is a person of smaller means generally.

4862. You have spoken of a rise in the rateable value of the property in your township; to what causes do you attribute that ?—To various causes. There has been a rise in the value of most kinds of property. Building is much more expensive than it was; the workmen have higher wages and perform less work in their shorter hours; and whatever you have to purchase in the way of property is higher. Land in the neighbourhood of towns is becoming of greater value, and agricultural produce or some of it has increased in value; and land generally has got up in price.

4863. Has there not been another cause, namely, a more just administration of the law of assessment within later times ?—That applies to some little extent; when you asked me the question, I ha my mind upon Lancaster. That is the largest township; and I think that the principle of assessment was generally adopted there as defined by the Parochial Assessment Act, as it is now. There was a great irregularity in the charge as between one occupier and another.

another; but I think that the principle of valuation was the same as it is now.

4864. Has it not raised the whole scale appreciably; have not you added 10 to 15 per cent., taking the general result?—No; we endeavour strictly to carry out the law as defined by the Parochial Assessment Act and the Union Assessment Committee Acts.

4865. Have you not found that the previous assessments were still very low?—No, not in our union. I do not mean to say that there were not cases where that was so; but generally speaking, especially in Lancaster, it was not the case.

4866. Do you know that the law was passed to meet cases of that sort where there was intentional misrepresentation (I will not call it fraud) as to basis of rateable value?—That was so; before the passing of the Parochial Assessment Act it was the case, I am aware, to a great extent.

4867. Were you aware, as a general fact, that throughout the country generally, there has been a considerable rise of from 10 to 15 per cent. upon the apparent rateable value from that cause?—I am not aware of it; I am not surprised to hear that that is so, but I do not remember at this moment.

4868. In answer to a question of the Right Honourable Chairman, you seemed to lay some stress upon the fact that the rateable value has risen almost equally, and perhaps even in a greater ratio, than pauperism itself; are you satisfied that it should be so, that there should be a concurrent rise of wealth on the one hand, and of destitution on the other?—Pauperism has not risen in our case; it has decreased very largely. Speaking in round numbers, it has decreased 30 per cent. within my recollection. It has decreased in expenditure and especially in numbers. We relieve more liberally than formerly, that is to say, in really necessitous cases; but we watch them more diligently and act upon sounder principles than those in operation before the Union was formed. The decrease will be apparent by a table which I have prepared. (The Witness delivered in the Table, vide Appendix.)

4869. I wish to ask you a question or two respecting the incidence of those rates on owners and occupiers, relatively as owners and occupiers of land and houses; you spoke of land and houses as differing in that respect, and you drew a certain distinction between them?—Yes.

4871. You have also spoken of houses as things that can be multiplied, and of land as a stationary thing?—Yes, to a certain extent.

4872. For which would there be the greater competition; a thing that you could multiply at will, or a thing that is fixed and stationary?—Of course the thing that is fixed and stationary.

4873. You would infer, would you not, that there would be greater competition for the thing fixed and stationary, namely, land, than for the other?—Yes.

4874. Then that leads to this conclusion, that the thing which is fixed or stationary would have greater power of recouping itself by increased rent, namely, putting the rate upon rent which the landlord would exact from the occupier?—As a farmer generally must make his living out of his land in any case, he could not pay a higher rent, generally speaking, than the produce of his land was worth; and if he were charged more rates, of course he would have to pay less rent; but if he were charged no rates he could pay more.

4875. If you had two owners before you of different properties, and there was greater competition for one than the other, it would be more in the power of the owner of the property for which there was the greater competition to exact the rate from the occupier than it would be in the other case?—Yes; there are exceptions, of course, to the general rule that I have stated, many.

4876. The question is what is the general rule, perhaps yours is the exception?—That may be so, but I believe it is not.

4877. You have spoken of a house owner ceasing at once to add to the number of houses if he found the rates increased upon him; he would do so no doubt?—That is to say, persons who invest money in house property do so with the object of obtaining a proper rate of interest, and if their income were reduced by the payment of rates without any rise in the rent, of course that state of things would not continue.

4878. Such a person would not bring his capital under taxation?—He would not invest his capital in what did not make him a proper return.

4879. Do not you think it would operate equally upon the farmer, because the increased value of land, which makes the rateable value, is of course increased by the application of capital?—I should think he would expect a proper return for his capital.

4880. Do not you think that the same reasoning which you apply to houses would apply to the farmer?—No, I do not think so, because the farmer would, of necessity, have to get his living out of the occupancy of his land.

4881. Do not you think it would discourage a farmer applying his capital if he found that there was a heavy rate upon it?—I think the thing would right itself generally. If you change the incidence of the rate, it would fall in a number of years hence just as it does now. The rate upon profitable improvements would not be likely to deter him from making such.

4882. At any rate, you have given us some instances which will prove that to any general rule there are a great many disturbing influences?—Of course; that would be so necessarily.

4883. How do you assess the different uses and purposes; take three houses of a different class, used for different purposes, and those purposes constituting annual profit, how would you assess those three different classes of house?—We should take the gross estimated rental at what it would be expected to let for in each case, whatsoever it might be. For instance, in the case of a house that has a license to sell spirituous liquors, it would necessarily be higher, and in the case of a shop that might not stand upon a larger extent of ground, it would be generally higher than a house next to it that is merely a dwelling.

4884. Do you apply the same principle to accommodation land round a town?—Generally.

4885. But not altogether?—We do not absolutely adopt the rent as the origin for the gross estimated rental, but we take all the circumstances of each case into account, looking upon the rent as primâ facie evidence of the letable value, although sometimes we find that there is ignorance on the part of the owner or the occupier, and occasionally collusion, sometimes relationship, and causes of that kind, influence the rent.

Mr. J. Grant.

6 May 1870.

4886. You have no absolutely fixed standard for accommodation land?—No, we do not go so much per acre; it is a question open to very great difficulty, but I think we arrive at a better value than ever was arrived at before.

4887. Mr. Smith.] Do not you think compounding a bounty upon the provision of small houses in regard to which compounding is allowed?—By that means the overseers obtain the rate with less trouble in collection, and they never lose, or very rarely lose, any by a tenant going away, and they have to take no proceedings for the recovery of the rate, and perhaps it is a fair arrangement. The question has been raised in several of our townships, at vestry meetings which I have attended. In Lancaster and some other townships, it was looked upon that the income derived from the rate, together with the consideration of less trouble in collection, would be fully equivalent to the deduction of 15 per cent., but in other cases it was thought they would get more money under the old system, and they refused to adopt the Act.

4888. Fifteen per cent., therefore, is the full extent of the benefit derived by compounding, in the case of those houses below 5 l. in value?—Yes, and even to 8 l.; a further deduction is allowed in the event of the owner being willing to pay whether his property be occupied or not; but that is a matter of agreement between the overseer and the owner.

4889. You stated, did you not, that houses under 5 l. are only rated to the extent of 8 d. in the pound, upon a rate which usually amounted to 2 s.?—That is so; we were formerly speaking of the poor rate; that is with regard to the board of health rate; and that is under the operation of the Local Act of George IV. In the borough of Lancaster the exemptions were continued by the Public Health Act. It was so decided by a case that was brought to the Court of Queen's Bench from Lancaster, and that exemption has been urged as an objection, as a sanitary question, that it induces persons to live in houses of that class, in order to evade the payment of the full rate. Houses under 5 l. pay 8 d. in the pound for sewerage and waterworks rate only.

4890. In your opinion, the effect of this exemption is rather unfavourable to the condition of people who live in those houses than favourable to it?—I have given much and long attention to sanitary matters and I think that it induces persons to go to a class of cottages that on sanitary grounds it it is undesirable should be occupied. The same remark was made to me the clerk to the board of health the other day.

4891. At first sight, it would appear that the exemption from rating would tend to increase the number of houses of the class which may be considered to be necessary for the lodging of the poor?—But in a town like Lancaster, I do not think it is advisable to increase the number of houses of that class; they cannot be occupied at that rent to be suitable dwellings for a family.

4892. Do the owners who are once registered remain on the register, or must they claim year by year?—They remain on if the qualification continues; there are some provisions in the Act, relating to the revision by the clerk of the union, but objection must be made; and they really do not attend to it, so that practically they remain on if the qualification continue good.

4893. Do you find any inconvenience from the union of agricultural districts with town districts in the administration of the poor law?—No.

4894. Have you an agricultural district in connection with the union of Lancaster and the town of Lancaster?—Yes, we have the borough of Lancaster, and there are two or three manufacturing villages, and the rising watering place Morecambe, on Morecambe Bay; the rest are agricultural.

4895. The area of the union is extensive, I presume?—Yes, I should think it would be something like 60,000 acres, speaking from memory.

4896. Is there any one central office to which all applicants for relief come?—There are three relieving officers, one living in Lancaster, and two in other parts of the union, and they visit the townships weekly, and the relieving officers attend the meetings of the board every week at Lancaster.

4897. But is it not the case that persons applying for relief can only obtain it by order of the board sitting at Lancaster?—Yes; but the relieving officers have discretionary power to administer relief in kind between the meetings of the board, and to have it confirmed by the guardians at their meeting in the event of emergency. The overseers also can administer relief, but practically that is not much needed, because the relieving officers are in constant communication with the townships.

4898. Applicants for relief, of course, attend the board?—They are at liberty to do so; they please themselves in that respect; some do and some do not; the case is represented by the relieving officer, and the guardians and the clerk generally know something of it.

4899. It is dealt with, is it, without the necessity of personal attendance?—It is a matter of option on the part of the applicant.

4900. Mr. Birley.] When you tell us that you consider that the rates in the case of house property fall upon the occupier, and the rates in the case of landed property fall upon the owner, are we to understand this, that in the case of house property the rent is determined by the profits that the builder gets, and in landed property it is determined by the profit that the occupier makes?—Generally speaking, that is so, if I understand your question.

4901. The Committee do not quite understand why in one case it should fall upon real property and in the other case it should not fall upon real property; and particularly as it would appear at first sight that, if anything, it should be just the reverse, because land is limited in quantity, whilst houses could be multiplied; but it appears from your answer that you considered that the value of the rent of a house was determined by the minimum profit that would satisfy the builder, and that the rent upon land was determined by the minimum profit that would satisfy the farmer, and that it was the builder, in the one case, that had to make a calculation of what he could afford; and in the other case it was the tenant that had to make a calculation of what he could afford?—That is substantially the case.

4902. The rent, therefore, would be determined, in the one case, by the builder's profit, and in the other case by the tenant farmer's profit?—Yes.

Yes, that would be substantially so in most cases.

4903. You spoke, did you not, of the management of the county rate in Lancaster as not being satisfactory?—No; I spoke of the county rate administration in Lancaster generally being very satisfactory, but I said that there have been complaints made in some cases, as naturally there would.

4904. Do you think that that dissatisfaction would be removed if the administration were altered by a system of representation?—I think it is possible that there might be sent to a county board persons of more practical information on certain matters of expenditure, and that their assistance to the county magistrates might be serviceable; at all events, that would be what would satisfy the ratepayers, and keep up a more frequent and close communication between them and the expenditure of their rates.

4905. You told us that in Lancaster no borough rate is now levied, but that it was levied some 20 years ago?—I think, perhaps, it may be less than that, but I cannot speak with certainty.

4906. Is it in consequence of the discontinuance of the borough rate that they introduced the general district rate?—I am not quite sure about it; their income is sufficient to meet the expenditure that falls upon them.

4907. Is it a generally increasing income?—I am not aware that it is.

4908. What is their expenditure in addition to the police?—They have the watching, which would be the police of course; I cannot speak with certainty of how the division is made now.

4909. Have they anything, to do with the markets?—They have; but the tolls more than meet the expenses.

4910. I suppose there are certain expenses connected with the corporation itself, such as the town clerk, and so on?—Yes, there are certain expenses of that kind.

4911. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] Would the ratepayers get any benefit by a stricter system of audit, do you think?—I am not prepared to speak of any particular item; but it has always struck me that the poor law union accounts are under a much stricter audit, and in fact we are much more careful to keep within the bounds of the law, and to have everything done in accordance with the regulations, than they need be in accounts that are not audited by a public officer.

4912. With regard to the ground landlord, supposing there was an Act of Parliament passed levying certain rates, half on the owner and half on the occupier, outside your borough of Lancaster it would be simple enough, would it not; the farmer would pay half and the landlord would pay half?—I do not know that there would be any practical difficulty.

4913. Inside Lancaster supposing you bought an acre of land, at what we call a perpetual ground rent (we will say of 30 l. a year for argument sake), and you built houses upon it, and the owner had to pay half and the occupier had to pay half, you of course would let your houses to people, and in that case who should you consider to be the owner?—The ground landlord would not be influenced, as I suppose it would be the owner of the house; the ground rent having been defined in the agreement between them would continue at that amount I should say. Of course that is a matter which Parliament might determine.

4914. Do you think that there would be any great difficulty in determining it?—If an Act of Parliament determined that the owners of ground rent were to pay a certain proportion, I do not know that there would be any difficulty.

4915. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Speaking of the system of audit in the Town Council of Lancaster, do you consider that the audit to which the accounts of the Town Council are subjected, is anything more than the simple passing of the vouchers; do they in any way act as certifyers, or is it merely taking a voucher and seeing that it is correct, and so passing it on into the accounts?—I think in most cases it is practically that; I do not remember anything else; my idea of an audit, is that it ought to be much more strict.

4916. In your opinion, what else could the auditor be expected to do; how would you alter your arrangements?—In the first place he would see that the charge is a legal one, that there is some statutory authority for the payment, and in the next place that it has been incurred on proper authority, and that the accounts are kept in proper form.

4917. So far therefore as what the auditors do now is concerned, it might just as well be done by a clerk in the office of the town clerk?—Perhaps the fact that two persons unconnected with the corporation are appointed, would be a little more security that the vouchers were produced than if it were left entirely to a clerk in the town clerk's office.

4918. So far as security is concerned that may be, but so far as actual work performed is concerned, apart from any security, if the auditors merely take the vouchers and see that they are correct, might not it be done by a check clerk even?—It might be done.

4920. Colonel Brise.] I think you said that the ratepayers in your union express some dissatisfaction at the administration of the county rate: what rate in the pound is the county rate in your county at the present time?—I do not know that there has been any dissatisfaction exactly expressed; there have been remarks made that there ought to be a representation; and in some few instances it has perhaps been said that this and that item was excessive, and that the county rates were increasing, and so forth. The county rate is $3\frac{27}{32}$ d., or nearly fourpence.

4921. Do you think that the ratepayers generally are aware how very small that expenditure is?—There is sent to each township, at the end of the half year, under the orders of the Poor Law Board, a statement of the receipts and expenditure of the union, and in that statement the amount paid as county rate is given, and those who choose to make themselves acquainted with it, of course could do so.

4922. I think I understood you to say that you would not recommend that the rate should be divided between the owner and the occupier, but that there are some rates which you would put upon the owner; is the county rate one of those rates which you would put upon the owner?—For certain items; but certain items I would take off the rates altogether, such as registration, vaccination, and police; those, I think, are for the general good of the community; they are recent charges, and have been greatly increased recently; they are not so liable to become excessive, and I do not see why the rates should bear them at all; but matters such as buildings and general works that are to last a long period, and are for the good of the neighbourhood generally, I think might be charged upon the owner.

6 May 1870.

4923. If you put the county rate upon the owner, at any rate you would get rid of that dissatisfaction, as to the administration?—Yes, of course the occupier would have no cause of complaint; but I think that there are certain items, such as the administration of justice, police, and the protection of property, and especially vaccination and registration, and some of those things that have been put recently upon the poor rate that ought not to be there, or upon the owner either.

4924. You also spoke of some other expenses that are paid out of the poor rate, which you would place upon the owner, such as the expenditure on buildings; how would you propose to separate that expenditure from the poor rate expenditure?—On the periodical arrangement of the accounts, the proportion of the rate in respect of these works might be ascertained and stated on the occuper's rate receipt, as was the case with the cattle plague rate, and he could repay himself out of the owner's rent. An Act of last Session enabled an occupier, whose term does not exceed three months, to deduct his rate from the rent.

4925. You stated, did you not, that the assessment of the union and the county assessment, were always the same in Lancaster?—Yes, they agree remarkably.

4926. On what principle did you make the union assessment; did you take the income tax as the basis of assessment, or did you get information as to the annual value, or what was your basis?—The process is this: The assessment committee require the overseers of a township to send in a valuation list, when they deem that one is necessary, stating a time; the overseers prepare this list and deposit it, and a time is appointed by the assessment committee for the revision of the list. Before that meeting, the clerk looks at the entries and compares them with the property tax assessment, and obtains other information, and any case that is deemed to need it, is investigated by the assessment committee; the overseers are required to be present, and the assessment committee make such alterations in the gross rental as they deem to be necessary; and they spend as much time, and hold as many meetings as they find requisite; the list is afterwards re-deposited. The principle of valuation, as I stated, is defined by the Assessment Committee Act.

4927. Then you have the income tax assessment upon the table, and you have the valuation list of the overseers, and you put the two together, and make out what is considered to be a correct assessment, is that the process?—We obtain other information in addition to that.

4928. You supplement the valuation lists; but do you find that the overseers look after the supplemental lists, and look after alterations and improvements in their districts in the way that they ought to be looked after?—No, we could not rely upon the overseers generally; we ask for a list perhaps every third year. In the case of Lancaster and some other townships, we should require a supplemental list immediately; we passed a Lancaster list last September, and we are now receiving a supplemental one.

4929. Mr. Pell.] You stated, did you not, that you have two valuations; one for the county rate and one for the union?—The magistrates make a valuation periodically; it was 10 or 11 years since they made the one before the last; we have nothing to do with the county valuation except to give information.

4930. Then there are two assessments, one for the county rate and one for the poor rate?—Yes, there are two different valuations.

4931. How comes it that there are two?—Because the law requires it; or, rather, it gives the magistrates power to fix the basis upon which to charge the county rate.

4932. The need of having those two assessments arose, did it not, from the fact of the assessments in different unions being made upon different standards; before the Union Assessment Act of 1862, the overseers in each township placed what value they thought proper upon people's property, leaving them, of course, the power of appeal; and, prior to that time, the magistrates had the power, and did fix the valuation as the basis of charge for the county rate?—Yes.

4933. And in 1862, when the Union Assessment Act was about to be put in force, did you have anything of a county meeting in Lancashire, do you know, at which the magistrates agreed to make the assessment identical?—I was present at a county meeting which was held at Preston, a meeting was held of members of the assessment committees, for the purpose of agreeing upon the scale of deductions from the gross estimated rental, so as to arrive at the rateable value; but I do not know that it had any connection with the county rate.

4934. Is it or is it not the fact that, taking two unions, or three unions, in one county, you would find land of precisely the same quality, and making the same rent in those different unions assessed at a very different rate in the different unions?—I do not know very much of what is going on in other unions. I have examined other valuation lists, but I do not know the value of the land.

4935. If that was not the case, you see no reason why there should be two assessments, one for the county rate and one for the poor rate, do you?—None whatever. I think that the assessment committee's valuation, if it be done with care and diligence, might serve for every purpose, not only local, but Imperial, giving the surveyor of taxes, of course, power to revise and object in certain cases.

4936. That is to say, if it was a true assessment, namely, at what the hereditament would really let at?—Yes.

4937. Do you think that that principle of assessment is followed out in your union; that you put every hereditament at what it would fairly be expected to let at, or do you keep it down below that mark?—I do not think it would be possible, without a very large amount of expense, to get a better valuation than we have; and I believe that, in every case, the assessment is put at such a value as it would let for, as far as the assessment committee can judge. They are very practical men, some of them; and a great deal of labour is expended about it. They sat over this valuation list of Lancaster, at their meetings, some of them, four or five hours.

4938. How many rates are called for in the course of a year?—In the last few years the poor rate for Lancaster has ranged over perhaps nine nine months. The board of health rates are rates for a year.

4939. Is there a separate house-to-house call for the board of health rate?—Yes; and for the water rent another separate call.

4940. Are there any more?—No, there would be no more, I think; in the case of some country townships they lay the rate quarterly, and in some half-yearly. The calls for the union are made quarterly, and some of the overseers lay a rate just to meet that call, others lay it for a longer period.

4941. Sir Massey Lopes.] The Chairman asked you several questions with regard to the mode of keeping the accounts of the local board of health and the corporation accounts; do you think that the present mode of keeping those accounts is satifactory, and are they, in your union, properly audited?—I should prefer in every case that an independent auditor should be had for public accounts, without exactly saying that there is anything improper going on in the borough of Lancaster. I do not know that there is; but it would be more proper to have an independent audit.

4942. Do you think it should be a professional man, and not one of the same body?—I am very decidedly of that opinion.

4943. Do you not think that there should be more publicity attached to the accounts; should they not be printed and circulated?—They are so in the case of Lancaster; I am speaking of the local board of health accounts.

4944. Can you state that the corporation accounts of the borough of Lancaster are ever printed?—I cannot speak so much to that. I have an impression that they are. I have no doubt I have seen them, but I do not remember examining them so particularly as to see what they related to especially.

4945. Do you know whether the accounts of the local board of health of Lancaster, are ever sent up to the head office in London, as they ought to be, every year?—I think they are, but I have not any special knowledge of the fact.

4946. Chairman.] Are you aware that in the last return from the municipal corporations the borough of Lancaster is returned as having sent no accounts?—I am not aware of that.

4947. Sir Massey Lopes.] But, as a general rule, no corporation accounts are necessarily under any public audit; they are exempt from a public audit?—I cannot speak to that fact; in our own district there is no official auditor; two persons are appointed to audit the accounts, as I have before mentioned.

4948. Is there any compulsory audit that you know of; is it absolutely necessary?—I cannot speak with certainty as to what the Corporation Act may be in that respect.

4949. You gave us some particulars of the rates in the township of Lancaster, but you did not give us the sum total of the poundage; do you know what the local taxation is in the pound in the township of Lancaster?—There would be the general district rate, 2*s.*, and the poor rate would probably average something under 1*s.* 6*d.*, at present. I do not know that there would be any more than those two, unless you regarded the charge for water as a rate; it is nominally a rate, but really it is a matter of option, and each person pays for what he gets, according to the rental of his house, as defined in the table.

4950. Did I rightly understand you to say that those rates had been decreased of late years?—Yes, very much so.

4951. Are you speaking more especially of the poor rate, or generally?—Of the poor rate; there is not a township in the union, whose rates have not decreased since its formation.

4952. How do you account for that; was it through the effect of the Union Assessment Act of 1862?—No.

4953. Do you not think that that affected it?—The decrease was before the existence of that Act at all; I speak not of decrease in the pound, but of decrease in the expenditure of money, notwithstanding the increase of population and of the value of property.

4954. I think you mentioned that the surveyor of taxes generally adopted your valuation; namely, the valuation of the union assessment committee?—I do not know that I said that; he obtains information from us.

4955. Generally speaking, you do not yourself see any advantages in any division of rates between owners and occupiers?—No.

4956. You think, in the first place, that it would not tend to economy, and, in the second, that it would not tend to a better administration; and thirdly, you said that you thought that there would be a great objection to disturbing the existing arrangements?—Yes, those generally, are my views.

4957. You stated that a little dissatisfaction existed amongst the ratepayers with regard to the county finance, and you thought there was a feeling that they ought to be represented; do you think that if any arrangement was made for dividing the rates between owners and occupiers, it would to a certain extent, be a substitute for the occupiers being represented on county financial boards?—I cannot say that; of course they would wish to be represented so far as their share of the rate was concerned.

4958. You think that that would not altogether remedy the grievance?—I think there is a general feeling that persons paying rates ought to be represented in some way in the expenditure of them.

4959. Did it ever occur to you, that if the rates were divided between owners and occupiers, there would be this difficulty; at present, the owner pays the income tax upon his gross rent, does he not?—Yes.

4960. Without any allowance for repairs, insurance, agency, bad debts, or anything; in fact, he pays upon his gross rent?—Certainly.

4961. If the rates were to be divided between owners and occupiers, I suppose that half the rate which the occupier paid before would be then put on to the rent?—That must be so, on the assumption that the rent is correct at present.

4962. Then if the income tax is paid upon the gross rent, would not the owner have to pay income tax upon that amount which is a substitute for the increase of rates, namely the increase of rent?—That would be so as things stand at present.

4963. And that would be a considerable hardship, would it not?—I should think so: assuming that half the rates were added to the rent, as they would be if the investment rose to what it ought to be, that is to say, its proper income, and you continued still to charge upon the full rent, without making any reduction for rates, repairs, insurance, and agency, as you do now, the tax would would of course be paid upon the half of the rates as well.

Mr. J. Grant.

6 May 1870.

4964. Do you know enough of the income tax law to be able to say whether the owner would be able to escape that additional payment upon the half of the rates?—If he were honest he could not.

4965. That would be a very great hardship, would it not, because the owner would be paying upon what he never could put into his pocket?—I think it would be a hardship for a man to pay upon income that he did not get into his pocket.

4966. Chairman.] Can you calculate what the amount of this grievance would be in the case of a rent of 100 l. with a 5 l. rate put on, and with the income tax at 4 d. in the pound?—That would depend upon the township and the amount of the rate.

4967. Assume the case of a house or a farm of 100 l. rent, with rates put at 10 l., of which 5 l. would be paid by the owner, that would raise the rent from 100 l. to 105 l. if the owner recouped himself for the whole rate, would it not?—Yes.

4968. Then the additional income tax which the owner would pay would be the income tax upon that 5 l.?—Of course.

4969. With the income tax at 4 d. in the pound, that would amount, would it not, to 1 s. 8 d.?—Yes.

4970. Therefore the grievance in this particular case of a farm of 100 l. a year would amount to 1*s.* 8*d.* in the pound?—Yes.

4971. Sir Massey Lopes.] But what would be the grievance when the income tax was, as it was during the Crimean war, 1 s. 4 d. in the pound?—Of course it would be four times as much.

4972. Mr. Rathbone.] You stated, did you not, that it was felt to be a grievance that those who paid rates had no representation in the county administration?—I think I scarcely used so strong a term as the word "grievance;" there is a general feeling that they ought to be represented, and that it would be more consistent with propriety if it were so.

4973. You also said that you thought it very desirable that the owners should be represented on boards of guardians, whether a change was made or not in the present system of levying the rates?—Yes.

4974. Do not you think that if the owners were represented to any appreciable extent upon those boards without any part of the rates being directly levied upon them, that would also be felt to be a grievance?—Some already pay rates, and I suggested that certain other expenses should be placed absolutely upon the owners, such as buildings, and so on; and taking those things into consideration with other matters of which I have alluded to, I think it would be well that they should be represented on boards of guardians, and other representative bodies, and should have power to act.

4975. Granting that it is desirable that the owners should have a real and appreciable representation upon those boards, do not you think that it would be much simpler if the rates were levied half of them directly on them, so as to bring home to them the expenditure at once?—I do not see any reason for charging the owner with half the rate. I cannot see that there would be any practical advantage in it, and there would certainly be inconveniences and objections of an administrative kind.

4976. You stated, did you not, that the expenditure on pauperism had very much decreased in every township in the Lancaster Union?—I spoke of the union generally, and I think there is not an exception.

4977. To what do you attribute that decrease?—I think it is in a very great measure owing to the better administration of the board of guardians, and the regulations of the Poor Law Board, and the improvement in the law.

4978. Do you think that there has been that better administration from your happening to have good officials, or a good board of guardians, or has there been any change in the policy adopted by the board of guardians?—The policy is certainly changed as compared with the period before the union and all the administrative details are conducted upon sounder principles, and are more diligently attended to. I may state, as the result, that when the union was formed in December 1839, there were 210 paupers in the workhouse of the township of Lancaster, and at present there are only 105 paupers in the workhouse of the union, and there has been no special circumstance in our union to account for all that diminution; there has been no very special prosperity.

4979. How do you consider that the reduction has been effected; has there been the same reduction in the number of out-door paupers?—Yes; still greater.

4980. Was that from a new body of guardians coming into power, or their having more efficient officers, or to what do you attribute this decrease?—The administration before was by the overseers without any regulations or any well-defined principles; they had no experience or supervision; of course now the thing is entirely changed in all respects.

4981. Chairman.] Going back to the point upon which the honourable Baronet examined you, supposing that the owner put on the 5 l., which was half of the rate, and that he had to pay a few shillings more, say as much as 10 s. more, income tax in consequence, he could make the rent 105 l. 10 s. as well as make it 105 l., could he not?—Yes, of course he could make any arrangement that the tenant would be willing to submit to.

4982. So far as the owner was concerned, he would be able to indemnify himself against the charges placed upon the increase in the same way as he could indemnify himself against the increase itself?—I do not know that it is a question which would affect the value of the property to the tenant.

4983. But if the property were under lease, the owner would not be able to throw it off in that way?—Of course if it were under lease the terms of the lease would be in operation till the expiration of it.

4984. Sir Massey Lopes.] You are probably aware that just now the annual amount which is levied from real property for those purposes, namely, poor rate and county rate, is 11,000,000 l. per annum; the proposition, as I understand it, is that half those rates should be paid by the owner, and I want to know whether, if such an arrangement was carried out, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not obtain an increased income tax on 5,500,000 l. by that means?—Of course, if half of the entire of the rates were paid by the owner, and the owner to that extent increased his rent, there would be an increase of the charge in respect of income tax.

4985. On five and a half millions more of real property than at present?—Upon the amount that the rent was raised to in consequence of the owner having had to pay half the rates.

4986. Chairman.] Whether those five and a half millions would be added to the rent would depend, would it not, upon whether the owners would be able to raise their rents in every case to the full extent?—Precisely so; it would depend upon that fact, of course.

4987. But in the exact proportion that the owners were not able to increase their rents, it would come from the pocket of the owners, and then this grievance, which is apprehended, would not take effect?—It would not take effect except to the extent that the rent was raised.

4988. Do you believe that the owners of houses and of farms over the whole country would be able to recoup themselves the full amount of the half which is placed upon them; is it conceivable that they would be able to raise the rents in every case to the full amount?—I think that competition brings matters of that kind to a level in time. It would take a number of years, of course, to set any question of that kind right, but one assumes that the rent paid for all kinds of property is what the public, with capital to invest, consider ought to be paid.

4989. Mr. Acland.] You gave your answer to the honourable Baronet on the assumption, as you said, that things go on otherwise than as they are; that assumption of course colours the whole question?— I cannot say what would actually be the result of such an arrangement; I can only say that one supposes generally that rents will rise to what they ought to be, whatever the outgoings may be, either by the owner, or by the tenant.

4990. If your opinion is quoted as supporting that which has been suggested to you by the honourable Member, your opinion must be taken with that qualification, that it is assumed that the income tax is to continue to be levied as it now is under very different circumstances?—Of course it necessarily supposes that the arrangements are as they are at present.

4991. When you stated just now, if I understood you rightly, that landowners would not at all be affected by the transfer of half of the rates to them, did you consider that in the case of a landowner possessing 1,000 l. a year (the rates being 21 s. in the pound) his half-share of the rates would be something like a lump sum of 50 l., and would it not come home very much to the landlord in settling accounts with the receiver of of his rents or his agent once a year, whether on every 1,000 l. a year he is paying 40 l. or 50 l.; would not it bring the matter much more home to him than it is at present?—I did not venture to say that it would not affect the landlord, because I think it would for a time.

4992. The point was whether the landowners would feel a more keen interest in the rising or the falling of the rates, and you appeared to say that they would not; what I wish to ask you is, would not landlords, in the annual settlement of their rental with their agents, have to feel in a large lump sum what the rents were, whether they were rising or falling, and would not that give them a more direct interest in the rates than they now have?—It might bring it more strikingly before their notice, but I think that landlords generally feel that their rents are influenced by the rate that their tenants pay; they have certainly a feeling of interest in their rates at present.

Mr. J. Grant. 6 May 1870.

4993. Mr. Pell.] What is the practice in Lancaster, where a man has property in small houses and pays the rates and taxes; does he pay income tax upon his full rent, or does he pay income tax upon something less than his rent where he pays the rates and taxes for the tenants?—I only know it incidentally, but I have a knowledge that in the case of the owners of cottages paying the rates, and representing it to the surveyor, a deduction is made to that extent.

4994. Mr. St. Aubyn.] When you speak of small houses, up to what limit do you mean?—Those that are rated under "The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869."

4995. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you know any case where that is so with regard to land?—The owner is not required to pay the rates in any case upon either land or houses in our union except under that Act.

4996. But do you know a single instance in which the owner of land has any remission with reference to income tax in his gross rent?—No, I am not aware of any.

4997. He pays up to the hilt, does he not?—So far as I am aware, he does.

4998. Chairman.] The parallel between the two cases being this, that in the case of cottages, the owner sometimes does pay the rates below a certain line, but in the case of land he never does?—That is so.

4999. Therefore the claim on which the owners of cottage property sometimes have remission, has never existed in the case of land?—That is so. In the Act of last Session it is provided that land is not to be regarded as a tenement to charge the rates to the owner.

5000. Colonel Brise.] Are we to understand that in Lancaster the owner, in the case of houses under 6 l., only pays the income tax on the rental after the rates are deducted?—I have been told that in the case of a person holding property of that sort a deduction will be made from the value in respect of the rates paid by him; that is to say, he will only be charged on the amount of his rent less the rates that he pays.

THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES INNES, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Innes. 10 May 1870.

5001. Chairman.] ARE you a merchant in the City of London?—I am an owner of property in the City; I am not a merchant.

5002. Are you an owner of house property?—Yes, I own a good deal of house property in various parts in the City and elsewhere, but my chief interest is in the City.

5003. Have you given your attention to a considerable extent to the question of the value of house property?—Yes, I have.

5004. And I think that in your dealings with house property, and the interest which you have taken in it, the subject of the taxation of house property has occupied you a good deal?—Yes, it has.

5005. Could you state to the Committee, in the first instance, what rates are levied in the City of London?—First there is the consolidated rate; I think the limit in the City, with regard to the consolidated rate is 1 s. 6 d.; it varies from year to year, but at the present moment it is 1 s. 2 d. in the pound. There is a ward rate of ½ d., a sewers rate of 4 d., a main drainage rate of 3 d., a militia rate of ½ d., and a police rate of 5 d., making 2 s. 3 d. for the City rates altogether. Then there are the poor rates, which are rates varying very much in different parishes; the average at present is about 1 s. 2 d. in the pound. My experience I should say does not correspond with the printed returns which I have seen; at least I happen to have an interest in about 12 or 15 parishes, and the average of those parishes differs a good deal from the printed returns; perhaps there may be something in the general average in the City which I do not know, but that which I am paying myself is 1 s. 2 d. in the pound; this is a good deal in excess of what I see printed as the average. There is another charge which varies in the City very much, viz., the tithes, and that exhausts the charges. In one or two parishes in the City, the tithe remains as high as 2 s. 9 d. in the pound, and in others it is down to ½ d., or something of that kind. The average I am paying myself for tithes is 6½ d. There is, besides, the house duty, if that is necessary to be paid, but it is paid, I imagine, to a very small extent in the City.

5006. Could you tell the Committee as preliminary information what kind of property you are mainly interested in?—I am mainly interested in large properties which have been rebuilt of late years, and are let out to a great number of tenants, tenants who hold sometimes for a few years or sometimes from year to year. I have other property which I let to single tenants, but the chief interest that I have is in large property which I let out to a variety of tenants, none of it residential; I have not a residential tenant in the City. I think the average of the tenancies is about 100 l. a year. I may say that I am also a director of a company; I did own at one time a much larger quantity of City property, but I sold it to a company, and I am a director of it; therefore I have the information of the company.

5007. Will you explain why you do not pay the house tax?—Simply, because it is too expensive. The law of the house tax is a little confusing at the present moment. As it was formerly you might have a porter in the house at night, and he might sleep if he thought proper in a chair, but if there was a bed the house became liable for taxation. The result was, that in those large houses, assessed at perhaps from 2,000 l. to 3,000 l. a year, it was a great deal too expensive to have people with beds, and consequently the utmost that ever has been done has been to allow the person who took charge, if there was a person taking charge, to have a chair in the hall to repose in. In the last Session there was a clause introduced into some general Act (Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, not bearing, I think, upon the house duty), saying that whenever a servant slept in a house only for the purpose of taking care of it, that house should not be liable for house duty; that is the way in which the law stands; but in no large house in which I am interested is there any person at night so occupying it as that the house becomes liable to the charge.

5008. The law, is in fact, that house duty is not paid upon offices unless they are used for residential residential purposes?—It amounts practically to that.

5009. You are aware that shops pay 6 d. in the pound, as compared with 9 d., the rate for inhabited houses?—Yes; I have managed in some way or other to avoid the tax; the amount I pay is so exceedingly small, that I have not troubled myself much with the minutiæ of it, but it has been suggested to me in certain cases, that I might claim a reduction from 9 d. to 6 d., from the house having a shop in front.

5010. Are there some houses in which you are interested upon which you pay, and which are inhabited?—Only small houses, perhaps rated at a couple of hundred pounds a year. I do not know, but I should think very likely I pay house duty on half a dozen small houses; in some cases, I congregate half a dozen housekeepers in the same house.

5011. The house tax appears to be assessed in this way, on inhabited houses, 9 d.; on shops, 6 d.; and on houses simply employed as offices, there is no tax at all?—Yes.

5012. I presume that if the house tax were extended to all offices in the City of London, it would materially affect the total amount which is raised?—Materially, and most unfortunately for us.

5013. Do you see any ground why, if shops are taxed, offices should not be subjected to the house tax?—I think we suffer so many hardships already with our offices, that I should be very sorry to have any other one added to it.

5014. Will you state to the Committee what the consolidated rate is?—I am sorry to say I cannot state all the purposes to which the consolidated rate is applied, but it answers, generally speaking, I think, to what you would call the improvement rate in other parts; it is a general district rate of the City.

5015. More or less equivalent to what would be the borough rate in municipalities, I presume?—I presume it would.

5016. But the City has large funds of its own for certain purposes which are defrayed from the corporate funds, which makes it less necessary to raise a high borough rate, and thus there is no borough rate?—There is nothing that goes by the name of borough rate or county rate.

5017. For the purposes of watching and lighting, for instance, the rates are collected, I believe, with the consolidated rate?—I believe they are.

5018. What is the ward rate?—The ward rate is something very small. A ward is constituted of a number of parishes, associated together for administrative purposes; and the ward rate is for defraying the expenses of such administration.

5019. The sewers rate of 4 d. is levied by the Commissioners of Sewers, is it not?—Yes.

5020. What is the main drainage rate?—The main drainage rate applies to all London; the amount has to be raised for a certain number of years, to discharge the cost of the main drainage already completed. [Note.—There is now a consolidated rate demanded by the Metropolitan Board of Works, under the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 102. This includes the cost of the fire brigade, and supplies the means for sinking fund and interest of loans raised by the board. The amount of this rate in the City is 3 d. in the pound.]

5021. The main drainage rate being the amount which is paid to the Metropolitan Board of Works?—Yes.

5022. The Metropolitan Board of Works raises, practically speaking, I think, over 6 d. in the pound, of which 3 d. goes for the main drainage, and 3 d. for its general purposes; do you know in which of those rates the 3 d. to the Metropolitan Board of Works for their general purposes is included?—I do not.

5023. Do you divide those rates in your mind at all, according to the class to which they belong?—Yes, I think I can do so. It would appear to me that the consolidated rate, the main drainage rate, and the poor rate, are rates which might be considered with reference to both landlord and tenant.

5024. Do you see any ground for putting the ward rate, the sewers rate, the militia rate, and the poor rate upon the landlord?—I do not see any ground for doing so in respect of the first three.

5025. Do you see any ground for putting the main drainage rate upon the landlord?—Yes, I think that there is ground, or at least there is some reason why the landlord might pay a portion of the main drainage rate; it is for a permanent improvement which was not anticipated at the time a great number of leases were entered into; it is something unusual in legislation, and something that is added to the permanent value of the property, and reduces the probability of taxation in the future.

5026. Have you considered at all the propriety of throwing any of the burthen of the main drainage rate upon the owner of the property as regards existing contracts?—Of course there is great difficulty in dealing with existing contracts, but the principle of dealing with existing contracts was adopted in the income tax, and therefore there is a precedent for it. It forms part of the general question as to whether it would be right to throw a certain portion of the taxation upon the landlord as well as upon the tenant.

5027. Were you an owner of property at the time when the income tax was first imposed?—No, my ownership of property to any extent would not go back above 14 or 15 years.

5028. Were you at all aware from what you had heard, and from the attention that you have given to the subject in years since, that it can be truly said that the income tax, when it was imposed upon house property, was an interference with existing contracts?—I take it that the usual words of a lease are these: that the tenant shall pay all taxes, whether Parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise; the income tax is a Parliamentary tax, and consequently, taking the letter of the law, it is a violation of the contract.

5029. Do you believe that those words were used in leases prior to the imposition of the income tax?—I have no doubt of it.

5030. Do you consider that the income tax is paid by you, as an owner of property, on your property, or is it paid by the occupier?—I should answer that it is a part of the general question. I take it that rent is one form of interest paid for the use of capital lent to a man; a rent which the man agreed to according to circumstances which he knew at the time, and therefore to throw an additional burden upon the landlord is certainly to give him rather less for the use of his property than he stipulated for: but there may be reasons, and no doubt there are reasons, which would justify it.

5031. Quite apart from the question of complaint of old or new contracts, do you think that the imposition of the income tax was calculated to lessen the rents?—I think not.

Mr. J. Innes.

10 May 1870.

5032. Do you find, practically, that there have been considerable variations in the rates since you have been interested in property?—There has been one most important variation, and that is in reference to the poor rates; that is the only important change there has been since I have had experience in these matters.

5033. But the rates have increased, have they not?—Yes, the tendency has been towards increase, and the scale of rating in the City has increased very largely.

5034. Do you mean that the aggregate expenditure has increased?—Yes; I mean to say that the rating value which has been put upon a house, the amount at which the house has been rated, has increased very much indeed.

5035. Has it been put up nearer to its true value?—Sometimes, I think, beyond its true value; but the tendency has been within the last few years to assess on a high scale, whereas, previously, it was to pass the amount at something very low. If you will allow me, I will give an instance of one property belonging to the company of which I am a director, and in which I have an interest; that was assessed at 8,500 l. a year, but upon strong representations, and going into the matter, the assessment was reduced to 3,100 l.; I merely give that as one instance, and it is a very strong one. The way in which the rating has been carried on has been very much by the assessors fixing a high assessment, and then throwing the burden of proof that they have charged too much upon the occupier.

5036. But the City is supposed to be assessed very much nearer the rack rents than most parts of the metropolis, I believe?—I should think far nearer to the rack rents than in other cases.

5037. Could you state to the Committee what the gross rental was of that property which was assessed at 8,500 l. a year, and which was reduced to 3,100 l.?—The gross possible rent, that is to say, on the supposition that every room in the house had been let, was 4,700 l. a year.

5038. How did the assessment committee arrive at the figure 8,500 l.?—By the habit of the assessors being to fix some very large sum, and to think that the people were skilful enough to earn it.

5039. I presume that that was a building with a great many tenements?—Yes, with a great number of tenements.

5040. So that it would have been necessary to ascertain the exact rent which was paid by the occupiers of all those tenements in order to arrive at the exact conclusion?—Yes, that would be so.

5041. Do you pay the rates, or do your tenants pay the rates?—The company of which I am a director pay all the rates, and the tenants pay a rent which covers whatever charges are paid.

5042. So that in fact all the rates are paid by the owner?—It is a leasehold property, and the rates are upon the beneficial owners.

5043. Has the company, or have any of the trustees in whose names this property stands, any voice whatever, or if so, what voice, in administering those funds to which they contribute so largely?—Simply the opportunity of their secretary attending and voting; they can be represented at the vestry by one person, by the secretary or by the chairman; the City is exempt from the General Vestry Act, and therefore it is different from the metropolis generally.

5044. As far as you are aware, do the owners in London take any interest in the administration of any of those rates?—I am sorry to say they have very little opportunity afforded them of doing so.

5045. So far as you are aware, are the names of the owners put upon the register for municipal and parochial purposes?—Only if they are occupiers as well, unless there has been a change lately, which I do not know of.

5046. An owner would be obliged to claim to vote as an owner at the vestry?—I think he would.

5047. Will you state the difference in the arrangements as regards the Vestry Act in the City of London?—The General Vestry Act of the country gives votes according to the amount at which people are rated; that is to say, that if a man is rated at 50 l., I think it is, he has one vote; if he is rated at 100 l. he has two votes, and so on up to a certain amount. The City is excluded in that Act.

5048. You have no plurality of votes at all?—No, we have no plurality of votes.

5049. Does your experience point to the desirability of increasing the basis of interest by making the owners liable for a certain proportion of the charges, and admitting them to vote at the meetings at which the expenditure is ordered?—I think it would be an improvement, because nothing can be more miserable than the present way in which those local matters are administered. There is one striking instance which I may venture to give. In one parish, in which I am interested, there was a question of settling the tithe; it was proposed, in a small parish only rated at about 17,000 l. a year, to settle the tithe in perpetuity at 2,600 l. a year. Notice was sent round to everybody who was entitled to attend, and yet at the vestry, which carried it out, there were only 13 people present, including the rector and churchwardens.

5050. What had been the tithes up to that point?—The tithes had varied, being so much in the pound; they had been from 1,600 l. to 1,700 l. a year.

5051. What amount in the pound?—Two shillings in the pound, a compromise upon the 2 s. 9 d.

5052. In fact, the owners of property in that parish were paying 2 s. in the pound, and it was a matter therefore of very considerable importance to them how that tithe was settled?—Yes, it was a matter of great importance.

5053. Nevertheless, no interest whatever was taken in it, so far as attending the meeting?—None at all; in fact, the probability is that those who were most deeply interested could not have attended, because they would not have been in the position of parties who paid the rates themselves, and thus became entitled to attend.

5054. As owners they would have no voice?—As owners they would not have been entitled to attend.

5055. Do you attribute the non-attendance of owners generally upon these matters, affecting their property in the City, to the deficient arrangement for their fair representation?—Not entirely, but I should to some extent. The owners of course are scattered, and there would be other reasons, I think, besides want of power.

5056. If there was anything that interested the owners at all it would have been such an arrangement ment of the tithe, which was of more interest to the owner than to the occupier?—Far more interesting I should imagine, because it was in perpetuity.

5057. Who paid the tithes at the time, the owners or the occupiers?—The occupiers.

5058. How did this arrangement, made by the occupiers, affect leases?—It caused no change of any kind, except that an extra amount, in the first instance, was paid by the occupiers; but gradually that was diminished. That parish is a remarkable case. It was, in the year 1864, rated at about 17,000 l. a year, and it has since been rated at 52,000 l. a year. I was one of those who assisted in making the bargain. I anticipated a very considerable advance in the rates, and I got it settled at 2,600 l. a year; but that is an instance how the property had been previously underrated. The rating of that parish was 17,000 l. a year, and it since has risen to upwards of 50,000 l.

5059. The 50,000 l. being probably nearer the truth than the 17,000 l.?—Yes, a great deal nearer.

5060. Sir Massey Lopes.] Was it raised under the Union Assessment Act?—Yes, it was.

5061. Chairman.] This arrangement, involving the settlement of a question, was made without the owners having any voice in the matter?—Without having any voice at all, some of them being dissatisfied with the arrangement.

5062. The occupiers took a heavier burthen upon themselves for the first year, but a lighter burthen at the later portion of their tenure?—Yes, and that was one very great difficulty which we experienced in carrying out this bargain, which was immensely desirable for the parish, because a certain man said, "I am only a tenant for a year;" and another man said, "I am only a tenant for one or two years, why should I burthen myself, for the interest of the parish, with an extra rate."

5063. This was a case of the occupier practically varying the contract with the owner by his own action?—It was so.

5064. Which was to the advantage of some owners and to the disadvantage of others, according to the length of the leases?—Yes, that was so.

5065. Are there any other instances known to you showing the inexpediency of the system which throws the settling of local matters on to the occupier?—The general answer which I should give is this, that the work is exceedingly badly done. I remember a case in one of the City parishes, a year or two ago, where a matter was referred to a committee, and the committee called the vestry together to receive their report. The report was signed by the chairman, and as soon as it was presented somebody got up and raised an objection to it; the chairman, and every single person in the committee, excepting one, voted against the report which they had printed the day before. I thought that was the most remarkable case of thoughtless people attending a vestry I ever heard of; but the vestries in the City are conducted very much in that way.

5066. Do I understand you generally upon this head to mean that you believe that, as an owner of property, you practically are bearing the burdens which are imposed upon that property?—Certainly.

5067. And that you would like to put the taxes more directly upon the owner, in order to secure a better representation of the owner and a more efficient management of the funds?—I think there would be an advantage in that.

5068. As an owner of property, you are not afraid of the burden being placed directly upon you instead of indirectly?—No, I should not be afraid of it. As an owner of property I should not like too heavy a burden thrown upon me, without the power of recovering a certain portion of it from my tenant. Supposing I was an owner of property, and had let my property for so much a year and could not recover anything at all from my tenant, and the outlay was not to improve my property very much, I should not like the tax to be heavy; I should very willingly bear a moderate tax, thinking it might be useful.

5069. I understand that you do not think, even as an owner of property, that it would be absolutely unjust to throw a portion of the taxation, which is now being incurred, upon you, notwithstanding your contracts with your tenants that they are to pay all the rates and taxes?—I think that a certain amount of taxation might not unfairly be thrown upon the owner.

5070. Can you state to the Committee any grounds for that?—I think I can. There is scarcely a place that could have been worse managed during its rebuilding than the City has been; its streets, as it is well known, are exceedingly crowded. There have been constant opportunities of carrying out improvements at a comparatively moderate cost; that is to say, in the most crowded thoroughfares houses have been pulled down and rebuilt, where the space ought to have gone to widen the street. There has been consideration as to whether or not the space occupied by those houses should be used for that purpose; but the feeling on the part of those who have the power of carrying it out and would have to raise taxes has been so strongly against the charging of the occupier with the whole, that they have allowed opportunity after opportunity for improvements to pass away.

5071. Then your evidence goes to this, does it not, that you think that the owners ought to get more power in arranging permanent improvements and so forth, and then you think that the power would naturally follow the taxation?—I think so; and it would be worth paying something for that, certainly.

5072. Can you see any other advantages that the owners derive by the increased security which is afforded them for recovering their rent, through the improvement of the property in their neighbourhood?—Yes, certainly; I will take an instance which occurs to me particularly at the present moment in the new street, Queen Victoria-street; I observed it stated in the papers the other day, that there was one plot of 2,400 feet, not a large plot, let at 2,400 l. a year, that is 1 l. per superficial foot; that capitalised may be considered as equal to about 50,000 l.; I say 20 years' purchase, because it is such a very large rental. An outlay of 5,000 l. would be sufficient, if there were no special agreement to the contrary, to utilize that land.

5073. Do you mean that a house built upon that land could be raised for 5,000 l.?—Yes, easily raised for 5,000 l.

5074. So that the house put upon the ground would be worth 5,000*l.*, and the ground itself would be worth 50,000 l.?—Yes, in round numbers.

5075. The building rent therefore would practically be a tenth of the ground rent?—Yes, it would,

Mr. J. Innes.

would, and consequently the only margin which the owner would have would be this 5,000 l., the value of the building put upon the ground, so that the owner is deeply interested in the improvement of the district; he would suffer very much from its degradation, because if that district were to degrade at all, that 5,000 l. margin would very soon be gone. Consequently he has a very strong interest in the well doing of the neighbourhood. Then supposing by an improvement rate being charged, he contributing a moderate sum towards it, there could be a general improvement, a security would thus be given to him which perhaps he could not otherwise have.

5076. Your point is this, is it not, that where the ground rent or the capital invested in purchasing freehold land is in very high proportion to the building capital, or the building rent, in those cases the owner retains a very great interest in the improvement of the neighbourhood?—Yes; he has a great interest in the improvements.

5077. If the security of the house built is not sufficient, there is no margin in case the value of property should fall in the neighbourhood?—It is so.

5078. Would you not consider that that was a very extreme case?—Yes, it is. It was that which fixed itself in my mind as an extreme case.

5079. Would you apply the principle to any except an extreme case, or do you think the case is so extreme that it constitutes an exception which one ought to overlook?—Perhaps I may be allowed to give another instance with regard to that subject. The Charity Commissioners raised a great objection to it, in the first instance, but they allowed the arrangement afterwards. When a tavern which is close to the Sun Insurance Office was let, it was let at about 800 l. a year, or thereabouts; but almost immediately afterwards the lease was sold, a lease of only 21 years, for 10,000 l. premium. The people who bought this lease for 10,000 l. premium, wished to be the owners of the freehold, and they negociated and arranged a purchase on the condition of placing in the funds an amount sufficient to produce a sum equal to the ground rent of 800 l. a year of rent into the funds, and to let that be the amount paid for the freehold. When they came before the Charity Commissioners, the Commissioners said: "Here is a lease of 800 l. a year sells for 10,000 l. premium; surely the reversion at the end of 21 years is very valuable, and therefore more than that 800 l. ought to be put into the funds." The subject was investigated, and the Charity Commissioners were persuaded that the 800 l. a year was something so large that to have that rent, or an equivalent, secured in perpetuity, was a sufficient recompense to the estate, although that lease had sold for 10,000 l. premium.

5080. In the suburbs of London, where building is not yet much developed, what sum would the increase of rent produce in building leases?—I suppose that average land at Wimbledon, and thereabouts, would sell for about 1,000 l. an acre, as it would let for about 50 l. a year.

5081. Then the buildings by which it would be covered might represent what?—They might represent 10,000 l. or 12,000 l.

5082. In such a case as that, the buildings put upon the ground would be ample security for the ground rent; what interest would the ground landlord have in such a case?—He would have this interest, that although his ground rent would sell as a well secured ground rent, the number of years' purchase which it would bring would depend somewhat upon the general state of the neighbourhood; and a well secured ground rent in a neighbourhood generally good and satisfactory in every way, would bring a larger number of years' purchase than in a neighbourhood where the rent might be considered fully secure, but at the same time not to be collected from such a satisfactory class of people as in the other case.

5083. What I understand you generally to mean is, that the landlord, who has settled to receive a certain rent for a certain number of years, is not so devoid of any interest in the property as it is generally assumed, for although during the time he is receiving the ground rent he has no control over his property, yet he has an interest in the development of the neighbourhood, more or less?—I think he has, and he shows it by his contract. Although the rent he may have to receive is something very small when he parts with his property, he ties his lessee down by all sorts of conditions; he is to be allowed to inspect the property from year to year, and his lessee is not to alter it without his leave. He reserves to himself the strongest control that he possibly can hold over the property.

5084. What you have said would apply chiefly to improvement rates, would it not?—Yes.

5085. Would it apply, in your opinion, to the poor rate?—I speak feelingly with regard to the poor rate, because, having considerable interest in the City when I acquired that interest, all I was taxed was 6 d. in the pound, and I gave my price for the property upon the calculation that that was to be the expense for the poor. Now, by the arrangement of throwing the expense of the poor over the whole metropolis, into hodge-podge, that 6 d. has got up already, as I have said, to 1 s. 2 d., and how much higher it is to get I do not know. The poor-rate, certainly, does not arise out of my occupancy of the house; it has nothing in the world to do with my being an occupier, and this charge comes upon me; therefore, I do not see why the owner of the freehold should not assist me out of my difficulty.

5086. You speak feelingly upon the subject, considering that you, as owner of the house, have paid the difference?—I do.

5087. But your tenants would not afford a fair instance, would they, of occupiers generally, because they do not feel the payment of the rates?—They do not feel it at all; it all falls upon me.

5088. Where there are no leases, I should like to know your opinion, whether the payment of additional poor rate is an occupier's grievance, or an owner's grievance?—The tenant certainly has the power of very soon correcting it. In the first instance, it is the occupier's grievance; but when the time comes for giving notice, or having the terms of the lease renewed, the tenant certainly has the power of protecting himself to some extent, by saying, I will not pay the same rent as I did before.

5089. I am speaking of the tenure where the landlord has the power, and the tenant has the power of carrying on, or not carrying on, the contract as to the rent?—There, unquestionably, it is more an owner's question than it is an occupier's.

5090. But that is not the general opinion in the the metropolis, is it?—I do not know; it certainly is my opinion.

5091. When you hear of a ratepayers' association, does it generally represent an association of landlords, or an association of occupiers?—I do not know, I never belonged to one; I have tried to think out these subjects for myself, and I have not belonged to any public body of any kind.

5092. Do you think that the present system rather involves the result, that both parties fancy that they are paying the same tax?—Very likely; certainly it is a complex subject, and in addition to its being a complex subject, some people jump to very rapid conclusions.

5093. Where you have house property not let to tenants such as occupy your offices, but separate houses, you say, do you not, that you pay the rates?—Yes.

5094. The present result is, that you feel the increase of taxation when it is too late to remedy it, or to have any voice in the administration of it?—Yes.

5095. The occupiers pay the most of it in the first instance, and have the control of the expenditure?—Yes.

5096. But ultimately it falls upon the landlords, who have no voice in the administration?—Yes, to some extent.

5097. As regards the tithes, in buying property have you taken that into consideration as one of the outgoings?—I did not in the first instance, because I did not know what the law of tithe was, but I should do so now; many people have been desperately disappointed when they have found this heavy charge coming upon them without their having taken it into their consideration.

5098. When you have bought property, or your company has bought property, have you carefully considered the amount of rates and other charges that are imposed upon it, in order to determine what price you will give?—I always do so myself; or if I have any voice in advising, I always look at the rates as an important element in the price.

5099. It is looked upon as an element of the price which you can afford to give?—Yes, certainly.

5100. And, cæteris paribus, if the rates charged are high, you give less, and if the rates charged are low, you give more?—Yes, certainly.

5101. So that the seller is the person who is really affected by the weight of those charges?—Yes, certainly.

5102. In your leases of houses, which are let to separate tenants, are there any cases where they contract that they should pay the income tax?—None.

5103. It would be illegal if you were to do so, would it not?—I believe it would be illegal.

5104. You do not consider that the clause in the Income Tax Act, which prevents you from throwing the fluctuation of the income tax upon the tenant, is a dead letter?—No, not at all.

5105. As a matter of fact, the fluctuations of the income tax are thrown upon the owner, and if the income tax rises or falls, you have to bear those fluctuations?—Yes, it falls on the owner.

5106. Even in the case of a long lease?—Yes.

5107. If it is 1*s.* in the pound you pay more, and if it is 4 d. in the pound you pay less?—Yes.

5108. Those fluctuations are borne, are they not, by those who are interested as owners, either as owners of houses, or as owners of ground rents?—Yes; in the income tax, the way in which we regulate the amount is this, that each person, according to his degree of interest in the property, contributes towards the tax. For instance, supposing I was dealing with a house which was assessed at 3,000 l. a year for the income tax, and I had to pay 300 l. a year ground rent for that house, I should deduct the proportion which attached to that 300 l. a year from the person who received it, and then bear the difference, 2,700 l. a year myself, as having a beneficial interest up to that extent.

5109. In levying the income tax upon that large building that you spoke of, composed of a number of tenements, do the Income Tax Commissioners allow a deduction for the rates that you pay?—They do, but not for the repairs of the house.

5110. Do they allow a deduction for the poor rates?—Yes, the poor rates they allow a deduction for, but not for the repairs.

5111. As far as you are aware, is it the practice to allow for all rates that are paid by the landlord?—It is.

5112. Mr. Pell.] On a scale, I suppose; not in each individual instance?—No, not in each individual instance. The income tax is generally assessed upon an approximate amount.

5113. Mr. Corrance.] When you speak of getting the assessment down to 3,000 l., did you mean that the total rates in the parish or union were lowered?—No, I meant that that assessment for which I was charged the larger amount I got reduced to the smaller amount.

5114. Was any public valuer employed to do that?—No; it was the result of giving the details.

5115. It was upon your own testimony?—Yes.

5116. You have spoken of this large increased value of rateable property from 17,000 l. to 50,000 l.; that was the effect of the Union Assessment Act, was it not?—Yes, it was.

5117. As a matter of experience, do not you think that the present augmented value assigned to rateable property arises a good deal from the application of the Union Assessment Act?—I consider that it arises from the re-assessment; therefore, I presume that, to whatever extent the Union Assessment Act has set the machinery in motion for the re-assessment, it is due to the Union Assessment Act.

5118. Then the augmented value shown is not real?—In many cases it is not real; in some cases it is real.

5119. Chairman.] There has been an enormous increase in the value of property in the City, has there not?—Yes, enormous, and also a very large amount of rebuilding. The same area of ground is covered by much larger houses than it was before.

5120. It would give a false impression to imagine that the enormous increase that there has been in the City of London arose simply from the revaluation?—Certainly.

5121. Mr. Corrance.] You have stated as a reason why the main drainage rate ought to fall upon the landlord, that it is a permanent improvement?—I did not mean the whole of it; what I meant was this, that it would be fair to class the main drainage rate amongst those rates of which the landlord might pay a portion.

5122. Because it was a permanent improvement?—Yes.

Mr. J. Innes.
10 May 1870.

5123. You have stated, have you not, that the poor rate also might be thrown upon the landlord?—Yes, but for a different reason.

5124. Not because it was a permanent improvement?—No, certainly not, but for a different reason.

5125. Mr. Walter.] You spoke of a class of tenements in which you are interested, in which the owners, that is you yourself, have contracted with the tenants to pay the rates; what class of tenements are those; what is the average amount of their rents?—Taking the company's rent and my own, which gives one the best information, and which would apply perhaps to 400 or 500 tenants, I think the average is a little more than 100 l. a year.

5126. What is the total annual average of the rates; is it 2 s. in the pound?—I think the rates I gave just now come close upon 4 s. in the pound.

5127. That would be nearly 20 l. upon each occupier?—No, that would not be so, because although each tenant would pay on the average 100 l. a year, the assessment would not be at 100 l. a year; in the first instance, there would be an allowance for taxes, and an allowance for the trouble of collecting, and so on.

5128. Supposing that you took 50 per cent. off, that would leave 10 l. a year?—Yes, it would leave that no doubt.

5129. Supposing those rates were taken off entirely, or very materially reduced, do you conceive that the owners of property would receive the same rent, or that they would be forced to make an abatement to their tenants; is it your opinion that the reduction so effected would go into the pockets of the occupier, or of the owner?—In the first instance, I presume, that the saving would be in favour of the person who had to pay the amount; but that after the contract had expired, there would be a re-adjustment of the sum between the two parties, and the question of rates would form no doubt an important element in the re-adjustment.

5130. The result of that re-adjustment really would determine the question, would it not, as to which of the two parties paid the rates, the owner or the occupier?—Yes; a good deal would depend upon the supply and demand at the moment, and various other circumstances. As a matter of course, supposing I were competing for property where there were no rates, or very small rates, I should be willing to pay a higher rent than I should do if the rates were heavy; but, as I say, it is part, no doubt, of the very complex question, in which are involved the various interests of owner and occupier, consumer, and so on.

5131. There would be, in fact, a number of disturbing causes independently of the mere reduction of the rates which might affect the amount paid by the occupier?—I have little doubt that there would be.

5132. And therefore, in that point of view, you could not undertake to pronounce absolutely as to which of the parties the rates really fall upon?—I have no doubt that the tendency of reduced rates would be for the owner to get a larger rental than he does at the present moment; that is to say, if I was going to become an occupier of property where I should have to pay the rates, and I knew that I should have to pay lower rates than before, I should be more anxious to be an occupier; and consequently the first tendency would be that I should be willing to pay rather more rent than before, but I would not say that it would swallow the whole amount.

5133. Mr. Smith.] In other words you mean that an occupier, or a person intending to be an occupier, in making his estimate of the total cost of the premises that he desires to possess, puts the taxes on the one hand and the rent on the other, and the two together make up the rent or the cost to him?—Yes, unquestionably.

5134. So that if the taxes fall the rent might rise, or if the taxes increase the rent would be subject to deduction?—Yes.

5135. You have, I think, in the City two owners before you reach the occupier, usually, have you not; you have the owner of the ground rent and the owner of the building?—Yes; and then comes the occupier. In some cases it is all in one.

5136. You represent, in a great measure, the second class, the owner of the building interest?—Yes, I do.

5137. You pay the ground rent for your property, do you not?—Yes.

5138. In entering into your contract with the owner of the ground, you take into account all the charges to which you expect the building to be exposed, and the liability to rates; you make your estimate, and that estimate, I apprehend, is a covering estimate, is it not?—Yes, it is.

5139. So that if the rates stand at 3 s. 11½ d. you would charge or expect to receive a rent which would fully cover those rates, and something more?—Yes, as much more as I could get.

5140. But the result would be that you would not enter into a bare speculation which would merely leave you 16 s. in the pound?—Not intentionally; I may have done it by mistake.

5141. But the result of the system is, that the investor of capital is always careful to secure himself against the possibility of an increase of rates as far as he can?—That is to say, if at the time he was entering into the contract he anticipated an increase of rates; but probably, under the circumstances, most people have entered into transactions taking the rates as they found them, and thinking it was as probable they would fall as that they would rise.

5142. But inasmuch as you paid the rates for your occupier, you endeavour to make a profit out of the payment of those rates?—Unquestionably. The course that I take, and I daresay it is the same which other people would take, is to get the best rent I can, regardless of cost; if I make a bad bargain I cannot help it; if I make a good bargain so much the better. The rent that I get is not regulated at the moment by the rates, but it is by the demand for the offices which I have got to let.

5143. But your readiness to enter into the speculation depends upon your own estimate of the profit to be obtained after the payment of the ground rent, and after the payment of the rates?—Yes, and of interest of capital, &c.

5144. You spoke of a difficulty with regard to owners taking a part in local management, can you suggest any mode in which, in the City of London, the two classes of owners of whom you speak could take part in the management of local affairs?—I presume that the principle of legislation is such that if the owner were burthened with taxes then he would be admitted to a share in the management. He might perhaps be admitted otherwise, but there is a certain process, I think,

I think, by which a man becomes entitled to vote by a direct burthen being cast upon him.

5145. I quite understand that he would be entitled to vote, but, as a matter of practice, how could he; would he be able to take part in the local management of affairs in the City, because, as you are aware, he is non-resident as a rule?—There is a strong instance in the Tithe Act of the country. The Tithe Act of the country allows tithes to be settled and appoints how people are to vote, and only gives to the beneficial occupier a right to vote in common with the owner. The vote for settling questions of tithe is with the owners of property, and the beneficial occupier, and the man who is not supposed to be the beneficial occupier is excluded from the right of voting. That, I presume, was done under the idea of its being a fixed charge to endure for a number of years, and that the owner ought to be represented. It is the strongest case that I remember of the owner being represented in the management of property.

5146. But, as a matter of fact, a very large class of the ratepayers, and those who are generally interested in property in the cities, do not take any part in parochial affairs?—Such is the case, and the same thing might go on if they had the power of doing it, but it seems they have not had that opportunity as yet to any important extent.

5147. You spoke, did you not, of the mode of voting being peculiar to the City, there being no plurality of votes?—Yes, that is simply because the City is excluded from the general Vestry Act of the country.

5148. Are you of opinion that a plurality of votes would be desirable?—I think it is by far the fairest system. I know one case in one of the City vestries where a man in receipt of parochial charity has voted, and has had considerable influence in carrying some of the arrangements of the parish in reference to large matters; he is a shoemaker in the City who receives the parish funds.

5149. Mr. Backhouse.] The ground in Queen Victoria-street is let on 99 years' building lease, is it not?—It is let on a long lease; I do not know how many years. I only saw it in the papers. I have no further knowledge of it.

5150. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] I think you said that in the case of an increase of rate the occupier, if under lease, would have a speedy remedy against the owner by declining at the end of the term to renew his holding?—He would have an opportunity of recouping himself to a certain extent, no doubt, only he might find it exceedingly inconvenient to quit his premises.

5151. In the City, where there is a great deal of competition, would not it be almost inoperative, because you being an owner the occupier has always been obliged to come to you again, because if he did not make terms he would not get anywhere else to go to?—I am sorry to say I do not find it so; there has been an extra supply of offices.

5152. Then it is a question of supply and demand?—Yes.

5153. Your company pays the rates; why do not you advocate the owners having representation; you have a chance, have you not, your company paying the rates, of being represented in the parochial body, and yet you do not do so?—I happen, individually, to be directly interested in most of the principal parishes where the company have property; and where it is any matter of interest I have generally gone in my own character, and that has tolerably well answered the purposes of the company.

5154. Mr. Fielden.] What is the deduction made from the rent to arrive at the assessment for the poor rate?—The way in which large houses have been dealt with has been this: We will say the rent is 6,000 l. a year, that is, the gross possible rent that could be obtained, supposing all the rooms in a large house were let, then one-third has been taken off, so as to place that house on a fair standing with a house let to one tenant; its rating would be reduced to 4,000 l. a year. Then the same deduction has been made which is made on all houses, which is 20 per cent.; that would be one-fifth off; the 4,000 l. would be reduced to 3,200 l. That is the rule that the assessment committees have followed, I believe. First of all, in the case of very large houses, where there are a great number of tenants, one-third is taken off to allow for the expenses of servants, porters, and the extra expense and trouble of management; and then it is still subject to the same allowance as an ordinary house, which is one-fifth.

5155. If it were held in one occupation only you get one-fifth off?—Yes. Nothing in the world can be more confusing, according to my experience, than the assessments; they are the most haphazard calculations that you can imagine.

5156. Colonel Brise.] I think you spoke of property of your own which the overseers or surveyors assessed at 8,500 l. a year, the actual rent being only 4,700 l. a year; was that the actual rent after the deductions were taken off; was it net rental or the gross rental?—It was the extreme possible gross rent if every room in the house had been let.

5157. The rateable value, I think you said, was 3,000 l. a year?—They reduced the gross estimated rental from 8,500 l. to 3,100 l., and they reduced the rateable value from 6,800 l. to 2,480 l.

5158. Then the rateable value is only 2,480 l.?—Yes, that is all.

5159. On a rental of 4,700 l. a year?—Yes; perhaps I may be wrong in saying 4,700 l.; I daresay it might be 4,600 l., but it was thereabouts.

5160. How do I understand you to arrive at that deduction; would there be 20 per cent. for repairs?—The first thing that the assessment committee would have to do would be this, they would have to take the amount, we will say, of 4,500 l. as an easier sum; they would then take off 1,500 l., or one-third, so as to reduce the amount of this large house down to the level of a house let out to one person.

5161. Then I understand you to say that you would not pay any inhabited house duty on this 4,600 l. rent?—None at all.

5162. You spoke of a vestry meeting in your part of London, and you said that the owners took very little interest in a particular vestry meeting that you had on one occasion; do you argue from that that if the owners paid half the rates they would take any more interest than they have done heretofore?—They would at any rate have had an opportunity of doing it, and the probability is that a certain number would have taken an interest in it.

5163. The cases under discussion may perhaps have

Mr. J. Innes.

10 May 1870.

have a particular interest to the owners, as I understand?—Yes, exactly so, but still the owners are excluded; they could not come unless the owner happened to be an occupier; a tenant from year to year would have a right to vote, whilst the owners of the property in fee could not have appeared qua owners.

5164. Mr. Pell.] You stated, did you not, that you are in favour of certain rates being divided between the owner and the occupier?—Yes.

5165–6. I find, on a calculation from your own figures, that the amount of the rates to be divided would be 2 s. 7 d. out of the whole total of 3 s. 5 d.?—Yes, I think that is so.

5167. That is really a very large proportion; you are in favour of a very large portion of local taxation, in the instances with which you are acquainted, being divided between the owner and the occupier?—I did not say a very large proportion; by the word divide, I did not mean an equal division; I meant shared or apportioned.

5168. Have you come to any conclusion in your mind what proportion should be paid by the owner, and what proportion by the occupier?—I think you would require to have a graduated scale. If the subject came before me, I should be very happy to think it out, but in the first instance, I should say that I think the circumstances are so different with regard to the length of leases, &c., that it would be necessary to have some graduated scale. In cases where leases had to endure above a certain number of years, there should only be a very small deduction, but if the leases had to endure for only a few years anything in the shape of an improvement rate, a rate which affected property permanently, should be charged in a certain proportion to the landlord as well as the tenant.

5169. Then the scale would have reference to the length of the lease not to the interest that the owner might have, whether his was the paramount interest or the builder's?—I should say that my idea would be this: that the scale would have reference to the nature of the tax; if it were an improvement tax, it seems to me that that is a tax for which there is the most reason that there should be a share paid by the landlord; in that case, the scale which I should form, if it rested with me, would depend a good deal upon the length of the lease.

5170. Would you admit that it would be a very complicated arrangement?—No, I think not; I should say that there would be a certain amount of complication; but, at the same time, not such an amount as would render it impolitic to carry out that arrangement.

5171. But the scale would not be a simple scale of universal application in the City as to what the landlord should pay in every instance?—It would be a scale of universal application, according to my idea.

5172. You gave us a case in the City of London where the interest which the owner had in the undertaking, if we may say so, that is the land and the building together, was worth 50,000 l., and the interest that the builder had in it was only worth 5,000 l.; the 2,400 feet being covered by a building which would only cost 5,000 l.?—I do not mean to say that the interest of the builder would be only 5,000 l.

5173. Are we right in starting with this, that the lease having been signed, and having been settled with regard to the land on one side, and the building put upon it on the other, it would be as 10 is to 1, or 50 is to 5?—There would be, in fact, nine-tenths, you may say, of borrowed capital, and one-tenth the capital of the building-man.

5174. I understand you to say that, following out those instances which you yourself gave, the interest of the owner of the land which was so very much larger than the interest of the builder, that it was desirable to give him a direct representation in rating questions?—I do not consider that his interest is any larger; the largest interest that there is in it, if the lessee is sound, is really that of the man who has pledged himself to pay the rent and to build; but when you come to the capital that is embarked in it, one man has lent, we will say, 45,000 l. out of the 50,000 l., and thus his interest is very great.

5175. What is the length of building leases generally in the City?—They vary from 60 to 99 years; I should say seldom exceeding 80 years.

5176. Supposing that there was an Act passed to divide the rates between the owner and the occupier, would you follow the mortgagee as the income tax does now?—That is a new question; at the first blush, I should say that I should not follow the mortgagee, because I assume that the mortgagee takes so much care in limiting the amount that he would lend, that he may well be considered to be safe; then his case is only that of a loan, subject generally to six months' notice.

5177. In your own instance, I dare say you have taken new leases within the last 10 or 12 years?—Yes; I have.

5178. In considering the question of what rent you should give yourself, did you entirely overlook the possibility of the improvement rate, for instance, becoming very much larger within the next 10 or 20 years, than it had been in the last 10 or 20 years?—Yes, I think I did; I do not think I took into consideration the probability of any increased rate; in the transactions that I have entered into, I had intended to have a margin corresponding with the amount of risk, but I do not think that I looked at that increased rating as a strong probability.

5179. You are a very large ratepayer yourself in London, and therefore largely interested in the question; can you tell the Committee with regard to that which is of vital importance to the ratepayers, how long this question of the Thames Embankment and the main drainage had been canvassed before the public, and brought under the notice of owners of property in London; for how many years had it been canvassed before it assumed the shape of an Act, which enforced the making of those improvements?—I cannot tell you that.

5180. Does not it come to this, that you have been relying more upon the rapid increase of value of property in the City, and disregarded all the charges that come upon it; you have relied upon such a rapid rise in the value as to put the new charges very much out of sight?—I am very happy to say that I have not thrown aside all idea of the charges, because they have always been a prominent idea in my mind, only I say this, that it has not occurred to me that it was probable there would be any large addition to the charges; in fact, the impression on my mind would have been that the charges generally would have fallen, because, from the amount of property increasing rapidly, it would would be likely that the charges being spread over a larger amount of property, there would be a tendency to fall. This case of the poor rates which I have alluded to is something exceptional; it is not anything which has resulted out of the working of those properties themselves.

5181. Do you think that you yourself get this increased taxation which has come upon your building out of your tenants who occupy your houses?—I am sure that I have not in the first instance.

5182. Then you have made a bad bargain, as far as those leases go?—As far as those rates go, I have lost by them, but I cannot help it.

5183. Having made a bad bargain, you would be glad to put some of that burthen upon the landowner?—Not at all; I would bear it as quietly as possible, but I have not got to the full extent of it yet. I say that as it is, it has been a constant rise, and there is a tendency to higher rates.

5184. I suppose there is no doubt that this change in the poor-law has hit you in the City?—Exceedingly severely.

5185. And pro tanto, it has helped those outside the City?—Yes; or rather it will help them. It has not helped them much yet.

5186. Would you reverse the legislation, and say that the gain to those outside the City should be divided between the two contracting parties, that there should be a return to the freeholder, for we have evidently got this, that you wish to divide the loss; and if there is a loss here and a gain there, did not you think that the gain ought to be divided?—Supposing that I was a leaseholder in Bethnal Green, and that on my land the poor rates were 4 s. in the pound, of course in hiring the property I should have taken that 4 s. into consideration, and calculated it in the rent. As far as the poor rate is concerned, I should have 16 s. in the pound clear rent, subject to other deductions. Then the new law comes in, which throws those rates into hodge-podge, and the result would be that, instead of 4 s. being deducted, 1 s. 6 d., which is the present calculation, would be deducted, and therefore I should have 18 s. 6 d. in the pound, instead of 16 s.

5187. Ought not the landowner to get 9 d.?—If you mean this, that the tenant should be called upon to pay his landlord during the existing contract half the gain in rent, I imagine there would be a considerable confusion in it. Still, if you looked at the question with strict fairness, I cannot say that it would not be so; but it is absolutely impossible that there can be strict fairness in those things. All that you can do is to have that which is approximate. Take for instance the alteration in Holborn, Middle Row, being taken away, the ratepayers paid for the whole of the improvement. The owner at the back, whose house faced the alley, now faces the main street, and he gets perhaps almost as much advantage from those houses being taken away as the people in front lost. The settlement of all those things is so complicated that you are obliged to do acts which are not thoroughly fair.

5187*. But it is no more complicated, is it, with regard to the return to be made to the landlord than it is with regard to the charge which you propose to make upon him?—If the trouble of carrying it out was not greater than the advantage, I can say nothing against the fairness of it certainly.

5188. Sir Massey Lopes.] With regard to the house tax, you told us just now that in the case of the large houses in which you are interested in the City, which are used for offices, those houses have escaped the house tax?—All, excepting the small houses.

5189. I am speaking of those that are used for offices, where the house is large?—That is so.

5190. Does not it appear to you that it is rather a hardship, as regards shops, that they should be charged with the house tax, and that offices should evade that tax?—I think the idea of the house tax is, that it is a tax charged according to the kind of house in which a man resides; as far as I have any recollection of the general principle of the house duty, it is that the house duty is a fair test of a man's means, and it is with reference to his place of residence, not to his place of trade. No warehouse is taxed; no brewery is taxed; and, in fact, no place of business is taxed, excepting there happens to be somebody residing there.

5191. You say that a house should be rated to the house tax in proportion to the means of the person who occupies that house; surely you would admit that many persons who occupy those offices are far better off than other people who are living in houses in the country; we will say that are worth 20 l. a year, the sum at which people are liable to pay the house tax?—The tendency of legislation has been the other way, because last year there was a fresh exemption passed by Act of Parliament.

5192. Chairman.] I understand that whoever has those offices would live in a house somewhere?—Yes, and he consequently pays house duty.

5193. Sir Massey Lopes.] He pays upon his own house, but he is getting his means and his income from those offices?—And paying his income tax upon his earnings there.

5194. Still he evades the house tax?—He does not pay the house tax.

5195. I think I may further ask are not those gentlemen who live in those offices more concerned with personal property than with real; they are, perhaps, interested in railways, shipping, and other matters?—I have no special knowledge upon that subject.

5197. If the owner paid one-half the rates, as is proposed, the occupier would surely have to pay a proportionate increase of rent, according to your definition?—Unquestionably, both parties being free, the tendency on the part of the owner of the property would be to try and get so much more rent; and there are a certain number of cases where the owner would, beyond all question, be able to throw upon the occupier, whatever extra charge was put upon him. A considerable proportion of the land in the country is let by favour by the owner to the occupier; that is to say, the owner takes less than the rental value of the property, and I believe that that applies to a great deal of property. One case I heard of where a large owner considered that the church rate ought to be paid; and he sent round a circular to all his tenants to say that he should pay the church rate whether the tenants liked it or not; and if a tenant did not choose to pay it, he should make his rent so much dearer next year. He exercised the power that he had, and I have no doubt that owners in the country generally would be able to exercise that power to a very considerable extent.

Mr. J. Innes.

5198. If a law was passed to-morrow for a division of the rates between the owner and the occupier, you, in your own instance, and the company in which you are interested, would immediately put some additional rent, would you not, in substitution of those rates, upon your tenants?—No; my rental is regulated by the demand that there is for the property, regardless of the cost.

5199. You would desire to put upon the occupier this increase of rates which is now about to be placed upon you as owner?—I do not think it would enter into my calculation. I have certain property to let, and I should try and get as much rent for that property as I could, whether or not it only recouped me or gave me a large profit.

5200. Did I rightly understand you to say, that if the poor rates were put upon you to-morrow, as an owner, you should not think it necessary to place any additional rent upon your tenants?—No, I do not let by favour; I let in the City at the best rent I can get from a good tenant; I let at rack rents; I do not mean to say that I let at a rent which is really so extravagant that I am sure to get a bad tenant; but at the best rent I can command under the circumstances, regardless of the question whether it gives me a good profit or no profit at all.

5201. Do not you think that if any proposal of this kind was carried out, it would be necessary to disturb existing arrangements between landlords and tenants?—It of itself would be a disturbance, but I do not see what necessity there would be for anything but the disturbance itself in saying that the tenant was entitled to deduct so-and-so from the landlord.

5202. You stated just now, did you not, that you thought many properties were let by favour?—Yes, but that applies more to the country than London.

5203. In many of those properties the arrangements have not been disturbed, have they, for a series of years?—Yes, that is so.

5204. Do not you think that it is very probable that if any alteration of the present arrangement were made, which this would be, the landlord would most probably say, "We will have a revaluation of the estate"?—I think it might lead to that in some cases.

5205. And do not you think that that would be the tendency?—Yes.

5206. If that would be the tendency, do you think that it would be of any advantage to the tenant; would it not rather tend not only to additional rent in proportion to the rates put on, but an addition of rent probably for the value of the estate?—I think not; I think, as in the instance that I gave with regard to the church rate, that the landlord, who perhaps was conferring a favour upon his tenants, would say, "I have let it them for so-and-so, but now there is an additional burden cast upon me, I shall tell my tenants that I think I may fairly ask them to pay me something more in consequence of that."

5207. Then you do not think that there would be any pecuniary benefit to the occupier if the rates were divided?—I do think that there would be. I think, in the first instance, there would be an important benefit to the occupier if the rates were apportioned. The exceptional case which you were putting was this: where the landlord lets his property on favourable terms to his tenants, giving them, in fact, the property at less than its value as a matter of kindness, and then being charged with something extra, saying to the tenants, "I shall add it to the amount that I have taken from you;" that is an exceptional case; but supposing a law were to be passed that a tenant was entitled to deduct from his landlord a certain portion of the rates, that would unquestionably be in his favour in the first instance, and then when there came to be a re-adjustment of the arrangements, very likely the landlord would get back a certain portion of it, and alter his position.

5208. Then you do not think that there would be any permanent benefit to the occupier?—I am far from saying that I think that probably there would be no permanent benefit.

5209. Do you think that a division of the rates between the owner and the occupier would tend to reduce the rates at all, as there would be greater economy in the administration, for instance?—If it brought in better managers, I should say that it would tend in the long run to a reduction in the rates, or to the property being made better than it was before, and conducted in a better way.

5210. Did I rightly understand you to say just now that, even if the rates were divided, you did not think the owners would attend?—Pardon me; I thought they would attend to a certain extent, but I do not think it would absolutely secure the attendance of the owners.

5211. You were saying just now as to property, which you particularised, the ground rent was 2,400 l., do you see any reason why that ground rent should not be charged with rates?—As I said before, my thoughts went in the direction of an improvement rate.

5212. But speaking generally, do you see any reason why ground rents should not be charged with the rate, or why they should be exempt either in existing contracts or fresh contracts?—I should say that in existing contracts there is no reason why ground rent should have a reduction made from it, or should be disturbed, excepting there was the probability that the owner, the person who received the ground rent, would derive some benefit directly or indirectly through improvements carried out by means of those rules. The only exception to this is, in the extraordinary change of late as to poor rates.

5213. Do you see the same objection with regard to future arrangements?—I see no objection in point of equity in the future, because both parties are free in entering upon their contract to make their arrangements according to terms which both of them know.

5214. You instance a case where the poor rate was only 6 d. in the pound a short time ago, and now it is 1 s. 2 d.; would not it be fair and just with that increased poor rate that the ground landlord should pay some portion of it?—I think this, that it would be fair that he should pay something under the circumstances, because this rate which is raised is not raised for the purpose of supporting the property, but it is a charge which attaches as much to the ownership of the property as it does to the occupancy of the property; it is a charge which has arisen since, and which was not contemplated at the time when the lease was entered into.

5215. Then you see no objection to the ground landlord

ndlord paying his share of any new imposions?—I see no objection to it in principle.

5216. You mentioned just now property in the ity where there had been a vast increase in the mount of assessment; has the intrinsic value of hat property so much increased since the Union ssessment Act of 1862?—I do not quite follow ie meaning of the word intrinsic as applied to alue; my idea of value is, that it is always lative.

5217. We will take the year 1861 and the year
862; you had a vast increase in the year 1862
o the extent of the difference between 17,000 l.
nd 50,000 l.; had the value of that property inurred so much between those two years?—The alue of property had not increased to that ex-
nt. The increase took place later.

5218. In 1864 it was 17,000 l.?—Yes, in round umbers it was 17,000 l. at the time those tithes ere commuted in 1864; and I think by the year
867, or at any rate soon afterwards, if not ven before, it was 50,000 l. in round numbers.

5219. Chairman.] Had there been a re-assess-ent in 1864?—No, it was the old assessment.

5220. Sir Massey Lopes.] How had that proerty increased so much in value between those wo years?—The increase of rent in the City
vhich took place from the year 1860 to the year 865 was something very large indeed; unrecedented almost, I should suppose, in the istory of any house property in the world.

5221. Supposing this arrangement took place
f a division of rates, the owner you say at present ays all the rates?—The occupier is at present ssessed for all the rates.

5222. But the owner pays them?—I did not nean to say so.

5223. I understood you to say that at present he owner paid the rates?—No, the occupier.

5224. I know that the owner does not pay hem directly, but indirectly I understood you
o say the owner paid the rates; that is to say, ot so much less rent?—I do not mean to say hat the owner would not have got a larger rent or his property if there had been no rates atached to the property. I think that is exceedngly likely, but I should be far from saying that he owner paid all the rates.

5225. Are you speaking now of the property
n which you have an interest?—No, I am lookng at it generally; the property in which I am nterested is regulated by the same rules as other roperty.

5226. The Committee have had evidence from everal witnesses, that the owner pays all the ates; you disagree with them, do you?—I have ad no evidence that has satisfied my mind of hat. Any rate special to certain property falls lmost entirely on the owner. Such, for instance, s in the land tax, where the Roman Catholic used to be charged twice as much as others.

Mr. J. Innes.

5227. Mr. Rathbone.] I think you stated, that notwithstanding any contract between the owner of the property, and those beneficially interested in the subsequent rent, that is to say, the occupiers, the State has the right to levy fresh taxation on that property?—I presume it has the right; and it has exercised it in the case of the income tax.

5228. That is to say, in cases of ground rent, such as we have been speaking of, and the stipulation between the owner and the occupier, there were three parties interested; the State having the power to levy taxation, the owner and the occupier, and the owner and the occupier had no right to contract the payment, or any part of it, out of the power of taxation?—I fancy they had not.

5229. You said that you regulated your rent, not on any footing of calculation as to what you paid, but what you could get; I suppose the amount that you can get is checked to a certain extent by the price at which other owners of property convert their property into offices and warehouses, and thereby come into competition with you?—It is; the only way in which it is checked, is by the offers that are made for property; there are various house agents employed to let property, and you take the best rent you can get, as those house agents bring offers in for the property.

5230. If you ask very high rents for property, people will go a little further off, and fresh builders will come and build fresh offices, and keep you in check?—Yes, but less in the City than anywhere else. Its special locality is a great point with an occupier.

5231. But even there that question does take place?—Yes; unquestionably there is no exception to the general rule.

5232. Mr. Fielden.] Is not this a fact, that a man who makes a profit by keeping a shop has to pay house duty, but a man who makes a profit by keeping an office, is exempt from house duty?—Not if the shopkeeper does not reside at his place; I have various shops which I have let where the shopkeeper does not reside. I think that in the majority of cases where I let shops, the shopkeeper does not reside, and is not liable.

5233. Mr. Rathbone.] Do you not consider that the house tax is a tax upon expenditure, whereas a tax upon warehouses and offices would be a tax upon property?—I take it the idea is that house tax is a tax upon a man for his place of residence, taking that as one of the easiest means of raising the necessary taxes.

5234. Colonel Brise.] Was not the house tax instead of the old window tax?—That was before I recollect.

Mr. JOHN MAY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. May.

5235. Chairman.] YOU are Clerk to the Guardians of the Macclesfield Union in the county of Cheshire, are you not?—Yes.

5236. Are you also acquainted at all with the municipal affairs of that town?—Yes.

5237. Have you held any office in connection with the municipality?—I am clerk to the local board of health, and my partner is the town clerk of the Borough of Macclesfield.

5238. That has given you an acquaintance with municipal affairs as well as poor-law matters?—Yes.

5239. Will you state to the Committee whether Macclesfield has a town council?—Yes.

Mr. J. May.

10 May 1870.

5240. And also a local board of health?—Yes.

5241. Are the local board of health and the town council the same body?—Yes; the same body.

5242. But with different functions?—Yes.

5243. And different officers?—Yes.

5244. And a different audit?—No: the same audit.

5245. Have they two clerks?—I am clerk to the local board, and my partner is the town clerk; my partner is probably the official clerk to the board, and I do the duty.

5246. Do they meet on different days?—Yes.

5247. Do they keep different sets of accounts?—Yes.

5248. Do they have different balances in the bank?—Yes.

5249. And different sets of books?—Yes.

5250. Will you describe the system of audit in both cases?—One auditor is appointed by the mayor, and two auditors are appointed by the municipal electors.

5251. Is that under a local Act?—Under the Municipal Act.

5252. And do those auditors audit the borough accounts?—Yes; the three auditors audit the borough accounts, and the accounts of the local board of health.

5253. But they do not audit the accounts of the board of health under the same Act of Parliament, do they?—Not under the same Act of Parliament.

5254. I mean do they have separate appointments?—There is no separate appointment; I believe in the Improvement Act which incorporates the Public Health Act, there is no provision separately from what is contained in the Public Health Act for a separate audit, but the borough auditors have always audited the local board of health accounts.

5255. Are they ratepayers?—Yes, they are ratepayers

5256. Do you see any reason why the local board of health should not be amalgamated with the town council; do you see any advantage in their being preserved as two separate bodies?—I do not think there is any advantage; they are one and the same body now, but as a matter of convenience they meet separately, because their functions are rather different.

5257. But they would have no statutory power to act as one body by Act of Parliament, they must keep their accounts separate?—They must do so.

5258. They raise their funds, I presume, in a different shape?—The borough rate which is levied by the council is paid out of the poor-rates in the township of Macclesfield, and in the two adjoining townships, parts of which are in the borough; the borough rate is collected with the poor rate by the same officer; the local board of health rates are collected by a separate collector and at different times, the basis being the same, the poor rate.

5259. The board of health levy a general district rate, I presume?—Yes, they levy a general district rate and a lighting rate.

5260. Are those two rates kept separate?—The rates are kept separate, but they are collected at the same time by one officer.

5261. In the demand note are the two separate?—Yes, they are separate.

5262. Are they kept in different accounts?—There are separate ledger accounts kept of the two rates. The general district rate is a rate of 1 s. 6 d. in the pound; the lighting rate is a rate of 6 d. in the pound, and they are kept distinct in the ledger.

5263. Is the general district rate in your town levied like all rates under the Public Health Act, with an exemption of 75 per cent. in favour of market gardens, land, railways, and so forth?—Yes, that is so.

5264. On the other hand the borough rate is levied with the poor rate?—Yes.

5265. And in the poor rate this exemption does not take place?—No.

5266. Accordingly the borough rate is levied upon all alike, whereas the general district rate is levied in a different proportion?—Yes.

5267. The purposes of the two rates of course not being identical, but being similar for the general advantage of the town?—Yes.

5268. Will you state what administrative local functions are exercised by the town council and what by the local board of health respectively, omitting the judicial part?—The town council attend to all matters of police, and they appoint various committees, finance committees, general purpose committees, and various other committees; and the local board have the management of the gas works; they levy rates for the maintenance of the roads, and for all sanitary purposes; and they administer those funds. The corporation also levies a water rate, and has the management of the water works.

5269. Will you state what the rates are which are levied in the borough?—The poor rate in Macclesfield amounts to 4 s. in the pound; that includes the borough rate.

5270. How much is the borough rate out of that 4 s.?—The borough rate would be 2 s. 2 d. in the pound probably.

5271. What other rates are included in and paid out of the poor rate?—A cemetery rate is now paid out of the poor rate.

5272. Is that specified in the demand note as a separate charge?—Yes, that is specified.

5273. Is the borough rate specified in the demand note?—It is in the two out townships, and also in Macclesfield, because it is there paid out of the poor rate.

5274. But where it is paid out of the poor rate, it is not, I understand, the poor rate simply but so much falls upon the cemetery rate, and so much upon the borough rate?—No, I believe it is not.

5275. The cemetery rate, I understand, is paid out of the poor rate?—Yes; that is paid out of the poor rate in Macclesfield itself, and that is specified.

5276. And is the cemetery rate separately levied in those two out townships of which you have spoken?—The cemetery rate is levied, and there it is specified.

5277. And there the borough rate is also levied separately?—Yes, separately levied, but collected at the same time by the same officer.

5278. What is the reason why it is collected separately?—Because only parts of the two townships are within the borough.

5279. That is to say, the borough boundary cuts the township in two?—Yes.

5280. Is not that an inconvenient arrangement in many ways?—It is inconvenient in some respects respects, but it would scarcely do to extend it to the agricultural parts of those townships.

5281. Are the townships so large that the portion which is kept within the borough radius might be formed into a parish by itself?—Yes, in one instance, but not in the other.

5282. Is there any confusion as regards the county rate in those townships which are partly in and partly out of the borough?—None whatever.

5283. How are they levied; does the part outside the borough pay county rates?—Yes.

5284. And the part inside the borough pays none?—No, it pays county rate, exclusive of police.

5285. And the part outside the borough pays no borough rates, and the part inside does pay borough rate?—Yes.

5286. Then the distinction between those two out-townships is that half of it belongs for certain purposes to the county, and the other half belongs for certain purposes to the borough?—Yes.

5287. But both alike are in the union of Macclesfield, and they form one unit for the general purposes of the township?—Yes, they do.

5288. Then in the township which lies partly outside the borough the overseers collect the poor rate separately; that is to say, they would levy the county rate from those who are liable to county rate outside the borough, and they would levy the borough rate from those inside both separately?—Yes, that is the practice.

5289. Does the borough of Macclesfield contribute at all to the county lunatic asylum, or has it a lunatic asylum itself?—It has not; it contributes to the county asylum.

5290. How is the fund levied for that purpose?—That is also paid out of the poors rate; the precept comes to the guardians of the poor with the amount apportioned against the township of Macclesfield, and that portion is charged to Macclesfield in the union ledger.

5291. Will you tell the Committee how you deal with the part which is outside the borough; is the portion for the lunatic asylum kept separate from the county rate?—No, the charge is made upon the whole township, and in like manner is debited in the union ledger against the whole township, whether within the borough or without.

5292. There are 41 townships, are there not?—Yes.

5293. In the case of those townships that are outside the borough, the county rate is levied in the gross, I presume?—Yes.

5294. What is the rate in the pound?—The county rate would be from 3 d. to 4 d. in the pound in Cheshire.

5295. Does the connty rate vary over the different townships?—No, except with regard to the hundred rate; the bridges, of course, affect the apportionment of the county charges.

5296. We have had evidence that in Lancashire the county rate varies very much in different townships included in the union, according as they were liable to contribute to the several purposes; is that the same in Cheshire?—Yes, it is the same in Cheshire.

5297. Therefore there is not one uniform county rate of 4 d. or 3 d.; it varies all over the county, but it depends upon the number of charges to which each separate township is liable?—Yes.

5298. To go back to the asylum, what is the amount paid by the borough of Macclesfield to the county asylum?—The amount paid by the union to the county rate, which includes the asylum I can give you, but not for Macclesfield. The amount they paid during last year was 5,594 l., and in the year preceding 4,196 l.

5299. I am anxious to know how much the borough paid; would it be as much as 500 l., or 1,000 l.?—Not quite so much as 500 l., I think.

5300. As far as you are aware, has the borough had any voice in the building of the county asylum to which it contributes?—Not any, except through the county justices resident in the borough.

5301. But who would vote as county justices, and not as representatives of the borough?—Precisely so.

5302. Has there been no Act passed that gave the borough a certain right of representation at the committee which manages the lunatic asylum?—No Act has been passed that I am aware of; Bills have been brought in, a County Administration Bill has been proposed, I think, to effect that object.

5303. At all events if there has been the power, it has not been exercised?—No; and I think it would have been exercised if we had had any power. At all events I should have known of it.

5304. With regard to the water rate, how much does it amount to in Macclesfield?—The water rate is paid by the consumers, and it is fixed not with regard to the assessment, but with regard more to the consumption by the individual.

5305. Were you obliged to borrow in Macclesfield in order to build your water works?—Yes.

5306. How do you pay it; first are the rates paid by the consumers, or have you got a separate rate for repaying your debt?—The proceeds from the water, and from all other sources of income, are included in the corporation accounts, and the instalments of the principal and the interest are paid from the whole of the funds so received.

5307. You have not what you might call a water rate?—No, we have no water rate levied upon a fixed basis; a separate water rate is made and collected by a separate officer from the one who collects the general district rate.

5308. The water rate is paid, not by anybody in his capacity as a ratepayer, but as a consumer of water, and in proportion to the water which he consumes?—Yes.

5309. He pays a price for the article supplied, but he does not pay a fixed price?—No.

5310. Mr. Pell.] Do they pay by meter?—Some of the manufacturers pay by meter; but cottagers and householders do not.

5311. Chairman.] Do they pay by a rough estimate, or in what way?—They pay by a calculation as to the comparative consumption.

5312. According to the size of the house?—Yes.

5313. As regards the police, how is that paid in the borough?—The police charges in the borough really constitute the borough rate; if it were not for the cost of the police, we should require no borough rate in the borough of Macclesfield, and therefore the borough rate, which really is the charge for the police, is paid out of the poors rate.

5314. Have you no police rate separate from the borough rate?—None.

5315. As regards the proportion that is paid to the county lunatic asylum, do I understand you that that is paid out of the poor rate, or out of

Mr. J. May.
10 May 1870.

of the borough rate?—Out of the poor rate by the guardians.

5316. Before it reaches the officers of the borough; that is to say, the precept is made upon the guardians, and not upon the town council?—Just so; not upon the town council, certainly.

5317. I presume that the town council keep an account as regards this payment to the lunatic asylum?—No, they do not; the guardians keep all the accounts.

5318. I do not mean as regards the paupers sent there, but as regards the contribution to the lunatic asylum?—The guardians keep those accounts; the corporation have nothing whatever to do with them.

5319. Are the lunatics who come from the township, which is within the borough, and which is not liable to the county rate, charged for at a different rate, or are they charged the same rate as paupers from the other parts, which do contribute?—The same; there is no distinction.

5320. Is the proportion which they pay towards the maintenance of the lunatic asylum a fixed charge, or does it vary?—The cost of maintenance varies slightly, but not much; the cost of structure varies considerably; for instance, at this time, a very costly building is being erected; I think some 40,000 l. was borrowed by the county during last year, for the purpose of erecting an additional county lunatic asylum.

5321. Are you acquainted with the Parliamentary Return which is made of the county treasurers?—I have a statement of the accounts of the county treasurers.

5322. But the annual statement of the county treasurers submitted to Parliament does not, as far as I am aware, contain the amount raised by loans?—The published accounts contain those particulars, but not the Return.

5323 You seem to be acquainted more or less with the county finance in Cheshire; have you any material source of income besides the county rate?—From the River Weaver, which is a navigable river in the county, tolls are charged, and all the surplus funds are paid to the county treasurer.

5324. Will you state a little more fully to the Committee the mode in which this revenue is levied and how it is applied?—It is levied by a toll upon the goods, produce, and merchandise, conveyed along a navigable river in the county. This River Weaver was rendered, I believe, navigable many years ago by the riparian proprietors, and finally handed over to the county. There has been a very large surplus during years past, and that surplus has been paid over to the county in reduction of the county rate. The amounts paid over lately have been smaller. Last year 5,000 l. was paid over, and the year before I believe the same amount.

5325. There was a time, was there not, when it reached about 18,000 l. a year?—Yes, I have all the particulars for 10 years.

5326. Will you state what it was 10 years ago?—In 1860, 8,000 l. was paid over to the county.

5327. What is the highest amongst those years which you have before you?—The highest was in 1859—£. 21,000.

5328. What made this great reduction in the amount received in 1860, in that one year?—The construction of new docks and alterations of the river, and extensions for the purpose of accommodating coasting vessels along the river to the salt mines.

5329. It was not a reduction in tolls or in receipts, but the expenditure was so much larger?—I am not sure that the tolls have not been reduced; that I cannot speak to, but it is expenditure I think; the average payments to the county for 10 years have been 11,400 l.

5330. Then you have received 110,000 l. in the 10 years?—Yes.

5331. This is the only source of income which constitutes an addition to the local resources of the county of Cheshire?—Yes.

5333. In what way are the interests of the ratepayers affected; is it not through their interest in the surplus?—Yes, they are very largely interested as county ratepayers.

5334. But as borough ratepayers, how are they interested?—They are interested, because they contribute towards part of the expenses of the county; they do not contribute to the police of the county; they pay all county expenses, except the police; they have their own borough police, and, therefore, they do not contribute to the county police; but in all other charges they contribute to the county.

5335. The borough does not, I presume, contribute to the county bridges?—No, the borough does not contribute to the bridges; I believe there is an exemption, which peculiarly applies to Macclesfield.

5336. Have you got a separate quarter sessions?—No, we have no separate quarter sessions.

5337. Do you contribute to the coroners, the weights and measures, and the militia?—Yes, and the maintenance of prisoners in the gaols.

5338. But, at the same time, the police is under the charge of the town council?—Yes.

5339. Therefore, the magistrates have not got the management of the police in the borough?—No.

5340. Has any inconvenience arisen from that separation of jurisdiction, that the gaol is under one authority, and the police under another authority?—I am not aware of any positive inconvenience; I have always believed that there would have been a great advantage in having them under one central authority; I know that the county police are very admirably managed under one officer throughout the whole county, and I think that there would be an advantage in combining all under one superintending authority.

5341. Would there be objections on the part of the Borough of Macclesfield to part with the control of the police?—Yes, strong objections; they have refused hitherto to receive the usual amount of payment paid by the Government in order to have the appointment and inspection and control within their own body.

5342. To what extent do the ratepayers suffer in consequence as a mere matter of pounds, shillings, and pence?—Not to any appreciable amount.

5343. What

5343. What would be one-fourth of the cost of the police?—The police cost last year 1,140 l., and one-fourth of that would be 285 l.

5344. If Macclesfield had a quarter sessions of its own they would be relieved from contribution to various of those county purposes?—Yes.

5345. Can you state to the Committee the law and practice as regards what boroughs have separate quarter sessions, and what have not?—We have not any boroughs in Cheshire, I believe, that have separate quarter sessions.

5346. How has that arisen?—I think it would be in the first instance on the question of expense. It might have been deemed that it would have been more costly, but I am not aware of any reason.

5347. Have the county magistrates authority within the borough?—They have authority to levy county rates within the borough.

5348. Have they authority, and do they exercise their jurisdiction as county magistrates within the borough?—No, not within the borough; we have a separate commission of the peace for the borough, and they exercise their functions in the borough; the county police are confined to the county, beyond the limits of the borough.

5349. How is it as regards gaols, and prosecutions at quarter sessions?—They are a county matter, entirely.

5350. In such a large borough as Macclesfield, does not that lead to some inconvenience?—No doubt it leads to some inconvenience, but I cannot point out any.

5351. Where are the quarter sessions held?—At Knutsford, one of the central small towns in the county.

5352. Do you think that the possession of those tolls of the River Weaver has at all entered into the calculation of the ratepayers of Macclesfield, with regard to their remaining with the county; they would otherwise lose their share in those tolls, would they not?—Yes.

5353. Do you think that that may have been one of the reasons why they have remained contributory to the county rate, and have not pressed to have a quarter sessions of their own?—I am pretty sure that never entered into the calculation at all.

5354. Are the tolls levied upon the River Weaver subject to audit?—I cannot tell you what is the audit; the accounts are audited, I believe, by three of the justices.

5355. Is it a professional audit?—No.

5356. What are the gross receipts and outgoings from the tolls?—

5357. The tolls are administered by the board that you have mentioned, but those who pay the tolls have no kind of representation, have they?—I am not aware that they have any representation, unless they happen to be owners of barges or vessels. I have got the expenditure of each year, which of course would be relatively the receipts.

5358. What is the expenditure?—The average expenditure for the 10 years was 32,139 l. I have the amount of the general repairs, the cost of new works, the amount paid to the county, and the total; and the total expenditure for the 10 years ending 1869, appears to have been 32,139 l. annually; that would represent, I conceive, the receipts.

5359. Have you adopted the Compounding Acts in the borough of Macclesfield?—Yes, they have recently adopted the Assessed Rates Act of last Session: before that they had the compounding.

5360. Have they adopted section 4, the section which makes it universal or compulsory upon the owners?—They have adopted the one that makes it compulsory upon the owners.

5361. That applies to the poor rate, and through the poor rate to the borough rate, does it not?—Yes.

5362. But their arrangement for the general district rate is different, I presume?—It does not apply to that, but the owners pay upon all properties of 10 l., and under, to the general district rate.

5363. The limit in the Assessed Rates Act being 8 l.?—Yes.

5364. Therefore the line of composition is different as regards the two rates?—Yes.

5365. And the allowances made are different in the two rates?—Yes.

5366. Therefore the owner of the same house would find himself taxed in a different way with different deductions for those two different rates?—Yes, in the same township for those different rates.

5367. Have you considered how far it would be desirable to consolidate the rates?—Yes; I think it would be very desirable, and effect a very great saving and be highly satisfactory in every possible manner.

5368. It would get rid of this anomaly of the owners paying in some cases, and the occupiers paying in others, in the case of compounding?—Yes, and the arrangement would be uniform.

5369. I presume you have this case in the borough of Macclesfield, that there may be a house rated at 9 l. where the owner would pay the one rate, and the occupier would pay the other?—Yes.

5370. That is not a theoretical case, but an actual case?—It is an actual case, and it very frequently occurs.

5371. Will you state to the Committee what is the process in the vestry of one of those townships by which the owners come on the register for vestry purposes?—The owners have votes under the old Act in proportion to their assessment, but only in the case of their being ratepayers.

5372. Must the owners claim to vote, or are they put on by a self-acting process?—It is not necessary for them to claim their votes in the vestry; but if they vote in the election of guardians it is necessary for them to send in a claim; they are permitted to vote in vestry without sending in a prior claim, if they are occupiers.

5373. But in the case of electing guardians they must send in a claim?—Yes.

5374. Occupiers on the other hand are put on without claiming?—Yes.

5375. Therefore the owners are at a disadvantage as regards the occupiers in the election of guardians?—The owners have never voted in the election of guardians in my union, though we have very sharply contested elections

5376. Will you state to the Committee to what you attribute their not having voted?—Because they have the utmost confidence in the elected guardians.

5377. In those contested elections, they do not probably have the utmost confidence in both sides?—It is never the interest of the owners to so great an extent, as to induce them to claim to be admitted to vote.

Mr. J. May.
10 May 1870.

5378. They have got confidence in the majority of the ratepayers?—Yes, they have confidence in the majority of the guardians.

5379. That is meant to say, that while half the ratepayers have got no confidence in the other half, the owners have confidence in whichever half might win?—Yes, they have confidence in the constituted authorities that are elected.

5380. Why should they not take their share of the duty allotted to them by Act of Parliament in the same way as occupiers?—I think, if the business of the guardians had not been satisfactorily conducted, they would have done so, because they do so in very many unions, but they never have done so in the Macclesfield union.

5381. Still, as you have had contested elections, it shows that the general opinion amongst the ratepayers was not in favour of one exclusive body?—It has been more a political matter than otherwise.

5382. Then the owners have no politics?—The owners have never interfered.

5383. Do you not attribute their taking no part in the management of affairs partly to the trouble which is occasioned them by claiming their votes?—No, I do not think that has been the reason.

5384. Will you explain to the Committee the process of voting in the vestry?—The voting in vestries is by popular election, unless a poll is demanded; and if a poll is demanded, then the ratapayers vote in proportion to the amount of their rates, and the owners in the same way, if they are ratepayers. In like manner, in the election of guardians, a ratepayer who is assessed at under 50 l. is entitled to one vote, and above 50 l. to two votes, and so on, to 250 l.

5385. The owners have no plurality voting in vestry, have they?—They have not.

5386. The plurality of voting is in the election of guardians, but it is not in the voting in vestry?—No.

5387. On what matters have the vestry jurisdiction in one of those townships; have they the election of overseers?—Yes.

5388. What other functions do they perform?—Very few, indeed; no functions of any use whatever.

5389. There are three elections, I presume, besides the Parliamentary election that would occur in any township in the borough of Macclesfield; there is the municipal election, there is the election for guardians, and there are the proceedings in the vestry in the election of overseers?—Yes.

5390. All those three elections being conducted on what may be called a different register?—Yes; and then there is the election for the borough members also on a different register.

5391. So that, practically speaking, you have four registers?—Yes.

5392. The conditions of voting being different in each case?—Yes.

5393. And the owners having a different position in all?—Yes.

5394. In the vestry an owner can vote in the same way as an occupier with a single vote?—Yes.

5395. In the election of guardians he has plurality of voting, but he must claim before he can vote?—Yes.

5396. In the election of borough Members, he has no position at all, and in the election of the town council he has no position?—He has no position. And there is another register of voters for the election of members of the town council, and a repetition of expenses in the preparation of those registers.

5397. Will you state who prepares those three registers, or in fact is there any register at all for the purposes of the vestry?—None, except the rate book.

5398. Is not the rate book also the register for the purpose of the election of guardians?—Yes.

5399. Will you explain how it is that the owner has to claim in the one case and not to claim in the other?—From the state of the law, the owner is entitled to vote if he happens to be a ratepayer; if he is an occupier, both in the vestry and for the election of guardians.

5400. You have stated that the owner has a vote in the vestry whether he claimed or not; but he must send in his claim in the case of the election of guardians; will you explain if he is on the register, which is the rate book, why he is obliged to send in his claim at all?—His name appears on the rate book as an owner.

5401. In the case of the election of guardians, does not that give him a claim without having to send in a claim?—No, it does not; not in the election of guardians.

5402. What is the process that he has to go through?—He must send in a written claim before a certain day in the year. I think it is the first of February.

5403. What is done with this claim?—The claim is received by the overseers, and a register of owners made out.

5404. Has that ever been done?—Never, in my union.

5405. Not a single owner has sent in a claim?—Never since its formation in 1836.

5406. Mr. Smith.] Do you suppose that any owner is aware of his right to claim?—Yes, it is made known by the fact of its appearing on the voting papers when there is a contested election, so many votes as owner, and so many as occupier, and there is a place for the signature at the foot of the voting paper for the ratepayer if he votes in respect to his position as a ratepayer, and there is another place for the signature of the owner if he votes as owner; therefore it makes it a matter of general notoriety where there are contested elections for guardians.

5407. Chairman.] When there is a poll in the case of the vestry, must not the owner claim his right to vote, although an owner?—The owner is not entitled to vote in vestry unless he be a ratepayer.

5408. For all practical purposes the Committee may assume that owners take no interest in Macclesfield, either in the election of guardians or in vestry meetings, or in any other way?—In vestry meetings they do if they are entitled to vote, and I think they are, because all parties attend there if there are overseers to be appointed, and that is the most important part of the duty now, except the preparation of some voting lists; the owners may attend if they are entitled to vote, and I think they do.

5409. They have not the same confidence in the ratepayers, in the case of the vestry, that they have in the election of the union guardians?—There are always two parties, and the object is to appoint either one or the other; the owners on one side support their friends and the owners on on the other theirs, and that is the reason probably for the controversies in the vestries.

5410. Surely that same remark would hold good in the election of guardians; do you not think that the great difficulty in claiming to vote is really what constitutes the difference in the two cases?—I do not think that has been the cause with us. I think the claim ought to be removed; that an owner ought to have the same opportunity as an occupier; and that it would be a barrier in many instances if the owner were put to the trouble of sending in a written claim at a fixed time.

5411. In the municipal affairs there is no representation of the owners at all, is there?—None.

5412. Where the borough rate is compounded for it is paid by the owner, is it not?—Yes.

5413. In that portion of the Union where composition has been adopted, it is paid by the owner?—Yes.

5414. By the Small Tenements Act the owner has thereby entered into the rights of the occupier?—Yes.

5415. Do they exercise those rights?—Yes.

5416. On what occasions?—I do not remember; it was rather to the exclusion of the occupier than that the owner should exercise the right which the occupier possessed.

5417. But they did obtain, as a matter of fact, under the Small Tenements Act, rights which the occupier lost; did the owners of compounded property take part in parochial affairs?—Yes, because they were ratepayers then.

5418. The fact of their paying rates out of their own pocket induced them to take part in public functions which are generally discharged by occupiers?—Yes, it enabled them to do so, and they availed themselves of the opportunity.

5419. But generally speaking where they do not pay rates, whether they pay the poor rates indirectly or not, they do not care to exercise their rights?—If they do not pay rates directly or indirectly they take no interest whatever; the payment of rates is certain to ensure an interest.

5420. Then if a portion of the poor rates were placed upon the owners, do you think that that would have any effect in securing their attendance?—I do not think it would, because they pay the rates already.

5421. How do they pay the rates already?—They pay them indirectly.

5422. You stated, did you not, that whether they paid them directly or indirectly, they show no interest in the rates now?—Where they neither pay them directly nor indirectly, they show no interest.

5423. But in what case is that?—It was in reply to your question, as I understood it, that I said that.

5424. You said that they took no interest in the election of guardians?—They have not done so in my union.

5425. Though they pay the poor rates indirectly?—Yes.

5426. So that it seems that directness of payment has something to do with it?—But then they are very careful watchers of the proceedings of the board of guardians. Many of the owners are ratepayers, and therefore are entitled to vote as respects their own houses or manufactories. There would be very few owners who really have not a vote in the election of guardians, but they would not have the plurality of votes that they would have as owners.

5427. Do you find that the large occupiers utilize their plurality votes?—Yes, in the election of guardians they do.

5428. As clerk to the board of guardians you may be able to state to the Committee what is your experience of the attendance of ex-officio members?—Ex-officio guardians in our union very rarely attend in large numbers. They only attend on very special occasions to support the acting and more intelligent part of the board. Their influence is very useful on special occasions, but they do not frequent the board meetings, at least not in my union.

5429. What would be the proportion of ex-officio members to elected members in your union?—We have, I think, 50 or 60 elected guardians, and 14 or 15 ex-officio guardians. That would be about the proportion, I think.

5430. Has the question of county administration occupied your attention at all?—Yes.

5431. Has there been any feeling with regard to the non-representation of county ratepayers in the affairs of the county?—A very strong one. We have petitioned Parliament frequently in favour of measures which would admit of the representation of ratepayers or members of boards of guardians.

5432. Is that because they pay rates without having any share in their administration?—That is one reason; and they believe that the introduction of the ratepaying element might be useful in the deliberations upon the expenditure of the county. Although the county funds in Cheshire are administered very satisfactorily, yet I am sure, from my observation, that if members of the boards of guardians and perhaps highway boards, or other ratepayers, were to join the county boards, it would be most useful and advantageous in very many respects.

5433. But there is no allegation, is there, of the funds administered by the justices having been extravagantly administered?—Not extravagantly administered; there is a feeling that more economy would be produced if the ratepayers had a voice in the expenditure of the larger sums, and of the smaller sums also.

5434. Would the ratepayers be content if the county rate were put upon the owners, and to have the administration left with the owners?—No, I do not think they would.

5435. Why not?—Excessive expenditure would be kept down by introducing the ratepayers, and excessive expenditure is always baneful as an example.

5436. You mean that possibly the boards of guardians might take advantage of the example of seeing the large expenditure under the county rate under the auspices of the owners or justices, and that they might become more extravagant themselves?—One large expenditure always begets another, as far as my observation goes; at least it has a tendency to do so.

5437. As regards the arrangements for highways; in your county have highway boards been established generally or not?—Yes, throughout the county; I am clerk to the highway board for my division.

5438. Is the constitution of the highway boards satisfactory, as far as your judgment goes?—I think so.

5439. What is the influence of the ratepayers upon

Mr. J. May.

10 May 1870.

upon the highway boards?—They elect the way-wardens at their vestry meetings, that is all.

5440. Do they take an interest in those elections?—Not a large interest.

5441. How does the borough of Macclesfield stand as regards the highway rate?—There is no separate highway rate levied in the borough of Macclesfield; the cost of maintaining the roads in the borough is paid out of the general district rate.

5442. The area of the local board of health, I presume, is the same as the area of the borough?—Yes.

5443. Beyond that area in the townships which are partly in and partly out of the borough, what is their position as regards their contribution to the highway rate?—The amount outside the borough would be smaller; since the introduction of the Highway Act into my division the highway rates have been less, and therefore, in those portions of the townships which are outside the borough of Macclesfield, our highway rates are less than they formerly were, and less than they are in the borough of Macclesfield.

5444. I think you say that in the borough of Macclesfield the highway rates are paid out of the general district rate; is there a separate account kept for that?—No; it is one of the items included in the general district rate; the improvement and the repair of roads.

5445. The general district rate, and the highway rate, would be levied in a portion of one of the townships, through which the line of the borough runs?—Yes.

5446. Who levies the highway rates?—The way-wardens issue a precept upon the overseers; the highway rate now is paid out of the poor's rate; I believe that the extinction of the collection of highway rates in the highway districts, and the payment of the amount out of the poor rate, has been very beneficial, and a great saving.

5447. It apparently runs up the amount paid out of the poor rate, but it is practically an improvement?—Yes.

5448. Is there any compounding for the highway rate, if the whole of it is paid out of the poor rate?—Yes, in the townships where they adopt the Assessed Rates Act, but the Act is not adopted in any townships in which the highway district exists.

5449. Your highway rate adds another element of confusion in levying the poor rate, that the overseers of one township would levy the highway rate in one part of it, and not in another?—Yes.

5450. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you find in your district that the chairman and the vice-chairman of the board of guardians are generally one ex officio and the other a ratepayer?—Not in my union.

5451. Is it so with regard to the highway board?—No, it is not.

5452. In my neighbourhood, it has been laid down as a rule, that the chairman of each should be an ex officio, and the vice-chairman as representing the ratepayers, should be an occupier; that is not the case in your union, you say?—That has not been the practice in my district since the formation of the district.

5453. I think you said that the local board of health accounts are not regularly audited?—They are regularly audited, but not by professional auditors.

5454. They are simply audited by members of the same body from the same board?—No, they are ratepayers, but not two members of the local board.

5455. But still they are the parties who are interested?—Yes.

5456. Do not you think it would be advisable that some professional gentleman should audit those accounts rather than anyone who is really interested in the expenditure?—I think that would be a very wise proposal; and the council of the borough of Macclesfield have recently resolved that it is expedient to employ professional auditors, and they are intending to do so; I think it very desirable that all those public accounts should be audited as the Poor Law accounts are now audited.

5457. Do you know whether, or not, those local board accounts are sent up regularly to the local board office in London every year?—They are sent from my town, and I think they are sent from all the districts.

5458. They ought to be; but do you think they are regularly sent up?—I should think they are sent pretty regularly.

5459. Mr. Pell.] Then a portion of the tolls upon the navigation of the River Weaver go, as I understand you, in aid of the county rate?—Yes; the surplus does.

5460. Are those tolls levied upon all vessels going up the river?—Yes.

5461. So that it is a direct contribution from shipping property in aid of a charge which is generally levied upon real property?—Yes.

5462. Do you know of any other instance of the same nature?—No, I do not; it is the only instance I know.

5463. Is this the result of special local legislation?—Yes.

5464. How old is it; has it been the result of legislation during this century?—I should think it is a century ago, or it may be more. The river was first made navigable by private individuals, chiefly county magistrates and owners of property, and after they were reimbursed the cost of rendering it navigable, there appeared to be a surplus, and they gave it over to the county, and the county has had the charge of it and of the surplus funds ever since.

5465. Does this arrangement create dissatisfaction amongst the owners of vessels?—I do not think it does; they pay no more tolls than they would pay if they traversed a canal, or any other river.

5466. Still I suppose the primary object of a navigation toll is to render the river, or keep the river fit for the use of the vessels that come up it?—No doubt; and very large sums have been expended, and expended in an enlightened manner for the deepening and widening, and the improvement of the river, which has improved one important branch of trade in the county, the salt trade.

5467. It would not be a very unusual application of the surplus, would it, to apply it to a reduction of the tolls?—I have no doubt that the tolls have been reduced from time to time, and they are within limits that are not complained of, I believe.

5468. You say that you have introduced some ratepayers into the board who administer those tolls; I presume that those ratepayers are not such unselfish people that the introduction of that element would not tend to applying the surplus lus of the tolls in reduction of the county rate? —No, I think they would take the view that ll commercial men would; they would have he tolls reduced to a fair minimum; but what hey would also do would be to take care that he expenditure was well looked after; and I now that there has been one advantage in this espect. The trustees were not in the habit of etting some of their large works by contract, or y competition, but they merely had them done hrough their own officers, but now that species of ompetition has been introduced very beneficially, nd therefore that is one advantage of the intro- luction of the ratepaying element.

5469. It really comes to this, in the case of the River Weaver, that you have an income of about 32,000 l., or rather you said there was an expenditure of 32,000 l., and out of that you take more han one-third in reduction of the county rate?—We have done so.

5470. And although that is an unusual thing, as far as your experience goes, yet it gives satisfaction in Cheshire?—It gives satisfaction, and it is a fortunate thing that they have had it, because, as you are aware, the cattle plague rate in Cheshire has been an infliction which has not rested in the same degree upon any other county in the kingdom. They have a charge there of 270,000 l., and this charge extends over 30 years, whereas all other counties liquidated their claims in one year.

5471. Mr. Wheelhouse.] Is there any representation from your borough with reference to the care of lunatics from your borough at the county asylum board?—There is no representation, but the guardians are entitled to visit the asylum.

5472. But there is no borough justice, or other person in the character of a justice, sitting at the board?—No.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM MIDDLETON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Middleton.
13 May 1870.

5473. Chairman.] YOU are chairman of the board of guardians at Leeds?—I am.

5474. Have you had any other connection with municipal or parochial affairs?—I have also been a member of the town council, some years ago.

5475. Have you a borough rate in Leeds?—Yes, we have.

5476. To what amount in the pound?—The borough rate for 1869 was 8 d. in the pound, which includes the watch rate.

5477. What would the watch rate alone amount to?—I cannot give that correctly; it has been included in the borough rate since 1859.

5478. Previous to that was it a separate rate?—Yes, it was; in 1858 I find that the watch rate was 5 d. in the pound, and the borough rate 7½ d. besides.

5479. So that the total was 1 s. 0½ d.?—Yes.

5480. Do you defray the expense of the police from the watch rate?—Yes, except what we may receive from the Government.

5481. Have the borough any funds of its own?—No.

5482. So that you defray the whole cost of your municipal affairs by the borough rate?—Yes.

5483. What amount does the whole borough rate come to, more or less, in the year?—I cannot state that accurately; I believe about 24,000 l.; but I have a return of the whole of the rates levied in the Leeds township for 12 years past, and I find that the borough rate for last year was 8 d., and the preceding year 8 d. I beg leave to hand in a return of the borough treasurer's statement of accounts for the year, which will show the amount. I came at a few hours' notice, and consequently did not come prepared as I should have liked to have done, on these points of detail.

5484. Have you an improvement commission in Leeds?—We have an improvement rate, but of course all those things are undertaken by the town council.

5485. Is the town council the local board of health?—Yes, it is the local board of health.

5486. Do you happen to know whether the accounts of the town council, as a town council and as a board of health, are kept distinct?—We have no board of health, except the town council, but the whole of the rates are kept separate and distinct.

5487. The town council acts itself as a board of health; have they separate officers in that capacity, or is the clerk to the town council also clerk to the town council acting as a board of health?—He acts as both.

5488. Do all the officers act as both?—We have a medical officer of health, an inspector of nuisances and smoke inspector, but they all act under the town council, through their several committees.

5489. The Committee have learned that in many boroughs the town council acts as the local board of health quite separately from their functions as a town council for sanitary matters, and keep separate books; is that the case with Leeds?—They have no separate means with us, that I am aware of; each committee makes its own minutes and memoranda, but they are all amenable to the council generally, and their acts have to be confirmed or rejected by the council.

5490. Have you the Compounding Acts in force in Leeds?—At present we have.

5491. Did you have them in force before the Act of last year?—Yes; in years gone by we had the Compounding Act in force.

5492. Can you state to the Committee what rates generally are levied in Leeds; in the first place, you have a borough rate?—Yes, we have a borough rate, which includes the watch rate; and there are also, the gaol rate, the poor rate, the improvement rate, the lamp rate, the main sewer rate, and the highway rate.

5493. Over how many of those rates have the town council control?—They have control over the disbursement of all rates except the poor rate.

5494. Do the town council levy a separate highway rate?—Yes, they do; previously we had a highway board, but the council got powers to manage the highways themselves, under under the Leeds Improvement Act of 1866, and now it forms a separate committee in connection with the council.

5495. What do they levy for the highway rate?—The highway rate is 1 s. 2 d. in the pound.

5496. Is that highway rate levied equally over all portions of the borough?—It is.

5497. Another committee of the town council, I understand, deals with the improvement rate?—Yes.

5498. What is the amount of that?—The improvement rate, at present, is 1 s.

5499. Is that levied equally over the whole borough?—I believe so.

5500. Have you no exemptions for market gardens and railways, and so on?—Yes, there are exemptions in both cases.

5501. Have you in Leeds any market gardens and land not covered with buildings, which are rated at only a quarter instead of the full rate?—In the rates collected by the town council, land is charged only one-third on main sewer and lamp rate; railways and canals are charged one-fourth on all rates except the highway rate, that rate is paid in full; and on the rates collected by the overseers, I believe the general rule is, one-sixth off buildings, and one-twelfth off land.

5502. In the case of other boroughs the improvement rate is not levied upon the more rural parts removed from the centre of the town; they only pay 25 per cent., but that is not so in Leeds?—I cannot speak decidedly; my opinion is that it is levied throughout the whole of the borough equally.

5503. Is the borough rate levied with the poor rate, or levied separately?—The borough rate is levied with the poor rate, and the gaol rate also.

5504. Do you know whether in the demand note for the poor rate it is specified that there is a separate charge for the borough rate?—Yes, there is a demand note here which I beg to hand in. The relief of the poor, the borough rate, and the gaol rate are each specified at different amounts (handing in the same). Here is also a demand note of the council for the other rates (handing in the same).

5505. Are those two papers, the green one and the red one, both left by the same collector?—No; they are two distinct sets of collectors.

5506. The one being under the overseers, and the other under the council?—Yes; the town council also have the providing of the water, and that is done by a separate committee, and by a separate class of collectors.

5507. So that you have three sets of collectors?—Yes, we have three sets.

5508. If the collection were in one hand, would it not be a great saving of expense?—I think so; my own impression is, that the whole of the rates of the borough ought to be collected by one body corporate, and to be under one supreme controlling authority, and that the expenditure of such rates should be audited much in the same way as the Poor Law expenditure is audited now.

5509. What is the audit of your town council?—There are two auditors appointed by the ratepayers, and one as the mayor's auditor.

5510. Who appoints the mayor's auditor?—The mayor himself.

5511. Is that under the general act, or is it under a local act?—Under the Municipal Corporation Act.

5512. Do the ratepayers elect their auditors?—Yes, they are elected in the same manner as the councillors.

5513. Is either of them professional?—No, they are not professional auditors; not as a rule.

5514. Is it a real audit, which goes into the accuracy of all the items and the legality of the expenditure?—I do not suppose that they look into the legality of the expenditure; I think that the principal part of their audit will be to see that certain sums have been expended.

5515. What is the aggregate rate in the pound for Leeds, generally?—I cannot give it for the whole borough, because we have four different unions connected with the borough, but the aggregate rate in the pound for the township of Leeds, at present, is 6 s. 5 d.

5516. Does that include the water rate?—No, not the water rate; we have not a water rate, strictly speaking, because the people who take it pay for it. The 6 s. 5 d. includes the borough, gaol, poor, improvement, lamp, main sewer, and the highway rate; it includes everything excepting water, and the people who take water of course pay for it.

5517. What is the rate for the relief of the poor?—For last year the rate for the relief of the poor was about 2 s. 6 d. in the pound.

5518. What is the rateable value of the township of Leeds?—The rateable value of the township is 414,880 l.

5519. Do you know what the rateable value of the whole borough is?—The rateable value of the borough is 722,078 l. 0 s. 7 d.

5520. The rates thus collected by the town council amount to about 3 s. in the pound, do they not?—Yes, those collected by the town council; but the rates disbursed by them, including the borough and gaol rates collected by the overseers, amount to about 4 s.

5521. My calculation would be this, that speaking roughly, the borough raises 3 s. in the pound, the rateable value is 700,000 l., and therefore the aggregate that the town council would spend would be a little over 100,000 l.?—No, I think the rates of the borough would be more; deducting the poor rate proper, about 2 s. 6 d., from the aggregate in the pound, 6 s. 5 d., it would be about 4 s.

5523. Practically, it must be upwards of 100,000 l. that is spent by the borough?—I should think, speaking roughly, 150,000 l. or 160,000 l., exclusive of what is collected as poor rate.

5524. And this expenditure, amounting to 150,000 l. or 160,000 l., is audited by two gentlemen, who are not professional auditors?—By the three appointed auditors.

5525. Do you know how long the audit takes?—I cannot exactly say; I suppose it depends upon the length of the men's conscience, as a rule.

5526. Does it take a month, or does it take three or four days?—It depends upon how soon the men may be satisfied, but I should say several days. As I stated before, I think that, as a rule, they simply see whether the amounts agree, and that the totals are correctly cast up, and so on. As far as the legality of the expenditure is concerned, they appear to have nothing to do with that, and they take no notice of it.

Mr. W. Middleton.

5527. Do you think that that system is satisfactory in their view?—Satisfactory to the council as a rule, I daresay; but I have heard very decided expressions of opinion by a number of ratepayers that it appeared to be very unsatisfactory to them.

5528. As regards those rates which are levied by the town council, is there a composition for them; that is to say, do the owners pay the rates below a certain line?—Yes; both the town council and overseers allow composition below certain rentals, the former for all rates up to 6 l., except the sewer rate, and the latter up to 8 l.

5529. The borough rate is collected by the guardians, and the improvement rate, and the other rates which are also collected for borough purposes, are collected directly by the council?—Yes; there are two rates which really belong to the town council collected by the guardians.

5530. Who appoints the collectors, respectively?—The town council and the overseers.

5531. Do the two staffs cost about alike?—I cannot speak exactly as to what the cost may be with respect to the council. The cost of the office of the overseers is somewhere about 3,000 l. a year.

5532. Can you state whether any of those rates are levied upon the owner as distinguished from the occupier?—The town council levy the main sewer rate upon the owners up to 7 l. 10 s. rental, and all other rates up to 6 l. rental.

5533. Is the water rate levied upon the occupier?—Yes, excepting in the case of cottages, where the landlord provides the water, it is so.

5534. Mr. Backhouse.] How do your owners get their voting qualification in Leeds; do they claim for it?—The owners of property are themselves occupiers of property.

5535. But where they are not occupiers, do they have votes?—No, excepting as owners, they would be entitled to vote for the county, and they can also vote for guardians of the poor.

5536. Do they claim for their vote, or are they placed upon the register by the overseer without notice?—As a rule, I think, they are placed upon the register; but they can claim, of course.

5537. Mr. Wheelhouse.] I think you said just now that you had heard repeated complaints of the want of a proper audit of the accounts of the council?—I do not know that there has been any general complaint, but I have heard many people, who have taken an interest in these kind of things, say that they have an idea that if their accounts were subject to the same strict supervision as that of the Poor Law Board, probably they would be a little more careful in their expenditure.

5538. Do not you think that it would be very desirable to have some such officer as the Poor Law auditor, to inspect and discharge if needs be?—I think so. I can only say that, so far as the auditors are concerned with respect to Poor Law matters, I am always very glad to see them; the greater the scrutiny they give our accounts the better I am satisfied when they find them correct. I feel bound to say that knowing that the accounts do go through that thorough scrutiny the board probably are a little more careful in the expenditure of the money than they might be, if that were not so.

5539. Generally speaking, throughout the West Riding of Yorkshire, the Poor Law audit is extremely satisfactorily performed, is it not, especially in the district of Leeds?—For anything that I am aware of it is; I can only say, so far as Leeds is concerned, that we very rarely have any exception taken to any portion of our accounts, and when an exception has been taken as a rule, the Poor Law Board have always remitted, showing that we have not been very far wrong.

5540. You told us just now that the mayor appoints one of the borough auditors, and that the other is appointed by the ratepayers; when you speak of the ratepayers, is not the other auditor appointed by the town council, as distinguished from the mayor?—I believe that is so; but the town council is elected by the ratepayers.

5541. Then practically, one of the auditors is the nominee of the mayor, and the other the nominee of the town council?—No; I now recollect they are appointed thus: they are elected on the 1st of March under the Municipal Corporation Acts, along with the revising and ward assessors, by the burgesses at large, in the same way as councillors; in addition, the mayor appoints a member of council his auditor for the year, and he acts in conjunction with the borough auditors.

5542. How would you propose to deal with the question of the three separate sets of collectors, and the abolition or amalgamation of such officers?—As I have before stated, I would invest the whole of the collection of rates in one body, whatever that body might be, whether it might be the council or the board of guardians, or any other body that might be appointed; the demand note should specify the amount of each rate for one year, and the amount of such rate should be paid to the rate receiver at some central office, by instalments, say of two months; and in case of failure of payment of any instalment, the authorities to have the power to compel payment of the whole.

5543. At all events, one quasi corporate body should have the whole collection?—Yes; and not only the collection, but the entire supervision.

5544. Would you consider it desirable to make the collecting body also the imposing body for laying the rates?—I do not see any objection why they should not be; at present, the town council lay the amount of their separate rates; that is to say, with the exception of the poor rates, and that, of course, is a distinct matter.

5545. As I understand, what you would do, would be, to allow the Poor Law Board to impose such rates as come strictly within Poor Law purposes?—Yes; I certainly should.

5546. And the borough council to lay such rates as come strictly within the borough purposes?—Yes, that is so far as the Poor Law Board laying the amount of rate is concerned; but I think it would be wise to let one body have the entire collection of the whole of the local rates, including the poor rate; I do not see any reason why the board of guardians should not make a demand upon the town council, supposing that was the body appointed, just in the same way as they make a demand now upon the overseers.

5547. I believe that in Leeds, you have no separate lunatic asylum?—No, we have not, except in connection with our workhouse.

5548. But the pauper lunatics of Leeds are sent sent to the West Riding County Asylum, at Stanley Hall, near Wakefield, are they not?—Most of them are; but I am sorry to say that we have to send some to much more expensive places; the lunatic asylum being often so crowded that they cannot take them in; very often we have to send them to private lunatic asylums, which becomes a very expensive matter.

5549. Upon whom does that expense fall?—It comes out of the poor rate. I am merely speaking now of our union, but of course it is the same with others.

5550. Are there not generally two gentlemen, magistrates of the borough of Leeds, appointed to sit at the West Riding Lunatic Asylum Board at Wakefield to represent Leeds?—I believe so.

5551. You told us just now that you spoke of the board of the township of Leeds, but are there three other boards of guardians in the ambit of the borough of Leeds?—Yes, in the borough of Leeds there are a portion of four unions—Leeds, Bramley, Hunslet, and Holbeck.

5552. The extreme of the outside unions is agricultural and mining mainly, is it not?—Yes, mainly so.

5553. Does the borough rate, including the lamp rate, extend over the whole ambit of the borough?—I believe it does.

5554. Is there not in the borough of Leeds some arrangement of this kind, that unless property is within a certain distance of a lamp it does not pay the lamp rate?—Yes, that is so.

5555. Sir James Lawrence.] Do I understand you to say that the whole of the borough rates are paid by the occupier in Leeds?—Yes, I believe they are, excepting under the circumstances I have stated; that is under certain rentals.

5556. That includes highway rate, improvement rate, and sewer rate?—Yes.

5557. Do you think that just?—Yes; I do not see any reason to say that it is unjust. It seems to me that it makes very little difference who pays the rates, because in my opinion, eventually either directly or indirectly, the occupier will have to pay them. For instance, if the landlord paid the rates, of course he would have to put it upon his rent, and if the tenant paid the rates, then the landlord would reduce his rent by, we will say, the amount of the rates. I look upon houses as being much the same as any other commodity, that they find their fair value in the market, and houses will not fetch more than they are worth.

5558. What is the improvement rate employed for?—For the improvement of the property in Leeds, making improvements in the streets, and so on.

5559. Does not that tend to increase the value of the houses by giving better streets, better pavements, and better approaches?—In some respects it would.

5560. Is not it a fact that the occupier pays the improvement rate for effecting those improvements, which permanently improve the value of the property, and possibly, if not probably, lead eventually to raising the rent in consequence of those improvements?—Yes; but at the same time the occupier reaps the benefit of the improvement himself if it is a shop by having an improved position for his business premises, and so on.

5561. Is it not paid for by him twice over; that is to say, if an improved value is obtained by means of those improvements, so that after the occupier has paid for those improvements by means of that improvement rate, does not he pay them a second time if he has to pay an improved rent?—No, I do not see that he does; I look upon it in this way, that any man of business would not give more for any sort of house or place of business than what he considered it to be worth. If he was wishing to take a shop he would naturally know what was the rent, and if he did not know he would inquire what was the amount of the taxes; and, putting the two together, if he thought that the premises were not worth the two together, he simply would not take them.

5562. Does not that depend very much upon the amount of the rate?—It would depend in this way, that if the rate is large the rent must be lower.

5564. When you see no advantage in dividing the rates, and allotting the highway rate and the sewer rate to be paid by the owner, and the poor rate and the other rates to be paid by the occupier?—No, I see no advantage in the long run. In the long run my opinion is that the tenant would have to pay the amount of the rates either in rent or rates.

5565. Colonel Brise.] You stated, did you not, that the expenditure of the rate in Leeds was unsatisfactory to the ratepayers?—No; the question was put to me whether the audit was satisfactory, and what I said with respect to the audit was this, that I had not heard any very general complaint about it from the inhabitants generally, because, as a rule, they do not think anything about these matters; but I have heard complaints from people who have taken an interest in matters of this description, who have said, what I quite believe, that if the accounts were subjected to a more rigid scrutiny, the same as we are subject to under the Poor Law Board, probably the council might be a little bit more careful as to their expenditure.

5566. Then there is a dissatisfaction as to the expenditure at present?—There is always a certain amount of dissatisfaction with a portion of the ratepayers in the expenditure of any public money.

5567. Is it your opinion that the administration is economically carried out?—I see no reason to doubt it, as a rule.

5568. The administration is in the hands of the occupiers, and the occupiers are principally owners, are they not, as well as occupiers?—Yes, I should say so. Of course it is in the administration of both, because the owners are, as a rule, occupiers. They occupy either their own property or somebody else's; and, consequently, quently, they are all interested in keeping down the rates.

Mr. W. Middleton.

5569. The administration is in the hands of the occupiers, but the occupiers are nearly all owners; is not that so?—The administration is not altogether in the hands of the occupiers, because there are both kinds, occupiers and owners, both in the council and board of guardians.

5570. If I understand you correctly, they only have their seats as occupiers?—There are different qualifications for a member of the council. If a man says that he is worth 1,000 l., he may take his seat in the council; and if a man is rated at a certain amount, he may take his seat in the council, that is, if he is properly elected. With respect to the guardians, a 30 l. rental, or rather, at the present time, a 25 l. rating is the qualification.

5571. Sir Massey Lopes.] I understand you to say, that in your opinion all the rates are paid by the occupiers?—Yes, I think it is so, either directly or indirectly.

5572. Chairman.] What do you mean when you say that, in your opinion, they are paid by the occupiers?—I mean this, that the whole of the rates which are collected eventually fall upon the occupiers of the property, the tenant; I may be mistaken, but I think that is so.

5573. Sir Massey Lopes.] Do you consider that there would be any advantage to the occupiers, if any arrangement took place to-morrow for the division of the rates between the owner and the occupier?—I do not think there would.

5574. They would have to pay the same amount, would they not, only in a different way?—I think so; either in rent or in rates.

5575. It would make no difference to them beneficially?—I do not think it would; that is my impression.

5576. Do you happen to know whether the accounts of the local board of Leeds are sent up to the Local Government Office in London?—We have no local board, excepting the town council, and the overseers, and the guardians; the local board of health is the council itself.

5577. Do you happen to know that it is imperative upon the auditors of those accounts to send up those accounts to the Local Government Act Office?—I am not aware that they have to send them anywhere.

5578. You do not know whether that has been regularly done or not?—I think it is not done; they are simply audited by the auditors appointed.

5579. Then if the law is so, they have omitted to fulfil the law in that respect?—I will not say that, because I may be saying wrong. If it is the law, probably they may send them; I am not aware that they do send them; I will not say that they have broken the law, because I do not think they would do so if it is the law.

5580. In your opinion, the audit of those accounts is not satisfactory, and you would rather that they were audited by responsible persons?—Personally, I would rather that they should be submitted to a professional man.

5581. Do not you think it would also be advisable if some little more publication was given to them?—There is an annual statement of the accounts published.

5582. That is to say, there is an annual statement made to the council at their meeting?—Yes.

5583. But that is never advertised in any tabular form in any paper, or you have never seen it?—I think I have seen it; I have certainly seen the reports very often in the papers as to the various accounts, and I believe that, as a rule, they are published.

5584. Chairman.] You have shown the Committee the treasurer's statement of receipts and expenditure for 1868-69; is that printed and circulated?—Amongst the members of the council it is circulated, but I believe that they publish an abstract of the accounts in the papers.

5585. Is building land dear in Leeds; is it difficult to get sites for building?—It varies very much in price according to the situation.

5586. You say that the poor rate is 3 s. 4 d. in the township of Leeds; is it less in any of the other unions connected with the borough?—The poor rate proper is only about 2 s. 6 d., and I do not think there would be much difference.

5587. Are you of opinion that a builder would give the same amount for a site to build on where there was a heavy rate, as he would where there was a light rate?—That would depend upon the demand for the property. If, owing to the heavy rate, the demand for property was less, of course the land would be worth less.

5588. Would it be likely to be so?—I do not think that it would very materially affect it.

5589. If there was a street which was partly in one union and partly in another, and one was very highly rated and the other was low rated, do you think that the value of the ground for building purposes would be the same in both cases?—If the situation was as good, I do not think it would very materially affect the value of the ground. I do not think that the rates could really be so excessive in the one and so small in the other that it would very materially affect the value.

5590. Take the case of a house which is just within the borough of Leeds, and which pays all the borough rates; these rates together amount to 6 s. 5 d.; then we will take a house just outside the line, but practically in the same situation, perhaps only paying 2 s. 6*d.* for rates instead of 6 s. 5 d., do you think that if the occupier paid the rates he would give the same rent for the two houses?—No, I think he would be likely to give more if the rates were less.

5591. And, therefore, as he would give more rent, it would make a difference to the landlord, would it not?—Yes, it would.

5592. The landlord of the house in the favoured spot would get more rent than the one where it was heavily rated?—I think he would as a rule.

5593. Therefore, as far as that goes, the difference in the rates would affect the owner?—Yes, I think it would.

5594. And that would modify, so far, your statement that the occupier pays all the rates?—No, what I stated was, whoever paid the rates directly; they would in the end be paid by the tenant.

5595. The same rate cannot be paid both by the owner and by the occupier, can it?—No, I should say not.

5596. Therefore, if the owner gets less rent, because it is heavily rated, he practically is a loser by the rate of a portion of his rent, is he not?—That might take place in some instances, but as a rule, probably a small amount of rate would not make any difference as to the rent.

5597. But a large amount of rate would?—It would tell, no doubt.

5598. Therefore,

5598. Therefore, so far as it made a difference in the rent, it would affect the owner just to that extent, and no more?—It might do in some cases.

5599. It would do so wherever the occupier had got a choice between a site in a highly rated place, and a site in a place which was less rated?—Yes.

5600. Where he had got the choice, he would make a difference in the rent that he paid?—Yes, I have no doubt that it would affect it in some instances in that way; for instance, take a farm, if the rates were heavy upon that farm, the landlord, of course, would not be able to get that amount of rent that he otherwise would do if the rates were lower.

5601. Therefore, so far, the rates would come out of the pocket of the owner?—They would, to that extent.

5602. Mr. Corrance.] You compound for rates in Leeds, do you not?—We do, up to a certain rental.

5603. Of course in that case, the owners pay the rates where there is a composition?—They do.

5604. Do you find that where there is a composition the owner will generally put the amount of that composition upon the rent which he asks for the tenement?—Of course he must do it. If the landlord is asked to pay the rates he must charge it upon the rent, and vice versâ.

5605. Therefore that raises the price of the rent of those houses to the poorer classes?—No, I do not know that it raises the rent. If the landlord did not pay the rates somebody must pay them; the occupier must pay them.

5606. Under those circumstances the assumption that you leave us to form is this, that the occupier would pay an increase rent in virtue of the charge, whatever it may be, being so imposed upon the owner?—Yes.

5607. Therefore that makes that class of tenements higher to those poor occupiers?—It makes it higher in this respect, that if the landlord pays the rates he must have it from somebody. I suppose that every landlord when he builds property expects to get a certain amount of per-centage for his money, and if he has to pay a certain amount of rates the occupier must pay a larger amount of rent to meet it, there is no doubt.

5608. Is there any dissatisfaction in Leeds concerning the rates amongst any class of occupiers?—No, I have not heard of any; of course, nobody likes to pay rates.

5609. Are the rents of the houses of the poorer class particularly high in Leeds?—No; I do not know a town where, as a rule, they are so low.

5610. Then, of course, there is no dissatisfaction?—There is no dissatisfaction on that account. Only give the people good trade and there would be no grumbling.

5611. Is there ample house accommodation?—Yes, there is ample house accommodation; in fact, we have more accommodation in houses than we can get occupiers at the present time; owing to the badness of trade we have a good many unlet.

5612. Your rates are very high, nevertheless, according to your statement?—I do not know that they are extraordinarily high in comparison with other large towns; I think not.

5613. You have a considerable pauper population, have you not?—Yes, we have. We have now upon our books, in-door and out-door, upwards of 5,000 individuals.

5614. And a great many children wandering about in the streets?—You will find that in all large towns; I do not think that we are worse in that respect than any other; so far as respects school accommodation, and everything of that sort, I am quite sure that there is sufficient school accommodation if people will send them to school, which in all towns, I believe, very often they will not do, I am sorry to say.

5615. Colonel Brise.] Do the occupiers of houses under 6 l. pay the rates?—No; houses under 6 l. are compounded for at the present time, and the owners pay the rates; at least, the Compounding Act is in force, and the owners may compound or not, if they think proper; but the owners pay the rates.

5616. In paying the income tax, upon the estimated rental of those houses, does the owner take off the rates, or does he pay the income tax on the gross estimated rental?—I am not able to answer that question; I should not like to speak decidedly upon that point.

Mr. Thomas Avery, called in; and Examined.

5617. Chairman.] You have been Mayor of Birmingham, have you not?—Yes, twice.

5618. And you are well acquainted with municipal affairs, I presume?—I have had considerable experience in them.

5619. Have you held any other municipal offices?—I have been town councillor for some years, and I am now also an alderman of the borough.

5620. Have you been a guardian of the poor?—No; but I have been overseer of the poor, and chairman and member of the finance committee of the corporation for a considerable time, having charge of the rates, and the duties of assessment for municipal purposes.

5621. Have you heard the evidence of the last witness?—Yes.

5622. Can you state whether the municipal arrangements in Birmingham are the same as in Leeds as regards the town council being also the local board of health, or have you a local board of health in Birmingham?—No, the town council under its Improvement Act, exercises the duties practically of the local board of health; they do so by means of what is called the borough inspection committee, who meet and transact their business separately as a committee, reporting to the council from time to time as to their proceedings.

5623. Is that under a local Act?—Yes.

5624. You have always been under a local Act in Birmingham, I think?—Yes, before the town was incorporated, we were governed by the lamp and paving commissioners, and by the town commissioners. The different hamlets now within the borough were also separately governed under the name of the Commissioners of Duddeston-cum-Nechells, and the Commissioners of Deritend and Bordesley.

5625. With regard to the rates that are levied in the borough of Birmingham, do you levy a borough rate?—Yes.

5626. Do you levy an improvement rate?—Yes.

Mr. T. Avery.

5627. And a police rate, or are the police paid out of the borough rate?—The police are paid out of the borough rate; if you will allow me I will state separately the amount, and the nature of each rate; the Acts under which rates are directly levied by the town council are called the Improvement Acts of 1851 and 1861, and under the powers of those Acts we light, pave, sewer, and improve the town: that comprehends lighting, sewering, paving, and general improvement and all sanitary matters, and also street improvements. Our powers of rating are limited for those purposes to 2 s. in the pound, under the Borough Improvement Act, and 6 d. in the pound under the Street Improvement Act; the full amount of 2 s. has always been levied under the Borough Improvement Act, with the exception of one year, when it was 1 s. 11 d., and for street improvement purposes we have levied rates varying from time to time, but averaging about 2 d. in the pound; those are the rates under the Improvement Acts. In addition to those, we have a general account, comprehending a great variety of purposes, which we call the municipal accounts; those purposes are the watch committee, police, &c., borough gaol maintenance, and prosecution of offenders, baths, and parks, under the Birmingham Parks Act, estates and buildings, industrial school, free libraries, burial board, lunatic asylums, and public works for the utilisation of sewage; for all these purposes we levy a borough rate, which for the last 20 years has ranged from 10 d. to 1 s. 5 d. in the pound, the average being 1 s. 3 d., and that rate we levy in the form of precepts on the overseers of the various parishes, and they pay in exchange for those precepts a certain sum of money, averaging lately, I think, about 60,000 l. per annum, last year it was 61,412 l., at the rate of 1 s. 2 d. in the pound.

5628. And the improvement rate, which was 1 s. 11 d. last year?—Yes, that is the only year it has been 1 s. 11 d.

5629. How did you raise that rate?—That is rased by a valuation of the property which extends over the whole borough.

5630. And you have separate collectors to collect it?—Yes.

5631. The rates are not collected through the parochial authorities?—No.

5632. You are prevented by the Act of Parliament from collecting them through the poor rate authorities?—We are empowered by our own Act to levy that rate, and collect it ourselves, and we do so levy it at an expense of about 1,500 l per annum, which comprehends the salaries of officers and collectors; the whole of the expenses belonging to the rating department are about 1,500 l. or 1,600 l. a year.

5633. How much is the aggregate amount of the improvement rate?—Last year we collected 73,800 l. under the borough improvement rate, and 3,350 l. under the street improvement rate.

5634. Can you explain to the Committee how it is that the borough rate, which was 1 s. 3 d., gave 60,000 l., and the other rate, which was 1 s. 11 d. should not have given more than 70,000 l?—That is in consequence of the great exemptions that prevail.

5635. That is to say, exemptions from the improvement rate, which do not extend to the borough rate?—Yes.

5636. Will you state to the Committee the nature of those exemptions?—First of all, I should say that when we levy that amount of 1 s. 2 d. in the pound upon the borough overseers—that is the net amount in money which they are to hand over to us, making no allowances for voids, and expenses of collection and all other kinds of expenses which are very large—I dare say that in reality the overseers, in order to raise that 1 s. 3 d. in the pound, would in all probability have to levy 1 s. 6 d. or 1 s. 7 d., that explains a very large part of it, each 1 d. in the pound representing 4,300 l. Then another considerable part is caused by the exemptions enjoyed by the railway companies, which we think in Birmingham, and I believe the opinion very extensively prevails in other towns, are excessively unjust. The allowance of compounds is also a considerable sum.

5637. Have you got a copy of the Improvement Act under which you collect?—No.

5638. Is there a clause in your Act by which railways, canals, market gardens, and so forth, are exonerated from three-fourths of the rate?—Yes; railways, canals, land covered with water, nursery grounds, market gardens, and agricultural lands, are all exempt from three-fourths of the rate.

5639. But so far as the borough rate goes, they pay their full share?—Yes.

5640. From your borough rate, you pay for the lunatic asylum, therefore the railways would pay towards the lunatic asylum, but they would not pay towards the improvement?—Precisely so; they pay for all purposes comprehended within the borough rate, the full amount, without exemptions of any kind; and you will observe, that there is a very great anomaly in the recent legislation for the utilisation of sewage, that railways now pay the full rate for that (the Act was passed about two years ago); whilst as to the other part of the sewering system, now amounting to a very large sum, they are exempt from three-fourths, so that in one part of the same operation, they pay in full, and in another part, they only pay one-fourth.

5641. From what sources do you pay your sewering?—From the rate resulting from the Improvement Acts, with the exception of the part comprehended in the Utilisation Act.

5642. Have you a highway rate in the borough of Birmingham?—No; the highway rate is now comprehended within the improvement rate; it was formerly separately collected, but it is now included in the general provisions of the Improvement Act.

5643. The word highway rate has disappeared entirely?—Yes; I think so.

5644. The last witness stated, that in Leeds, the demand note specifies so much for highway rate, but that is not so with you?—No; it is part of the general expenses.

5645. Are there any parishes partly in the borough of Birmingham, and partly without?—Yes; there is one parish, the parish of Ashton, which is partly within, and partly without.

5646. Do you know whether they have a highway rate in that part of the parish of Aston, which is not within the borough of Birmingham?—I believe they have, I am not quite certain; a large part of Aston, now outside the borough, is governed under the provisions of an Act, which they have lately adopted.

5647. With regard to the borough rate, which you levy on that part of the parish of Aston which is in Birmingham, is that collected with the the poor rate or separately?—They collect it separately.

5648. Do they collect it separately, because the poor rate is levied over the whole parish, and the borough rate is only levied over so much of the parish as is within the borough?—Yes.

5649. Can you tell the Committee what are the arrangements as regards compounding for rates by owners in the borough of Birmingham, or in any of the parishes?—We have in Birmingham about 78,000 assessments, of which 62,000 are 10 l., and under the rateable value coming within the operation of the Compounding Act. The amount of the aggregate rateable value so represented is 339,000 l. The whole of that property is subject, under the Improvement Act, to compounding, which for 5 l. and under is two-thirds, and between 5 l. and 10 l., one-half.

5650. Are the Committee to distinguish in this between the improvement rate and the poor rate?—Yes; I am speaking of the improvement rate alone.

5651. As regards the poor rate, have you adopted the Act of last Session?—I do not know precisely what has been done in Aston and Edgbaston, but in the parish of Birmingham proper, which comprehends about three-fourths of the rateable value of the whole. 95 per cent. of the landlords have claimed, and are now exercising the right of compounding; that is to say, out of every 100 houses, 95 take the compound.

5652. Now, let us take the parish of Birmingham; is this one of the results, that the owner of the same cottage rented at a sum under 10 l. would be receiving an allowance of 50 per cent. in respect of the improvement rate, but a smaller allowance in respect of the poor rate?—Yes.

5653. The allowances under the Assessed Rates Act not being so high as those under the Improvement Act?—Precisely so.

5654. So that there is no uniformity at all in that respect?—No, there is the very contrary of uniformity; and we have the still more inconvenient anomaly, that from the number of parishes within the borough, we have no less than three separate valuations, besides the valuation of the corporation.

5655. What valuations are those?—The valuation of the corporation, the valuation of the overseers of the parish of Birmingham, which, as I have said, is about three-fourths of the rateable value of the whole, the valuation of the overseers of the parish of Edgbaston, and the valuation of the overseers of the parish of Aston.

5656. That is to say, for the same house there are not more than two valuations, only there being three parishes in the borough, you speak of those three valuations?—Precisely so. And then we have what I venture to consider is a very great evil; we have a diversity in the valuation which lies at the basis of the whole assessment, and then we have the excessive inequality of the amount of rates levied by reason of the tendency that there is in large towns for particular groups of population to mass themselves very much together. In one part, where all the wealthy class resides, and where the rates are very low, and in the other, a comparatively poor class, where the rates are very high; and I ought to say that, as respects the parish of Birmingham, the inconvenience of having two systems of valuation has been found so great, that the overseers of the parish and the town council have arranged to employ the same valuer, so that we practically have one value. The town council have attempted to do the same with regard to Aston and Edgbaston; but they have at present declined to co-operate with us, because they are of opinion that it will raise the proportion which they contribute to the other parts of the union.

5657. Can you state to the Committee whether there is any water rate in Birmingham?—No, there is not; the town council of Birmingham do not supply water; it is either supplied from private sources, or from the waterworks company.

5658. The police are paid out of the borough rate, are they not?—Yes.

5659. Do you contribute at all to the county rate?—Yes.

5660. For what purposes?—For general county purposes; for bridges, the administration of justice, and various other purposes.

5661. Have you a separate quarter sessions?—Yes; I may say that the total amount that we contribute to the county rate is about 1,500 l. a year.

5662. Does that include the contribution to the lunatic asylum, or have you one of your own?—That includes everything that we pay to the county; we have a separate lunatic asylum, and a very large one.

5663. You have a very large valuation, and you only pay 1,500 l. to the county rate, so that it is a very small item?—It is a very small item.

5664. Are you aware of the arrangements that are made for the representation of owners either parochially or otherwise in Birmingham; do owners exercise the right of franchise?—They only exercised it so far as they were occupiers.

5665. Had you adopted the Small Tenements Act in Birmingham?—No; we have a local Act: the parish of Birmingham is governed by a local Act.

5666. Under that local Act, did the occupiers who compounded, lose their votes?—Each ratepayer had one vote in respect of his own occupation; I do not think he had any other.

5667. But where the occupier did not pay the rates, was he or not deprived of his vote?—The Small Tenements Act was passed some years ago; its provisions were unknown in Birmingham for a very long time; but some two or three years ago a very considerable proportion, I do not know how many, perhaps 6,000 or 7,000 occupiers, were put upon the register.

5668. Although they were compound householders?—Yes.

5669. By that, do you mean the Parliamentary register or the parochial register?—Upon the burgess List, from which they were subsequently stuck off.

5670. For municipal purposes the owner has no vote at all, has he, as owner?—No.

5671. Do you think that that is satisfactory or not?—He has a vote by reason of his occupation, not as owner; and I am of opinion that in all cases in which he directly pays rates himself he should have a vote. When he does not pay the rate the person paying it, in my judgment, is the proper person to exercise the franchise.

5672. Have you at all considered the propriety of the owner paying a portion of the rates?—Unlike the last witness, I think the owner really does pay the rates.

5673. Do you mean that the owner pays the rates generally in the long run?—I mean in the long run; and I mean in this way: at the time that the contract takes place the actual amount of rates paid is an element in the contract, and my view is that at that time the owner actually pays the rates in the shape of a diminished rent; then that rent being once fixed it commonly goes on for a number of years. There is no readjustment of that rent; but as improvements of various kinds are taking place the improvement rates, incidental to them, are paid by the tenant until there is a re-adjustment. During that operation, therefore, the tenant pays not upon the rate which existed at the time of the contract, but upon additions to existing, and all new rates, until there is a readjustment.

Mr. T. Avery. 13 May 1870.

5674. Am I to understand this: that the amount of the rate, levied at the time of the contract, comes in your opinion, out of the owner's pocket?—I think so, certainly, mainly, if not altogether.

5675. But the additions which are made to that rate during the tenancy come out of the occupier's pocket?—Yes, until there is a readjustment of the rent.

5676. Then the rates again come out of the pocket of the owner?—Yes.

5677. Are the owners of houses a numerous class in Birmingham?—I do not know what the precise circumstances of other towns are, but in Birmingham the facts of the distribution of ownership and occupancy are very singular; a very large proportion, I believe, estimated to be about 5-6ths of the whole of the land of Birmingham, taking the rateable value, is leasehold, and it is let out upon building leases for 99 years; that large amount of property, estimated to be about 5-6ths of the whole, is in comparatively few hands, the chief proprietors being Lord Calthorpe, Mr. Cregoe Colmore, Earl Howe, General Vyse, the Governors of King Edward's School, the executors of Colonel Inge, the Marquis of Hertford, and the trustees of Sir Thomas Gooch; and it is under this system that the whole of the property in Birmingham at present exists: Mr. Colmore let some of his land in Birmingham 99 years ago at 6 d. a yard; those leases are just now falling in, and he is reletting portions of it at 10 s. per yard; he parted, therefore, with his property for that long period at such a low rent upon the condition, that during that time the tenant should not only pay the rates that existed at the time the contract was entered into, but should also pay all future rates, whether Parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise. Giving 200 yards for each house at 6 d. per yard, that would be about 5 l.; its present value is 100 l., but 5 l. would be all that the ground landlord received for that long period of 99 years. That is as respects land, and therefore there is no readjustment during that long period. Then, that land having been so improved by the owner of the building, the owner of the building, in his turn, relets it commonly for 7, 14, or 21 years' leases; very seldom for much longer than 7 or 14 years, or frequently upon annual tenancies. In that case a readjustment takes place at continually recurring intervals.

5678. You have two classes of owners, the owner of the ground-rent and the owner of the house?—Yes, precisely so; the owners of the ground-rent in Birmingham extend to five-sixths of the whole. Some of those 99 years' leases are falling in.

5679. The rating in different parishes of Birmingham is very different, is it not?—Yes.

5680. The inequalities of rating, I think you stated, are very great?—The inequalities are very great; first of all, you have different minds forming estimates of the value, and next you have very different scales of deductions.

5681. Supposing that one of those 99 years' leases fell in, in a parish which was not highly rated, and another lease fell in a parish which was highly rated, do you think that the owners would get the same price for their respective pieces of land?—Certainly not.

5682. The owner of the land situated in a parish which was not rated so high would get more rent?—Certainly, other things being equal.

5683. Therefore the owner would have to sacrifice a portion of his rent in consequence of the increase of local taxation?—Yes; according to my view the owner really does pay, and it would be a most unjust thing if the owner did not pay his proper proportion, but my judgment is that he does practically pay his grant of the rates by receiving a diminished rent.

5684. And receiving a diminished rent, and in that way having clearly a very serious interest in the rates, has he, according to your judgment, a sufficient voice in the administration?—I think, practically, he has, because he is represented by his tenant; but the more you can give direct interest and give direct control in local affairs, I think the more we move in the right direction. I should be very glad to see the owners invested with greater power of control, particularly if they would exercise it; but, for the most part, those gentlemen live completely out of Birmingham; I mean the landowners pure and simple.

5685. But then there are the owners of houses, the leaseholders, as distinguished from occupiers; are the leaseholders a numerous class in Birmingham?— Yes, very numerous, and they reside within the town, and they have a direct interest in keeping down the rates, because just in proportion as the rates are high, other things being equal, I imagine that their rents are depreciated. The actual owners of the property are for the most part resident in the town, having a direct interest in the administration of local affairs and the local expenditure.

5686. And those leaseholders, although they have an interest in the property, have no vote at all?—No, their interest is in property in their own occupation, and their interest being the same as that of others, extends to the whole.

5687. Sir Massey Lopes.] I think you mentioned something with regard to there being a great grievance in Birmingham, with reference to the assessment of railway companies; I did not quite understand what the grievance was?—The grievance is, that they only pay one-fourth of the rate, or one-fourth of a very large proportion of their assessment, instead of, as we say they should pay, on the whole, because we are of opinion that they participate in all the benefits of local government, the sewering, the lighting, the paving, and the health of the town, all affecting the prosperity of the town from which their traffic springs; and that as they have the same participation in the benefit of the expenditure, they ought equally to participate in the expenditure itself.

5688. In assessing railways, do you assess simply the agricultural value of the land on which those railways are placed, or do you take into consideration consideration the rails, the plant, the carriages, &c.?—We take into consideration everything that exists at the time; the whole undertaking within the borough.

5689. Does it occur to you, that when you are rating the whole of the undertaking, the rails, the plant, and the carriages, you are rating the stock in trade of that railway?—I apprehend that those are two totally distinct subjects. The question is, do they or do they not participate in the benefit of local expenditure, and should they equally pay the rates.

5690. But I want to know whether, when you are rating the whole of their undertaking, the rails and so on, you are not rating the stock in trade?—We rate to a certain extent their stock in trade by treating it as one of the deductions, but that is simply as a means of ascertaining the value; in fact, what is their beneficial occupation, just the same as any other ratepayer. In all other properties, the valuer regulates his judgment as to the annual value by comparing it to some extent with the actual lettings of adjoining property; but in railways that cannot be done because they are too large; it is a proper means of arriving at the value.

5691. Would there be any beneficial value that you could rate, unless the rails were upon that land?—Yes, vastly more than the railways pay us; we have in Birmingham 8,420 acres of land, and the aggregate rateable value of the whole is 1,092,000 l., giving an average of about 130 l. per acre. The railways come into Birmingham, they occupy the best part of the town, and displace other property that would pay the full rates; we only have a limited area, and of that the fair rateable value is somewhere about 130 l. an acre, and after their allowance of three-fourths has been deducted they only practically pay upon a rateable value of about 70 l. per acre.

5692. Mr. Seely.] How many acres are occupied by railways?—530 acres of land are occupied by railways, canals, and land covered with water, so that they occupy in point of fact one-sixteenth part of the whole area of the borough, and they do not pay anything like such a proportion of the rates.

5694. I understood you to say that you thought it very desirable that you should have one valuation instead of four?—Most decidedly.

5695. And also one collector and one collection?—No, I did not say that; on the contrary, I think that the bodies imposing the rates ought also to have the responsibility of collecting them.

5696. Do not you think that instead of having two or three collectors coming and claiming so much for poor rate, and so much for borough rate, it would be desirable that the rates should be classified, and that the demand paper should simply state how much in the pound for each, and the payments to be made at the same time either half-yearly or quarterly, or would you prefer to have separate collectors coming for different purposes at different times?—I think there ought to be two separate systems of collection in Birmingham; one for parochial, and the other for muncipal purposes, and that each body should impose their own rates, and each collect them, and that there ought to be one valuation for the whole of the borough for purposes of assessment, to be determined by a valuation board in which the town council and the overseers of the several parishes should be equally represented.

5697. And the poundage for each subject specified?—Yes, certainly; I think that would be very desirable.

5698. Chairman.] What objection can you see to such a plan as this, that both the town council and the boards of guardians should make their precept upon the parochial authorities, and say, we want so much money, and then let it all be collected together; what abuses would arise from that?—I do not think that any abuses would arise, but I am of opinion that you are mixing together things that are essentially distinct, namely, municipal operations and parochial operations, and that each of those separate systems are of such a magnitude that, to be efficiently conducted, they should be separate in their operations while they should take one common basis of value.

5699. But you may keep the two administrations entirely distinct, and yet ask for the money, which has to come from the same man through one collector, could you not, and one collector could collect both rates, handing over the money to the respective authorities that are administering them?—That would be quite possible, no doubt.

5700. What objection would there be to that; would it not be more convenient to the taxpayer that he should have one collector come to him than that he should have two?—On the contrary, I think, the division of paying the taxes is rather convenient, and as respects economy, the economy is not very great, because I have stated that the total expense of the town council for collecting those rates last year was 1,500 l.; I do not know what the expense of the parishes is, but I fancy it is considerably more than that.

5701. You think that the municipal authorities ought to have the appointment of the officers who collect the money for them?—Yes, I think so; I think the more you diffuse responsibility, the less it becomes actual and real, and what we really want in local government is something that gives actual and active and effective control; that is very much needed, in my opinion.

5702. You do not think that there is control if the collector is obliged to supply you with a certain sum of money; would not the practical control that you would have over the collector be that he would be obliged to bring you the money?—I do not think there is very much importance in that.

5703. Would you consider it a change of system if you had one collection instead of three as at present?—That would be more a question of detail.

5704. Do you object to the present system of collection of the borough rate?—Certainly, the borough rate ought to be collected by the town council; that is that part of the borough rate which is required for municipal purposes until lately, although the borough rate is 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound, very few inhabitants of Birmingham knew the actual amount of the proportions that were collected under cover of the poor rates; now the overseers do not demand it separately in the demand note, but they put a memorandum at the bottom of the note, "so much of this is for the purposes of the corporation."

Mr. T. Avery.

13 May 1870.

5705. At present the borough rate, although it is expended by the municipal corporation, is collected through the parochial authorities?—Yes, and I think that is a very vicious principle.

5706. Sir Massey Lopes.] You are clearly of opinion, are you not, that under the present system the rates are paid by the owner and not by the occupier?—I said that I thought they were distributed, and I indicated the manner of distribution, but not the exact proportion.

5707. I quite understand what you said, that with the exception that when any new rates were imposed and there was no readjustment, in that case they fell upon the occupier?—At the time of the contract between the owner and the occupier, I believe that the owner pays the greater part, at least three-fourths, if not the whole, of the rate, but the rent being once fixed it commonly goes on for a considerable time without change, and all new rates, till there is a readjustment, fall upon the occupier.

5708. Then the reason for that is this, is it not, that when a tenant once takes a house or land, he takes into consideration the amount of rates that he will have to pay, and gives a proportionately less rent?—That is what I have found in my own experience; whenever I take any property I very carefully consider that, and in letting property, I have known the same careful inquiry on the part of the persons taking it.

5709. Are you of opinion that the occupiers having, as at present, the administration of the rates, that tends in a great degree to economy; that they look after the expenditure much more than the owners would?—I think it has rather that tendency, but I should not in the least object if any means could be found for a more complete supervision on the part of the taxpayers.

5710. If any arrangement was to take place for the division of those rates, I suppose it would be necessary to disturb existing arrangements?—To some extent it would.

5711. Do you think that that would be desirable; do you think that the benefit of it would compensate for the change?—To the extent which I have indicated, it would.

5712. Do you think that there would be any benefit to the occupier by that arrangement; do you think he would gain anything in economy?—No.

5713. Then you do not think there would be any advantage to him?—He would not gain anything in economy, unless it led to a more active supervision, and, therefore, more economical management, and I do not conceive that he would do that.

5714. Do you think that if those rates were divided, and the owners were represented on the different boards, they would exercise their power of attending and looking after the administration of those rates?—They would partially, no doubt, and just as far as they did, so the result would be beneficial.

5715. You mentioned Mr. Cregoe-Colmore's name, who is a large owner in Birmingham; he is non-resident, is he not?—Yes, he is non-resident.

5716. Is not a great portion of this property now falling in?—Yes.

5717. Do you think that he would take a very active interest in, or supervision of, those rates?—No, I think it would be very likely he would not; but Mr. Cregoe-Colmore is simply a landowner; he is not the actual owner for a term of the building and the land combined.

5718. There are leases under him, but those leases are falling in now; and he is in actual possession of a great deal of property at rack rent?—Yes; he has now his land comparatively unoccupied; great portions of it are being pulled down, and are being re-let at 20 times, and even still more, its value 99 years since. I only mention this as a representative case.

5719. Is he letting it out on ground-rent leases?—Yes; he is letting it out on ground-rent leases.

5720. You mentioned that land which was let at 6*d.* per yard is now being let at 10*s.*; as that alteration has taken place, do you think it would be right or just that this gentleman, who is deriving a vast deal of benefit from the property coming into his hands, should contribute anything himself towards the local expenses of the borough of Birmingham; there are a great many improvements that are going on, and are likely to take place; do you think that he should pay something out of his ground-rents towards those improvements?—I think it would be excessively unjust if he did not pay; but I have already said that, actually, he does pay, and but for the rates which are imposed, the land which he now lets at 10*s.*, he would let at 12*s.* or 13*s.* a yard.

5721. Mr. Pell.] You say, that there are five-sixths of the land in Birmingham let upon long leases?—Yes; it is estimated at five-sixths, and they are nearly all let for periods of 99 years.

5722. That having been done, three persons become interested in the land, and what stands on it; first, the freeholder, then the leaseholder, and then the occupying tenant?—Yes.

5723. I think you told the Chairman, that as a rule, the leaseholder was resident in Birmingham?—Yes.

5724. Of course, the original leaseholder is not as a matter of course resident there, because it might be 99 years since the lease was taken?—I mean the original leaseholder or his representatives.

5725. Do you know of such things in Birmingham as selling leases?—Yes; sales, assignments, and all kinds of operations take place; but the leaseholder exists in his own person, or by his representatives for the term of 99 years.

5726. And you are so clannish, are you, that you never allow those leases to be parted with to persons out of Birmingham?—I did not say so; I said that for the most part, the actual possessor of the lease was resident in the town; no doubt, in a great many cases the property in Birmingham is possessed all over England; but in the main the actual owner of the lease is either resident in the town or in the immediate neighbourhood.

5727. You mean to say that all assignments and sales, and transfers of leases in the usual way, have been to people who are now resident in Birmingham, or at least the greater part of them?—Yes,

Yes, by far the greater part; I do not know the precise proportion.

5728. Colonel Brise.] I think I understood you to say, that 530 acres in Birmingham is occupied by railways and canals?—Yes; by railways, canals, and land covered with water.

5729. And you stated, did you not, that the rateable value of that 530 acres is something under 100 l. a year per acre at the present time?—No; I said that the average rateable value of the whole of Birmingham, consisting of 8,420 acres, was about 130 l. per acre; and I also said that the railways, canals, and land covered with water, occupy 530 acres of that area, and that there rateable value was less than 100 l. per acre. In fact, after their allowance of three-fourths has been deducted, it is 70 l. per acre.

5730. I think I understood you to say, that the principal owners live out of the town, and the leaseholders principally live in the town, and that the leaseholders, as occupiers, have a voice in the administration of the expenditure at the present time?—Yes.

5731. Are these occupiers who administer the rates, principally leaseholders, or are they half and half, or are the occupiers, who are not leaseholders, the principal administrators of the rates?—The administrators of the rates, as far as the municipality are concerned, are represented by the town council; and the town council is representative of the general constituency of the town, and that general constituency mainly consists of occupiers; the leaseholders also being occupiers of certain tenements within the town, so that they are directly interested, and they are directly represented in the administration.

5732. But the gentlemen who are elected, are as often leaseholders as they are occupiers?—Yes, they are both.

5734. If you are speaking of the rate which is paid by the person who pays the rate, surely you could mention the proper rate in the pound, and not what the result of that rate may be?—I mentioned the rate which we required, and we levy it in that manner from the necessity of the case. We find that upon our estimates we shall receive so much money, and we shall expend so much money, and the chasm between those two items has to be made up by a rate; then that rate has varied during the last 20 years from 10 d. to 1 s. 5 d. in the pound, and the average has been 1 s. 3 d.

5735. I may take it that you demand a sum which would require 1 s. 2 d. or 1 s. 3 d. in the pound, provided there were no exemptions and no defalcation; but at the same time, in order to realise the sum that you require, it is necessary to make a rate much higher than the sum you indicated?—Yes; we make a precept for those purposes, and the sum of money upon the rateable value furnished to us by the overseers represents that amount. We make a precept upon them for that amount, and that precept makes no allowance for voids or defalcation, and in reality they have to levy a very much larger sum, I believe, commonly some 15 or 20 per cent. more.

5736. What is the amount of the poor rate in Birmingham?—I believe it was 4 s. in the year 1869. It averages from 4 s. to 4 s. 6 d., I believe; 1 s. 3 d. is the borough rate; the average of the poor rate proper for the parish of Birmingham is as nearly as possible 3 s. 3 d. in the pound.

5737. Is it higher or lower than it has been for the last four or five years?—There is very little difference.

5738. A question was asked you about the collection of rates, and your having different collectors; has it ever occurred to you whether a great saving might not be effected if you did without collectors, as is the system in Paris, and also in New York?—I do not think it would be possible to obtain the money without, because if there were no collectors you would save the expense, but you would lose a great deal more in the amount collected, though you would save in that way.

5739. Take the case of a working man in receipt of weekly wages who has to pay the rates; when the collector calls the man is away, and the money may not be forthcoming; or the collector calls after the money is spent; if the time and place were indicated where the man had to pay his money, do not you think that probably the money would be paid when the man had the money to pay, and much less loss would accrue if a system of that kind were adopted?—The working man, you will observe, does not pay rates directly in Birmingham; he pays them under the operation of compounding, but, in effect, we do both the things that you state; we always have a collector in the office every day for several hours to receive all the rates that are brought to him.

5740. It does not occur to you that there would be any saving in adopting the plan which is in operation in New York, namely, that if they are not paid at the end of the first month, five per cent. is added, and at the end of the second month 10 per cent., the result being that very nearly the whole amount is sent into the office?—I should hesitate to try the experiment.

5741. When you stated that the owner paid the rates in the long run, did I rightly understand your observation to apply chiefly or entirely to the owner of the ground-rent, the landowner, or did it apply to the leaseholder?—To both.

5742. Have rents risen very much in Birmingham?—Very much indeed, and very unequally in different parts of the town.

5743. Has that result arisen very much from the improvements in the town, the establishment of parks, and various other matters; have not those circumstances tended very much to increase the value of property in the locality of Birmingham?—I think it is likely that they have.

5744. The occupier generally occupying a house held on lease for a term usually of seven years, and not exceeding 14 years, from the original leaseholder, during the period in which he has had to pay the improvement rate, has not the occupier paid the larger portion of those improvements by which the property has been permanently increased in value?—Yes.

5745. At the end of his term of seven years, is not the effect of these improvements to increase the rent of the houses so improved?—I have no doubt that it is.

Mr. T. Avery.

5746. So that, under a new arrangement, if the occupier obtains a fresh lease, he will only obtain that fresh lease on increased terms of rent in consequence of such improvements; is that so or not?—I have no doubt it is so.

5747. Is not this the fact, that the occupier, under the circumstances mentioned by you of short leases, pays in the first instance the entire amount of the improvement rate; and in the second place, has to pay an increased rental at the end of his term of seven years, in consequence of such improvements for which he has already paid?—I think not apart from the improvements; the part that the occupier really pays consists of new and increased rates which have been imposed during that period. Then the increased value of rent in the town, though partly influenced by the administration of local affairs, is also occasioned by a great variety of other causes; the landowner at each time that he fixes the rent actually pays the greater part of the rates for the term for which it is let by the diminished rent which he receives. Therefore, when improvements take place, no doubt the landowner participates.

5748. My inquiry was especially as to the leaseholder, drawing a distinction between the leaseholder and the owner; and inasmuch as there are several terms of leases of 7 and 14 years in the 99 years, during that period does not the leaseholder derive the entire benefit; the expenditure in the first period, at all events, being paid entirely by the occupier?—No, he does not derive the entire benefit. The occupier paying a fixed rent for 7, 14, or 21 years, enjoys all the advantages of that outlay in return for the improvements that have taken place. Then as respects the 99 years' lease, the term is so remote that you can hardly perceive any direct interest; but during that 99 years, it must be recollected that sales frequently take place, and the improvement in the increased rack-rent very largely affects the sale of the ground-rent for the time being, and the reversion, and there is a very greatly augmented value in the reversion; so that during that time the original leaseholder in that form also participates in the profit.

5749. Is it not the fact, that the locality of premises, the advantages of the neighbourhood, of the parks, for example, and those kinds of circumstances, have a greater reference and relationship to the value of rent than the question of rates, whether the rates are high or low in a particular locality?—We are talking of rates pure and simple apart from the other circumstances, and we are assuming that the other circumstances are equal. The rates in Birmingham, parochial and municipal, are as near as possible 6 s. 6 d. in the pound, ranging from 6 s. to 6 s. 6 d. in the pound; and if you could have all those improvements without those rates, which of course would be impossible, you would have so much additional value of land and buildings to be participated in, as I think, by the owner and by the occupier; and I think to a very much greater extent by the actual landowner or the leaseholder, who pays a part of those rates in diminished rent; it would be a most unjust thing if both the landowner and the leaseholder did not contribute their respective proportion according to the value which they really enjoy.

5750. Supposing that the original landowner, who let his land, for example, on a ground-rent of 10 l., had to pay upon that 10 l., 3 s. 6 d. in the pound; and that the person who rented the house at 50 l. should pay his proportion, or if the rate were collected from him entirely, should be enabled to deduct from the 50 l. the rate of 3 s. 6 d. in the pound, and the leaseholder deducting from the person to whom he had to pay the 10 l. ten times 3 s. 6 d.; do you think that that would be an unjust or an improper method of distributing local taxation?—I do not think it would be unjust and improper, if it were limited to future contracts; but I think it would be very unjust and improper to entirely change the incidence of taxation under contracts that have been already made for fixed terms: then if the Legislature thinks fit to make any change in future, and determines that the leaseholder or the landowner shall pay in a direct form, and according to the benefit that he receives, I neither see any objection nor any direct advantage. It is certain to form a very important element in the incidence of the rent; and I should think that it would be very desirable, if that was done, to make it something in the form of a rate in aid, and that that should be extended to personal property. I am of opinion that the burden of municipal government, falling exclusively upon real property, is a wrong and injustice, and that it ought to reach personal property; but that is a point which, I presume, does not belong to this inquiry.

5751. The method which I have suggested is precisely the same method as is adopted with regard to the property tax, is it not?—Yes.

5752. Are you prepared to say, with regard to the property tax, that because by the action of the Legislature that tax has been imposed upon all parties who have an interest in property, in the case even of the property tax the owner pays the entire tax, or the main part of it?—The owner pays a part.

5753. If a man is to pay in proportion to the benefit he receives, is there any reason for saying that he pays more than that?—No, I think not; the amount of the income tax is so small, that it is not an appreciable element in the rent; it is only 3 d. or 4 d. in the pound.

5754. Mr. Seely.] As to the exemption of railways, is the whole of the railway subject to this exemption, or only that part of it which is used for through traffic?—Nominally, only that part of it which is used for through traffic; but I am very glad that the question has been asked, because it opens up a very serious affair; the words of the Act are so general that they comprehend almost everything. In all large towns, in addition to the main lines running through, there are vast stations, and the whole ramification of sidings and turntables, and the like. Those are really used, to a very great extent, for the distribution of traffic for local purposes, and therefore the exemptions never were intended to apply to them; but the words of the Act are so vague, that the judges have held that although they are used to a very large extent for local traffic, as well as through traffic, it does not alter their original incidence as part of the main line, and they have also extended the exemption to them. If that were not so, the grievance would be very much diminished.

5755. You stated that the owners were now represented by the tenants, and therefore there is not much advantage in the owners being represented; do you suppose that the representation would would be done away with entirely in case the ballot was adopted?—I do not think it would. The ballot is only a machinery whereby the votes are taken; it would not affect the substantial interest.

5756. How could the owner be said to be represented by his tenant if the vote was taken by ballot?—Because it would not alter the substantial interests, and whether he pays the rates directly or through his tenant, he has an interest in the economical administration of local affairs, and his interest is represented by the tenant. If you could add his representation to it, I do not know that it would very much affect the question; but I should be rather glad of such an extension of the responsibility than otherwise.

5757. You stated that 1,500 l. is the cost of collecting the borough rate and the improvement rate in Birmingham; would that cost be much increased if the poor rate and all the other rates were collected by the same collectors?—I do not think that it would be increased to the extent of the additional collection, but it would necessarily be increased to some extent.

5759. Mr. Wheelhouse.] You stated that you thought there ought to be two separate systems of collection for the borough and the parochial rates, but that there should be one value; have you ever thought how that one value would be best arrived at; do you know the Scotch system of the Valuation Office, as it is called?—I do not know the Scotch system; but I have already said that I think that we in Birmingham can best arrive at such a result by having a valuation board, at which the parochial authorities and the town council should be equally represented, and that they should appoint one valuer. It is perfectly impossible to have absolute uniformity of valuation, which lies at the root of all equitable assessment, unless you have one mind to make that valuation.

5760. You say, that you think it would be desirable that the same impact should be spread over all Birmingham, that is to say, so as to bring the poorer parts of Birmingham, just on the same level of contribution as the other parts?—I think so.

5761. For the poor rate, or for any tax?—Yes, it is so for municipal purposes now; but for parochial purposes, it is most unequal.

5762. So that you think, in other words, that it is right that the rule which has been applied in the metropolis, should be applied to Birmingham?—Most decidedly.

5763. Sir Hedworth Williamson.] Would you tax equally all ratepayers, whether owners or occupiers, for the improvement rate for parks, &c., whether they live on their own property near the parks and obtain a direct benefit, or whether they live at a distance and obtain comparatively no benefit from these parks; it would be very difficult to draw the line, would it not?—They do derive a direct benefit according to the extent to which their property is improved; and I have said that I think they do pay.

5764. I presume that the poorer class of the population of Birmingham who live three or four miles from the park, never go there at all?—It would be in their power to reach them, but of course you can only reach those that are actually within the area of the district.

5765. Do you think that everybody within the borough, ought to pay the same proportion in the pound for this improvement rate?—Upon their rateable value, I think they ought.

5766. Whether they use the park or not?—Yes; it is accessible to them to use it, if they think fit, and ultimately, we hope, to have other parks.

5767. Mr. Smith.] The rate for parochial purposes which you spoke of is a rate for the relief of the poor only, is it not?—That part which is strictly used for parochial purposes is for the relief of the poor; but the same authorities also collect a large portion, as I have said, to the extent as respects the parishes in Birmingham of 1 s. 3 d. in the pound for municipal purposes.

5768. But so far as parochial purposes are concerned, that rate is solely applied to the relief of the poor?—Yes.

5769. No other duty is charged upon it by the parish of Birmingham, but the relief of the poor?—Precisely so.

5770. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Supposing that the burden, which at present falls entirely upon the shoulders of the occupier, were shifted, it would necessarily follow, would it not, that the boards which distribute the money raised should be reconstituted?—I have said that the burden does not fall exclusively upon the shoulders of the occupier.

5771. It is raised, is it not, at this moment from the occupier?—Yes; but as respects a very large portion for the purposes of the Improvement Act to the extent of 339,000 l., it is directly paid by the owner in the shape of compounding.

5772. Supposing that the owner were made liable for his share so that, to use your own words, both the landowner and the leaseholder, and the occupier, should all contribute in a just proportion to the rate; have you at all considered the question of how you would constitute the board, so that there should be a fair representation of each of those interests at the board?—I do not clearly perceive how you would be likely to obtain a better representation than we now possess. The borough, as you know, is divided into wards, and the administration of the parish affairs is carried on by a vast number of persons amounting to 108 guardians under the old local Act; I think that that is a most inconvenient number, and I would alter it decidedly.

5773. How would you alter it?—I would diminish the number, and I would alter the area of election. The 108 guardians are elected from the whole of the parish, without districts of any kind as to the part of the parish, and so on, and the number to be elected is so great, that there is hardly any actual personal consideration.

5774. Chairman.] Are you still under a local Act as regards the poor?—Yes, we are under a local Act; I should diminish the number, and divide the parish into wards with representatives for each, and by that means try to obtain a more direct control; I think that that would be the tendency. This system was practically adopted at a recent election of guardians.

5775. Mr. St. Aubyn.] Speaking rather of the representation of the interest of the landowner, at present he contributes, you say, indirectly; but he is not rated directly?—No.

Mr. T. Avery.

5776. But under a change of the law by which he would be rated directly, how would you provide for his being represented at the board which should distribute the rates?—If the Legislature should make such a change as that, his name would appear in some of the books, and he ought to have his name so appearing, and to have a direct vote, whether a resident or not, if he paid.

5777. Mr. Corrance.] You have spoken, have you not, of the rating of railways as giving a great amount of dissatisfaction?—It gives with us most extreme and general dissatisfaction.

5778. Upon what data do you assess the railways within the town?—There is first a valuation of the land, the land is worth so much.

5779. Do you rate upon profits?—We take the gross receipts.

5780. With certain legal deductions?—Yes.

5781. You take the gross profit, and make certain legal deductions?—Yes; and then try to arrive at the fair value of the land by ascertaining what the proper nett value is after certain deductions have been made.

5782. Do you estimate those profits locally, or generally?—Almost entirely locally; but the general traffic has also to some extent to be included; but I do not thoroughly understand the precise details; I have already said, I think, that the questions are essentially distinct, as to whether the exemptions are themselves equitable, or whether the present mode of rating the railways is a true and proper system. If any better system could be discovered whereby their true value could be more accurately ascertained, I, for one, should be very glad to adopt it.

5783. Are the earnings supposed to be derived within the district rated?—I would rather that question should be answered by an expert than by myself; I believe that, mainly, it is the earnings within that district, but the through earnings also form an element whereby the value is endeavoured to be arrived at.

5784. Mr. Walter.] You stated, did you not, that the area of ground included in the borough of Birmingham was 8,500 acres in round numbers, and that the total assessment upon that area was 340,000 l.?—No, 1,092,000 l.; I said that the amount of compound property was 340,000 l., and the assessment is 1,092,000 l.

5785. And the area covered by railways is 520 acres?—Yes; about that quantity.

5786. The assessment of the railways would amount, would it not, to rather more than 50,000 l.?—The assessment of railways, canals, and land covered with water, the part of the borough that is subject to exemption, is just 44,000 l.

5787. Mr. Corrance.] You spoke of two district rates, a district rate and a general rate, and you proposed to divide one class of rates under one collection, and another under another; could you give us a classification of what rates do fall within the parochial area, and what come within the general area?—I have already given the different heads.

5788. Those that you have given us, you would classify as part belonging to the parish, and paid within the parish, and part belonging to the municipality?—Yes.

Mr. Robert Dudley Baxter, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. D. Baxter.

5789. Chairman.] You have given great attention, have you not, to the subject of rating?—I had occasion to consider it a great deal in 1866 and in 1867, at the time of the Reform discussion; and I also examined into it closely in the next year, when I was writing on the subject of taxation for the Statistical Society.

5790. In the course of your investigations, did you come in contact with persons connected with property as valuers and farmers, and with parish officers and householders?—I did; I made wide inquiries of all classes as to the facts about rates, and as to their opinion of the incident of rates.

5791. Did you find that there was a very general opinion that both owners and occupiers claimed that they paid the same rate; the owner maintaining that he paid it ultimately, and the occupier that he, the occupier, paid it?—Yes, that was the case; I found particularly that land agents and surveyors invariably said that the owner paid it; and I believe that that is from the fact that where they value for the purpose of rent in the revaluation of our estate, they invariably deduct the rates from the produce of the land or from the fancy value which they put upon a house; therefore, I came to the conclusion, that I must rather dismiss their evidence from consideration, and depend more upon the facts.

5792. That you must dismiss the evidence of valuers upon that point?—Yes; I thought that their views were not so much to be relied upon because of that habit.

5793. It would appear, I presume, that, in fixing the price, they actually do take the rates into consideration as outgoings which affect the value of the property?—Land valuers do that, but I consider that the theory rather than the strict practice of the country. Supposing that both owner and occupier agreed to be bound by the award of a valuer, no doubt that would be the fact, but in practice, the thing is often decided differently. It is decided by the custom of the country and by local demand and supply, and is very often a much more arbitrary rate than any land valuer would allow.

5794. In dealing with the subject, we must take into consideration not only the abstract theory of political economy, but your experience in examining into this subject is, that a great deal goes by custom?—A great deal goes by custom.

5795. And while it may be proved that either the owner or the occupier ought to pay the rate, occasionally you find in practice a variance from that general principle, according to the customs of particular localities?—Very much so. First of all, in the case of houses, take any locality, and you will find that the amounts of rent are settled by the custom of the locality, and not by the variations of the rates; if the rates are increased the house rent does not diminish, and vice versa. I had an instance of that in the East End of London during the time of the great distress in the East End, where the rates were very heavy, and the distress of the occupiers was very great. To my great surprise I found that the rents were not reduced at all; and so far from that, as is well known, notwithstanding all the distress, when the new Reform Act threw the the rates upon the occupiers, the owners actually raised their rents in the face of the distress.

5796. So far as the part of your evidence goes, if the owners do not put down their rents when circumstances seem to point in that direction, they at all events put them up on the opposite occasion?—Yes; they do put them up; and any change that takes place in the rating, I am afraid, usually goes to the disadvantage of the weaker party; and in this case it went to the disadvantage very much of the occupiers.

5797. Do you attribute that to the circumstance, that in London, on the whole, the supply of houses is deficient, and that therefore the landlord has very great power of throwing the burden upon the tenant?—That was not so in the East End, because when I used to go through the district there were houses standing empty by the score, and yet in the face of that they put up the rents.

5798. Did not the fact of their standing empty in scores partly come from the unwillingness of the landlord to establish a lower rate of rent?—That was so. I suspect that it was rather a little bit of trade unionism on the part of the landlords.

5799. And, as they had great power by that little bit of trade unionism, and through the fact that in many parts of London there was scarcely a house to spare, they were able to secure the rents being kept up?—Yes; I should say that the poor did obtain relief in one way, when the distress came on, that mechanics formerly in receipt of good wages, and living in two or three rooms, packed themselves into one, and so saved half their rents; but that was the only way in which they could get any relief.

5800. As far as occupiers go, is it your experience that they generally consider that they pay the whole of the rates?—They do in many cases, and many occupiers of farms do; and no doubt occupiers generally consider that they are paying the rates.

5801. What is your own opinion, keeping, in the first instance, to houses, as to the persons on whom the rate falls; do you consider that it falls exclusively on the owner, or exclusively on the occupier, or that it is borne partly by both?—I think that there can be no doubt that it falls upon both. I think that the rent of a house is fixed by a combination of two circumstances: the first is the local custom of the place, and the second is the supply and demand; and any great increase of rates, or existence of rates, would modify the supply and demand, and so act upon the house; but the rent of a house is not reduced, as I said before, on any increase of the rates. For instance, in such a locality as Hampstead the way in which it would act would be that the owners would refuse to reduce their rents, but the occupiers would go to some other locality, and then after a time there would be a great number of houses left vacant, and the rents would come down. I have known that occur within my experience several times; so that I drew the inference that rates do fall in a considerable measure upon the owner; but that they also fall in part upon the occupier, because the occupier takes at a sort of haphazard rent, and therefore must have to pay some part of the rates, though he has not allowed for them.

5802. When there was an increase of rate, the occupier would consider whether it was worth his while to stay in the locality and pay the increased rate, or whether he would leave it?—Yes, that is so.

5803. Then the occupier in most cases, or, at all events, the better class of occupiers, would pay the increased rate rather than go to the expense of leaving the neighbourhood?—Yes; that is very commonly the case, because a man says the increase of rates is not sufficient to counterbalance the very great inconvenience of removing my furniture and changing my locality. I have only heard of one instance where the increase of rates did really, at once, reduce the rents; but it is not of my own knowledge. I was told it by a person well acquainted with the place, that, during the distress in Deptford, the rates went up to some very high figure indeed, something like 8 s. to 10 s. in the pound; and that the landlords lowered their rents through the greater part of the town.

5804. Would you hold this, that it is important to distinguish, in the first instance, between the rates which were in existence at the time when the contract for the lease is made or for a tenure of any other kind, and the rates that are imposed subsequently?—Yes.

5805. As regards the rates in force at the time, they are more or less taken into consideration, I presume, in forming the contract for the lease?—I do not think they are, by the generality of the occupiers of houses. I do not think that the generality of occupiers take much care what the rates are. They know about what the rent is in the locality or situation, and they make their own bargain for less or more, without regard to the rates.

5806. If there was a street of which one side was in one union and the other side in another, and one was highly rated and the other less rated, would not that distinction make a difference in the rates?—Yes, I grant you that; and I remember Mr. Harcourt was telling me one day that he had a case in point. He wanted to take a house, and he found it was 10 l. lower on the one than on the other side of the street, and when he asked the reason, he was told that it was because they were in different unions and had different rates; such a very glaring thing as that becomes known to the people who let houses, and sometimes is allowed for; but in the general run, within the boundaries of the union, it makes very little difference whether there is a rise or fall.

5807. Have you had any instances under your notice where there are other charges upon land besides the rates, and how far they are taken into consideration in making a lease, the commutation of tithes for instance; we have had cases stated to the Committee, in the City of London, where they have been as high as 2 s. in the pound, and where it has only been discovered after the lease has been signed; have any such cases as that come before your notice?—No, I have not had any case like that. As regards land tax, I have not had any cases of high land tax under my notice; it has generally been a small tax, but the land tax is very oppressive in some localities where it was originally assessed on a high valuation.

5808. It is very oppressive in some portions of London, is it not?—I do not know that it is in London; I know that it is in the country.

5809. Would not those be questions which would be taken into consideration by the occupier, pier, before taking a house?—He might or might not take them into account; but it is often taken on a sort of haphazard guess at the value.

5810. As regards the original rate made at the beginning of the contract, are you not of opinion that a portion of that is borne even by the ground landlord, when the ground landlord makes his first bargain, or when there is a new arrangement with the ground landlord?—If you take merely the ground landlord who has a quit rent, by which the plot of ground is held, I daresay it may enter into it in some indirect way; but it hardly enters directly into the consideration of what should be the ground rent.

5811. Would not a very considerable proportion be thrown upon the ground landlord, where the ground rent stands in a very great proportion to the building rent?—Yes, no doubt.

5812. And where the ground rent is very small, the proportion borne by the ground landlord would be very small?—Yes.

5813. But if the ground rent is very high, then a greater proportion of the rate might be thrown upon him?—Yes.

5814. Have you ever consulted the authorities on political economy upon this subject?—Yes, I have.

5815. Can you state to the Committee what the received view has been upon the subject?—The received view as regards houses is, that there are two rents paid; the one the ground rent; and the other what is called the building rent. Adam Smith, whom I have brought with me, gives that very clearly; and in book 5, chapter 2, "Taxes upon the Rents of Houses," he states that "The building rent is the interest or profit of the capital expended in building the houses," and is "everywhere regulated by the ordinary interest of money." And he concludes that the rates on that must necessarily fall upon the occupier; because he says if they reduced the rate of profit below the average rate of profit in the trade, there would be a cessation of the supply of houses, and the demand would increase, till the rents would rise up to the point in which it was thrown upon the occupier. That is concurred in by M'Culloch and by Mill, very decidedly, and is the received doctrine in political economy.

5816. Have you the passage in Mill with you?—Yes, I have.

5817. Will you state it very shortly to the Committee?—As regards houses, he says, in the chapter on Direct Taxes, book 5, chapter 3, section 6, "The rent of a house consists of two parts, the ground rent, and what Adam Smith calls the building rent. The first is determined by the ordinary principles of rent;" but as much of the rates as are a tax upon the building rent must ultimately fall upon the consumer, in other words, the occupier; and he repeats the argument which I have stated of Adam Smith.

5818. Then the substance is this, that the way in which the taxes will fall upon the ground or upon the house depends upon the ratio of the capital which is borne by the one to the other, and if the capital which is put into the house is large, it will bear a great portion of the rates?—Yes.

5819. But if, on the other hand, the ground rent were very high, with a very small cottage built upon it, the cottage would bear very little of the rates, and the ground rent would bear a greater proportion?—No doubt that is, theoretically, the rationale of it, but, of course, that is liable to very great variations in practice; and I think that building rent has a tendency to acquire the nature of ground rent in the older houses, so far as rates are concerned.

5820. Have you ever worked out yourself how the proportions would be borne if you had a house of which the ground rent was half the value, and the rates were exceedingly high?—No, I have not; there is this difficulty in bringing that theoretical rule into practice, namely, that the owner of the reserved ground rent has his ground rent fixed at the beginning almost before the rate question comes into full play, and the reserved ground rent is unalterable throughout the lease; and therefore a great deal more on that account is thrown on the building rent which comes afterwards.

5821. In fact, by the system of 99 years' building leases, the ground landlords have made made an exceedingly good bargain?—I think they have.

5822. They have escaped the growing local taxation?—Yes, they have; and that growing local taxation has been a very serious thing.

5823. When leases fall in, and there is a renewal of the term, then the rates come into play, and have to be paid, in part, by the ground landlord?—Yes; but he does not feel it, because he gets such a great accession of property at the time, that it is next to nothing. It is like the succession duty on property that a man comes into on a predecessor's death.

5824. But so far as houses are concerned, the heavy rates paid upon houses act as a discouragement upon the capital to be put into the building trade?—No doubt they are a great discouragement to it.

5825. Where the ground has once been taken, and it is a question of pulling down cottages and building up houses on the same land, which would be rated very heavily, it would operate, would it not, in such a manner as to diminish the expectation of profit?—Yes, it would.

5826. Where a man buys fresh land and puts fresh houses upon it, he is able to calculate what he can afford to give for the land?—Yes.

5827. But if it is already covered with houses, and there is an existing agreement, if he wants to change the houses from one class into another, the rates would affect him very much?—Yes, they would.

5828. If a man had got some small cottages, and were to pull them down and rebuild upon the same land, one of those large high buildings like Sir Sidney Waterlow's, which have a vast number of tenements in them, the rates would have to be borne almost exclusively by himself?—Yes, as long as the lease lasted, no doubt that would be the fact.

5829. Will you state in what respect you consider the case differs as regards land, taking the doctrine that you have laid down as regards houses?—As regards land no doubt the rates come more upon the owner than they do in the case of houses; Adam Smith considered that they fell almost exclusively upon the owner, but in a later part of his chapter on that subject, he puts in the exception, that you must take into consideration that part of the rent is derived from improvements, and would be on a different basis; that idea has been very much more developed veloped by McCulloch and by Mill. McCulloch in his work on Taxation, the third edition, page 53, states that a portion of the rent of land consists of a return for the capital expended upon it, and he says, "There can be no reasonable doubt that in all old settled and highly improved countries this portion of the gross rent greatly exceeds that which is paid for the use of the inherent powers of the soil. In all populous and advanced countries it depends in a far greater degree on the outlays upon their estates." He and Adam Smith also laid down the rule that the rates upon what we may call the ground rent, the rent for the value of the land, fall upon the owner, and that the rates upon the outlay which has been made in the improvement of the land fall upon the occupier. But I think on re-valuations improvement rent tends to merge into ground rent, just as I said of building rent.

5830. Practically, the theory is the same as regards land and houses, but the rates fall more upon the occupier in the case of houses than in land, on account of the proportion of capital put into the buildings to the value of the ground being so very much greater?—Yes, it is much greater.

5831. When a man pays rent for a farm, the improvements bear a very small proportion to the value of the land itself, and then the proportion borne by the occupier would be very small?—Yes, that is often, but it is also constantly the case on large estates, and, in fact, on all well managed estates, that the occupier comes to the landlord and says to him, "Will you lay out so much money upon my farm, and I will pay you interest upon it, say five per cent., or six per cent.;" that is done time after time, and on that I consider that the occupier pays the rates and not the landlord, for the same reason that was given in detail by Adam Smith in the case of the building rent of houses.

5832. The improvements standing to land in the same relation that the building rent stands to the ground rent in the case of houses?—Yes, they do.

5833. That being the theory as regards land, do you think that, generally speaking, that theory is true in practice?—Yes, it is to a considerable extent. Of course it is, like the other, subject to very great variations; but in some parts of the country where the rent is the full value, his full share falls upon the owner; in other parts of the country, where the land is held at a low customary rent from year to year, the occupier is like a lessee, and pays more of the rates.

5834. Wherever rack rents are paid, it falls upon the owner, but in the other case it falls upon the occupier?—Yes, more falls on the occupier.

5835. Then the occupier pays the rates in this sense, that he pays heavy rates, but has an easy rent in the second case?—Yes, that does happen. But if a tenant is over-rented he also pays more than his share of the rates.

5836. Is it your opinion, from your inquiries, that a considerable portion of the country is held under leases or agreements where the rent is not rack rent?—The great estates are not rack rented. All estates when the property change hands are put up to valuation, but the great estates are let very much below the rack rent.

5837. In your opinion, would the question of the occupier paying the rates depend a good deal upon the frequency or infrequency of changes of rent?—No doubt it does.

5838. But changes in rent are not very frequent on large estates generally in the country, I believe?—No; tenancies continue for 100 or 200 years in the same family.

5839. Mr. Hunt.] Not always at the same rent?—No, but still it is raised in a much more gradual way than if it were done, as on the Scotch system, by leases, which are always revalued at the end of the term.

5840. Chairman.] Are you acquainted with the Scotch system at all?—Not much, but I sometimes am in Scotland.

5841. Is it your impression that the rent is changed more frequently in England than in Scotland?—Less frequently in England than in Scotland.

5842. And the consequence is that the fluctuations in the rates have been borne to a greater extent by the occupier?—Yes.

5843. The incidence of the rate on the occupier is to a certain extent a consequence, is it not, of his favourable terms as regards the rent?—Yes, and is also a consequence of unfavourable terms.

5844. If there were a fair competition for farms, and the granting of leases depended simply upon that competition, would not the rates come out of the pocket of the owner almost immediately?—Yes, the greater part of them, if the rent is adjusted to the fair market value.

5845. What I mean is this, if a man is looking for a farm, he will not give the same amount of rent for a farm where the rates are heavy, as he would for a farm where the rates are less?—No, certainly not.

5846. Then so far as competition or free trade in farms prevails, the rates will come out of the pocket of the owner?—Yes, that is so.

5847. But it is owing to the tenants in many cases holding their farms below the rack rent, that they have to bear the increased local taxation, which is so heavy?—Yes, owing to their low customary rents, which are like rents on a favourable lease.

5848. Do you think that the occupiers would be willing to get rid of the increased burden of local taxation, by throwing it upon the owners at the expense of having all their rents revised?—I think that they would object very strongly to having an alteration of the law, which would, as its consequence, entail a general revision of rents.

5849. Might it happen that if the rates were thrown upon the owner, which might render it necessary to make a new bargain, in that new bargain they would not be so well off as they had been under the old bargain?—The result throughout the country, I have no hesitation in saying, would be this, that the owners might pay half the rates, but that the rents would be raised in considerably more than that proportion.

5850. Not because of the danger of an increase of rate, but because at present a great deal of land is held at rents less than the actual value?—Yes, that is so.

5851. And the owners would, no doubt, secure themselves by putting on a margin to provide against the increase of the rates?—Yes, they they would exact the full value, which would be more than the increase of rates.

5852. They would try to do so, would they not?—Yes, thrifty owners would do so.

Mr. R. D. Baxter.

5853. But if they tried to do so, it does not follow that they would be able to raise the rents in that proportion, does it?—No, it does not, but I do not think that they would do it to a very great extent, because I think that they look much less closely to it than the farmers do.

5854. On the principle that it does not make so much difference to them?—No, it is the habit of a farmer, it is part of his existence, to bargain, and make good bargains.

5855. And that is not the habit of landlords?—No; if you sent a gentleman and a farmer into the market with the same flock of sheep or cattle to sell, the one would bring a very different result out of it from the other.

5856. Do you admit the phrase as correct, that the owner would be able to throw at his will, if he chooses to do so, a certain portion of the rates upon the occupier?—Yes; he could increase the rent up to the full value, but not beyond.

5857. It is generally said that the owner would increase the rent, in order to cover himself against the risk of future rates; but is the owner in such a position that he can increase or decrease the rent at his will?—No, he could not do it, unless, as I say, the occupier is very much under-rented, and then other people would be willing to step in and take the farm.

5858. If the education rate were put on, where the farmers are rack rented, would the owner be able to put on the threepenny education rate upon his tenants?—No, I do not think he would.

5859. Of course if there is a margin, they might be able to change the rent, so as to include it; but where there is no margin of that sort, they would not be able to put it then upon the rent?—No; I was speaking of the case of some old rate being taken off, but this is the case of a new rate being put on.

5860. If some old rate were taken off, would it be followed at once by an increase of rent?—If it was a large abolition of rates, no doubt that would be followed by an increase of rent; but if it was small, then it would not.

5861. Thereby confirming what you have originally said, that the rates mainly come out of the pockets of the owner?—Yes, I think that they come mainly out of the pocket of the owner.

5862. The reductions in the rates being to his advantage, and the increase of rates being to his disadvantage?—Yes, in the main they are to his advantage. A greater proportion of rate, I think, comes out of the pocket of the owner, and a lighter proportion out of the occupiers in the case of farms.

5863. Would you consider it a desirable process, if it could be carried out, to throw one-half of the rates, or any portion of the rates, directly upon the owner?—Theoretically I should say that it was a very just and equitable thing, and if you were legislating with a tabula rasa, as they did in Scotland when the new Poor Law was introduced there, it would be quite the right thing to do, to put it one-half on the owner and one-half on the occupiers; but when you come to the old state of things, old customary rents, and old leases, then it becomes a question of whether the inconveniences of a change counterbalance the advantages that you would get out of it.

5864. The inconvenience of a change being the necessity for readjusting, to a certain extent, the existing rents?—Yes.

5865. On the other hand, is it not a disadvantage that there should be two people who fancy that they are paying the same rate?—No doubt it is; that is a very considerable hardship. And there is also this hardship, which is very much greater, the increase of rates falling upon the occupier.

5866. Would not that be met to a very great extent, by the risk from which the occupier has suffered so much being divided between him and the owner?—Yes, I quite subscribe to that, and I would be prepared to go further than that and say, that as to land the whole of the increase of rates should come upon the owner; so that it did not exceed one-half of the total rates; I mean that the gradual increase of rates upon a farm, that is to say, the new rates, might be put upon the owner, but they should not exceed one-half of the total rates for the time being.

5867. I understand you to think that that would be desirable, but to doubt whether it is possible to be done without very great disturbance?—I do not think it would occasion disturbance. If you took the present rates and divided them between the occupiers and the owners, that would necessitate a readjustment of rents all through the country; but if you simply enacted, that half or the whole of the new rates should fall upon the owner, there would not be that necessity for readjustment.

5868. Do you mean by new rates, the increase of the present rates, or were you thinking of new rates for new purposes?—I meant the increase over the present amount of rates in the pound, whether arising from old or new rates.

5869. Could you throw that upon the owner for the future where the owner has a contract that all rates and taxes should be paid by the occupier?—I do not think there would be an injustice in that; you cannot make any change without some disadvantage, and I do not think there would be an injustice in that.

5870. Where an owner has let a farm on a 21 years' lease on the condition that the occupier is to pay all rates and taxes, would it be fair to draw a line now and say, assuming, for instance, that 11 years of the lease have passed, that the increase of rates during the remaining 10 years of the lease, dating from now, should be borne by the owner?—You see the bargain is entered into, because it is the custom of the country; and you may call it a blind bargain between them. The increases in many cases were not at all foreseen, and therefore I do not see any hardship in putting them upon the owner. Let me take an instance; I am a shareholder in a colliery in Yorkshire, the Wombwell Colliery, which pays one quarter the rates of the whole parish; after the lease was entered into, suddenly somebody took it into their heads to propose a cemetery rate there, and they spent 3,000 l. upon the cemetery of that small village, one quarter of which for the whole of the term of the tenancy afterwards will come upon that colliery; it is a burden of 60 l. a year on the colliery, which was never foreseen when the bargain which made, and I do not see why it should be unjust that a part of that should have fallen upon the owner.

5871. Would you recommend that if any portion of the rate should in future be put upon the owner, there should be an enactment similar to that in the income tax, that it should be illegal for the occupier to contract to pay the rates?—Such an enactment would be necessary, if the law is is not to remain a dead letter. Let me mention another instance. It is now proposed by the legislation that the rates should be, to a certain extent, equalised over London. The effect of that will be that the occupiers, and in a very large number of houses the owners, at the East end of London will, by an Act of the Legislature which nobody could foresee, throw their burden upon the leaseholders, that is to say, the occupiers, of the West end of London. That is a burden which could not have been foreseen, and I think is one that ought very justly to be shared between the owners and the occupiers.

5872. In one case you have a distinct contract, but in the other you have not?—The contract is the same in both cases.

5873. There was no contract that the rates were not to be equalised, and so the risk remained which the owner might have to bear. But in the case of the leaseholder, who undertakes to pay all rates, there is an actual contract, and the owner might assume that he had covered himself all risk; does not that make any difference in your opinion?—Yes; the occupier covenanted that he would pay the whole of the rates, not foreseeing, and neither of them foreseeing, that there would be a change in the law in that respect; but if the law is to be changed to throw an additional burden upon property, why should not it be put upon the owner just as well as upon the occupier?

5874. You do not think that all those risks were in the owner's mind when he made this contract that all the rates were to be paid by the tenant?—I do not think they were. I have no doubt that if a man were bargaining for a house at Hampstead, supposing they were both on the ground, the owner would say to the occupier, "See what a light-rated place this is, and you may therefore not be afraid of the rent."

5875. Therefore you do not think that, as a matter of fact, occupiers take that into consideration?—No, I do not think that it does constantly happen, but still it would happen if the people come into contact and bargain over the ground.

5876. However, it is your opinion that, as regards the increase of rates, the Legislature might deal with existing contracts, and that they might fairly put the increase of rates from the present point upon the owners, to a certain extent?—I think so, very justly.

5877. In the same way as the income tax was placed upon the owners?—Yes.

5878. A witness has given his opinion here that it would be futile to put a clause into an Act throwing the rates upon the owner, to the effect that it should be illegal for parties to contract themselves out of it; would that be your opinion?—I think it would be necessary to put such a clause.

5879. You do not think that such a clause would be futile?—No, I think not; the income tax clause is not futile.

5880. Have you given your attention at all to the question, whether any administrative change, as regards the position of the owner in the administrative bodies, ought to be made if a proportion of the rate is put upon the owners?—That is to say, the owner ought to have votes in proportion to the burden thrown upon him.

5881. Ought he not to have some representation?—Certainly. Let me mention as regards the poor rate a fact that has come under my notice: in the elections for guardians under the Poor Law the owners have the power of claiming to vote as owners, if they choose, but, as a practical fact, they do not claim; they only claim where there is a hot contest, and they claim for a time; but throughout the greater part of the country the occupiers are the only people who are put on the rate, and registered by the overseers; the owners are only on the rate when they voluntarily come forward. Any change of the law as regards taxation ought to include, what I have lately given evidence before the Committee on County Registration, that it ought to include Parliamentary voters, namely, a registration of the owners by the overseers, just as the occupiers are registered.

5882. Have you given your attention at all to the question of the municipal and parochial franchise, and are you acquainted with the system of the registration of voters for those purposes?—Not for municipal purposes.

5883. But can you speak as to the election of guardians?—Only a little.

5884. As regards the voting in vestries; are you acquainted with that?—I am not.

5885. Mr. Walter.] In the course of your inquiries, have you found any difference of opinion to prevail with reference to the incidence of tithes?—No; that is such a small thing that I hardly ever heard it mentioned.

5886. But surely a tithe rentcharge of 6*s.* or 7*s.* in the pound you would not consider a small thing?—No; that would be very heavy; but I I have never come in contact with so heavy a tithe rentcharge as that.

5887. Has it not occurred to you to consider the question of tithes in connection with rates and other charges upon land?—No; because I have hardly ever come in contact with any high tithes.

5888. Are you not aware that in many parts of the country the tithes are considerable; in some cases upwards of 5*s.* in the pound?—No, I was not aware of that.

5889. Assuming that to be the fact, which I have known to be so, speaking from experience, have you any doubt whatever that the tithes, be they more or less, that are borne by the land, fall upon the owner?—No doubt about it.

5890. So far as the poor rates and county rates may be considered a fixed quantity, and the assessment upon which they are based also to a certain extent a fixed quantity, so far you have no doubt, I presume, that those charges are borne by the owner?—Yes, whenever the rent is anything like the value of the land.

5891. You do not see any distinction in principle, do you, between the incidence of tithes, regarded as a charge upon land, and the incidence of other rates?—No.

5892. Mr. Smith.] I think you mentioned that the owners raised their rents at the East end in the time of distress?—Yes, during the time of distress they did so.

5894. It has been alleged that the enormous expenditure of charitable money in the East end of London has attracted a large number of persons to go and settle there, and that that, possibly, has created a certain competition for houses; are you of that opinion?—No, I do not think that is so; the charitable money is increased by the imagination of the public to a very large extent; it bears no proportion really to what a man requires for his sustenance.

Mr. R. D. Baxter.

13 May 1870.

5895. With regard to the question of contract between occupiers and owners, you drew attention to the fact that the operation of the Poor Relief Bill would be to relieve the owners in the East end of London, and to impose a burden upon the West end of London; and you were of opinion that it would be right that that new burden thrown upon the shoulders of the occupiers in the West end of London should be borne in some measure by the owners of property; if that burden is borne by the owners of property, have not the owners of property at the East end a claim to the increased value of their property in the shape of rent?—It is very possible that they may assert it; they are not at all indulgent landlords there.

5896. Do you think that they will assert it?—I daresay they will.

5897. So that the relief will rather be to the owners, than to the occupiers, in the East end of London?—That no doubt is so; but still if it is just that the owner should pay less taxation, I think he ought to get that benefit; and it is not just to tax a man beyond his equitable share. Let me mention another point which I had forgotten before, and that is this: supposing you throw half the rates, or the increase of them (as I propose), upon the owner, however just it may be, I am bound to point out that the result will be considerably to increase the taxation on land and real property. For instance, in the metropolis such a change is very much advocated by the Metropolitan Board, and they do so distinctly, because they say that they will be able to lay additional rates; and so it would be throughout the country if they were divided; there would be additional rates put on, because the public would draw the inference that the increased number of shoulders were able to bear the increased burden.

5898. Would it not be much more difficult for the owners to exercise control over expenditure than for the occupiers?—Yes; they would not attend so regularly as the occupiers 5899. And they would not practically be represented to the same extent as the occupiers?—No.

5900. Then occupiers' power of spending the money would be not in the proportion of one-half, but of the whole?—No doubt, in the larger proportion.

5901. You suggested that any increase of the present burden of local taxation should be borne by the owner; the owner has already parted with his property for a given sum for a term of years, in all probability; in the great majority of cases, who will benefit by this outlay, as a rule?—That depends upon what the outlay is 5902. In the case of such an increase as you contemplate, sewers rates, poors rates, lighting, public improvement rates, and education rates?—Some of those clearly they would benefit by; for instance, sewers are essentially a landlord's duty.

5903. After he has parted with his property for a term of years for a given sum, you think that is his duty?—I think so.

5904. With regard to the new rate for education, what would you say?—The benefit would be shared, both by the landlord and the occupier, by the increase of education.

5905. But only as a member of the community; not that he would have any special personal interest in it?—Yes, he would, because the more educated the community is, the more likely the value of his property would be to rise.

5906. But that value could only arise at the termination of the lease?—Just so.

5907. A remote period, probably?—But still I think you are taking it on a different theory from mine. You take it on the theory that a man is not to be taxed unless he derives a benefit corresponding to the taxation. I took it rather on the theory that it was the duty of the subjects of the State to furnish certain benefits to the population in proportion to their property, and to pay on account of that duty, irrespective of the benefit or advantage that they themselves might derive.

5908. Mr. Birley.] You told us that you thought that the rates would not be usually taken into consideration as affecting rents, but how does this Hampstead Heath illustration agree with that, because you also gave us the case of a landlord meeting a tenant, and showing him a house, and telling him how low the rates were in that neighbourhood, to induce him to accept the house?—I said if he took him there, no doubt he would tell him that.

5909. And if he did, that would be a very powerful argument?—I mean to say that the custom of the locality would influence him. It is known that the Hampstead rates are low, and, therefore, the rents are customarily high; but still, what I meant to say in the other case is, that the rise and fall of rates are not taken into consideration in making bargains for letting houses.

5910. Does that apply to houses of a low class; say, 5 l. or 10 l. houses?—There it falls upon the owner now.

5911. Then there it does come into the rent distinctly?—Yes.

5912. You tell us, quoting from Adam Smith, that the building rent is regulated by the interest of money; but that is, of course, very complicated, because, though it applies to new buildings, it does not apply to old houses?—No; but the old houses are governed very much by the new.

5913. One neighbourhood may become unfashionable, and another neighbourhood comes into vogue, and those things influence rents, do they not, almost as much in old houses as the cost of building?—No doubt that is very much the case.

5914. And also the value of land is not always a matter of rent, because a builder like Cubitt would take land by the acre and dispose of it by the yard, and, therefore, his profit is very much influenced by the extra price that he gets for his land?—No doubt; but the Chairman was speaking about a large ground rent, and such a case as that occurred to my mind. The common case is that a builder takes a large quantity of land, and, therefore, gets it on very favourable terms, so that the ground landlord gets comparatively a small rent, and then the builder puts a large high palatial structure upon it, so that what has to bear the building rent is very much out of proportion to the ground rent.

5915. Speaking

5915. Speaking of covenants between occupiers and owners, that the occupier shall pay all the rates, are you not of opinion that that is convenient to both occupier and owner, inasmuch as the owner often resides at a distance, and has no sort of control over the rates, and the occupier residing on the spot is willing to take his chance? —That depends upon the class of houses which you speak of. If you speak of 5 l. or 10 l. houses in London, it is the other way; it is very much more convenient both for the owner, the occupier, and the overseer, that the owner should pay; but if you speak of a high class of houses then, no doubt, it is convenient that the occupier should pay; and it is convenient both to the owner and to the overseer; but where there is a considerable and sudden increase of rates it is not at all convenient to the occupier himself.

5916. Then, as regards those blind bargains and the income tax, where there is a clause which specially requires that no contract existing between the owner and the occupier shall prevent the occupier deducting the payment of the tax from his rent, do not you consider the income tax essentially different from rates; the income, or rather the property tax being paid as part of the imperial taxation?—You must go back to the time when the income tax was instituted. If you went back to the year 1842, it would be precisely similar to the prospective case that you are now contemplating as regards rates; leases had been taken of houses and land with covenants against payment by the owner.

5917. Is there not an essential difference between a tax which is taken from the owners of property and paid away into the imperial revenue, and a tax which is taken from the owners of property or from the occupiers for local rates?—No, because I consider that, for instance, the rates for the poor are really imperial taxation, although they are levied in a local manner; it would be different if you talked of the sewers rate or the highway rate.

5918. Mr. Gregory.] As I understand your argument with respect to the effect of rating upon property, it is this, that where rates are high in a neighbourhood, it effects a general depression of property in that neighbourhood as compared with one where the rates are low?—That is to say, the property is lower rented than it would otherwise be.

5919. But a temporary fluctuation of rates does not much affect the letting of houses during those fluctuations?—No, it does not.

5920. You are probably aware, are you not, of the usual rule as to the assessment of ground rents with respect to the value of buildings put upon the land?—I have not had much to do with ground rents.

5921. Are you not aware that a surveyor in laying out a building estate usually assesses the ground rent at one-sixth of the rack rent of the property?—I was not aware of the proportion.

5922. You are aware that there is a proportion?—Yes, I am aware that there is a proportion, but it is subject to great variation in bargaining.

5923. You say, do you not, that the rates upon improvements in the case of land fall upon the occupier, to a certain extent?—Yes, that is the theoretical rule laid down by the economists.

5924. We will take buildings and drainage; those are improvements generally effected by the landlord, and, as you say, the tenant pays an interest of 5 or 6 per cent. upon them?—Yes, that is a very common arrangement.

5925. And large sums, as we know, have been laid out in that way?—Yes.

5926. That gives an improved value, does it not, to the property?—Yes.

5927. And in case of a new assessment, the assessment would be raised in consequence of those improvements?—Yes, it would.

5928. On the other hand, the farmer derives a larger profit from those improvements, does he not, in consequence of having those improvements put upon the land?—Yes.

5929. Therefore the rate is not so much upon his rental as upon the addition to his profits; is it not?—Yes.

5930. It is on his profits, and not on his rent, in fact?—It has to be borne, of course, out of the profits.

5931. There is an increase of his profits in consequence of those improvements, is there not? —Yes.

5932. And this rate therefore is in respect of the profits that he makes from the improvements, rather than in respect of the rent that he pays for the land?—Yes, that is held by the political economists whom I quoted.

5933. The man who improves his land by skill and capital makes a larger profit from it?—Yes.

5934. And the rates come out of those profits? —Yes.

5935. And he is not so much assessed upon the rent as upon the additional profits which he effects by his outlay?—That is so. The effect of the principle of rating is very adverse to improvements on that account, because it diminishes the desire of the landlord, or the tenant either, to spend money upon their farms, knowing that they will be immediately rated upon the improvement, whereas if they put their money into any other investment they would not be rated, 5936. The rates are, in fact, according to the present system, an impediment to improvement, are they not?—Yes; that is very strongly argued by political economists; M'Culloch states the case very strongly.

5937. You say that a revaluation would be very much objected to by occupiers?—Yes.

5938. You would throw the new rates, up to one-half, upon the owner, as I understand you? —Yes, not exceeding half the total rate for the time being.

5939. Would not the tenant come every half-year on purpose to settle the account, saying, "I have paid so much for you in rates in the year 1870, this half year; now you must allow me half of that"?—He would say, "I have a right to deduct half that."

5940. And the man would have a right to deduct in every succeeding year so much more than he paid in the year 1870 in respect of rates?— Yes; either the whole, or half, as the Legislature might see fit.

5941. Do not you think that that would lead to considerable practical inconvenience? — No doubt it would, but still it is a question of a balance of inconveniences. It is at present a hardship and an inconvenience that the occupier should have to bear every increase; but were it a question of the expenditure of money, so far as the occupier is concerned, I have no doubt that he would be very glad indeed to bear the inconvenience venience for the sake of being relieved of the burthen.

5942. You know that a large portion of the land of this country is let upon agreements from year to year?—Yes.

5943. In that case he would have the power of determining his agreement, and coming for a new one?—Yes.

5944. By which the landlord would have the power of throwing that half upon the tenant in the shape of rent?—If it were a new burthen, I do not think he would, for supply and demand would prevent that if he had previously been at a rack rent; if a new burthen was imposed, and there was a new valuation, I do not think he would be able to throw it upon the occupier.

5945. It is the apportioning of the increase of an old burthen?—It is the apportioning of the increase of an old tax; it is a new amount, a new deduction to be taken out of the produce of the land; an increase of an old tax.

5946. That old tax, up to the present time, has been in the first instance, paid by the occupier, has it not?—Yes; every increase has been borne by the occupier.

5947. In the case of a reduction of rates, how would you deal with it?—No doubt there would be a difficulty in that case; but there are not a large number of reductions of rates.

5948. There have been very considerable reductions of rates, I think, in respect of land, have there not?—In the case of tenancies from year to year, that would adjust itself, because it would bring down the payment by the tenant below what the rack rent would be, and the owner would on the next opportunity raise his rent to counterbalance it.

5949. Would he not equally raise his rent to counterbalance the increased rate that you would throw upon him?—No, I do not think he would; because if I have made myself understood, he could only raise the rent when the rent is below the actual market value of the land; if the increase occurs when it is at its market value, then he cannot raise it; but if a decrease occurs at such a time, then he can raise it.

5950. You have been speaking, have you not, of a large number of estates where the land was not let at its market value?—Yes; and then, of course, it could be put upon the owner; but still there would not be any hardship in that, if they were paying less than the real value.

5951. How would you deal with a reduction in the case of leases?—There would be a great difficulty in that case.

5952. Do you say that those increased rates should be levied in the same way as the income tax?—That would be the only way to make it effectual.

5953. You are aware that the income tax is deducted from mortgages, and parties having charges upon the land?—Yes.

5954. Would you deduct this increase of rates in the same way?—No; I do not think I would.

5955. Why not?—That is a point which I had not considered before; but a mortgagee stands in a different position to a landlord as regards rates, and does not now ultimately pay any part of them, while a landlord ultimately does pay part.

5956. But they do not stand in a different position as regards income tax?—They do not.

5957. Why should they, as regards this increase of taxation?—There is no theoretical reason why it should be in one way more than another; but only the present practice. To change it might lead to a general demand of higher interest on mortgages, which would cause loss to the landowners.

5958. Do you not consider that putting the rates upon the owner would lead to an increase of rates?—Yes; I think it would, in the long run, lead to an increase of the total taxation upon land, and upon real property.

5959. Have you considered the question of the representation of owners if those rates were thrown upon them?—Yes.

5960. You propose to have them registered, do you, by the overseers?—Yes, by the overseers, just as occupiers are now registered.

5961. Then they would be in a certain proportion to the occupiers, would they not?—Yes; they only bear now a small proportion in actual payment, but they now have a right to be represented, and they have that right in respect of their virtually and ultimately paying a large proportion of the rates.

5962. We have been told that there would be considerable difficulty in putting them upon the register; are you of that opinion?—No doubt that is the case, both for parochial and for political registration; there is considerable difficulty till you have got an accurate register of the ownership of property throughout the country.

5963. Have you considered the proportion which the owners would bear to the occupiers upon the register in point of number?—It would be much smaller.

5964. In many cases, the owners would be absentees, would they not?—Yes.

5965. And men engaged in other occupations?—Yes.

5966. Would there not be great difficulty in getting them to attend to questions of local taxation?—Yes, there would be some difficulty; but I think it would increase their interest when they felt the pressure more directly.

5967. In some districts the owners of property are nearly all absentees, and you could not, I presume, get them upon the parochial board?—Not often; but if they did come, their opinions would have a great deal of weight, and they would be very much looked up to.

5968. But still they would be only individuals as regards voting?—Yes, by the scale of voting.

5969. Mr. Seely.] Do you not consider that an owner would let his property upon lease for less money if the tenant agreed to pay the rates present and future?—Yes, I dare say he would.

5970. Do you not, then, think that the effect of making the owner pay them in spite of the contract would be this, that the owner would be made to pay the rate twice, once in the reduction of rent, and a second time directly by the action of the Legislature?—That depends upon whether the increase had been foreseen or not. Take the case of that cemetery rate to which I have referred; that was a thing unforeseen: or take the case of the shifting of taxation from the East-end to the West-end; that was unforeseen; and I apprehend that that was not considered by the parties when they made their bargain.

5971. In making a bargain, would not the owner let his property for less if the tenant agreed to take the chance of an increase?—Yes, I daresay he might, if the proposal were distinctly put.

5972. Then,

5972. Then, clearly, would it not be the effect of making the owner pay that he would pay twice?—No; but the difference between us there is this: that you ask me the question in a general way whether he would. Certainly I say he might, because he would consider that there would naturally be a certain amount of increase; but neither of them, as I contend, could have foreseen the extraordinary and new burthens put upon them.

5973. The tenant upon my supposition took the chance and the landlord paid?—No; what he would take the chance of would be, not of the new burthens which the Legislature might impose, but of the poor rate and others which he foresaw at the time.

5974. Do you limit your remarks entirely to new burthens?—Yes, I should limit them in that respect to new burthens.

5975. It would be monstrously unjust, would it not, to interfere with existing contracts with respect to old burthens?—But you must make a general rule there. No doubt in any new rule you must come upon cases of hardship, and that would be one of them where the old tax got increased by the operation of the new rule, and part of it fell upon the landlord; I do not see how you can avoid that if you are to remedy the present great hardship of all the increase falling on occupiers.

5976. Colonel Brise.] Speaking of the land tax, I think you said that the occupier does sometimes take the land tax into consideration; but does not the owner always pay the land tax?—The owner has to pay the land tax, but it is a very common thing for the occupier to pay it by agreement.

5977. That is not illegal, is it, in the same way as any agreement with respect to income tax?—No.

5978. Is it not your opinion that the occupiers are much better administrators of the rates than the owners would be, especially in country districts?—They are much closer administrators.

5979. And much more economical?—Yes.

5980. Would that be applicable to the metropolis as well as to country districts?—When you come to the metropolis, I am sorry to say in some of the parochial boards you come upon a tendency to jobbery, and the remark must be qualified as regards them by that possibility.

5981. Then your observation is principally applicable to the country?—Yes.

5982. You recommend that half the increase of the new rate should fall upon the owner, and you say that the occupier paying the increase of the rate is an injustice upon the occupier; but surely if the whole increase is an injustice upon the occupier, half the rate is also an injustice upon the occupier?—No; what I said was, that I thought it would be just to put, not only half the increase upon the owner, but the whole of the increase upon the owner, not exceeding half the total rates upon the property for the time being; so that the effect would be, that supposing the rates were 4 s. in the pound, and they were increased to 6 s., the 2 s. would go upon the owner; and supposing they were increased to 9 s., then only 4 s. 6 d. would go upon the owner.

5983. You would put half the increase of rate on the owner, and half on the occupier?—No; I should put the whole of the increase up to half the total burthen upon the property at the time.

5984. If you put the increase only on the owner you might carry it out in this way; you might say the average rate on this occupation was 2 s. 6 d. or 3 s. in the pound, and any increase upon that might be placed upon the owner and get it in the same way as the income tax, the occupier deducting it from the rent; but how would you carry out your proposed system of putting half of all the rate, including the increase upon the owner?—Because every locality would know its rate, in the year of grace in which such a law was passed, and that would be the standard rate, say 3 s. in the pound; then as soon as it got above 6 s. in the pound, the double, that would be another point to start from; when you got above 6 s., the whole rate would be divided half and half; it is merely a date in the one case, and a date in the other case.

5985. You think that all new rates might be put upon the owner?—Yes, I would do it with that view, to diminish the hardships upon the occupier; at present the whole increase falling upon the occupier.

5986. Is there any kind of rates that you would specially allude to, that you think the owner ought to pay?—The sewers rate is one which is peculiarly an owner's rate.

5987. Have you ever given any consideration to the subject of putting the county rate upon the owner?—Yes, that is another which it would be fair to put upon the owner if you dealt with it in that way; there are two or three ways of dealing with the rating question; first, by putting half of all rates on the owner; second, by putting half, or all the increase, on the owner; third, by putting the whole of certain specific rates, like the county rate, upon the owner.

5988. Would you recommend that the whole of the county rate should be placed upon the owner?—I should not object to that mode being taken.

5989. Chairman.] But do you prefer your plan?—I think my plan would be a more simple rule for the whole of the country; the county rate would only apply to a portion of the country in any great degree.

5990. Colonel Brise.] I think you said that the result of throwing the burden of the rates upon the owner and the occupier would be a great increase of taxation on real property; will you explain how you think that increase would be arrived at?—Take the case of London; supposing you divided the rates between the owner and the occupier, you would immediately have an additional rate by the Metropolitan Board of Works, because they would then say the maximum burthen of taxation was not reached, which they now say has been reached; under the proposed law they would be very glad to have them half and half, because then they would say the maximum was higher, and that they would get the maximum possible taxation; therefore they might raise their taxation till they got what they wanted.

5991. Your answer, I presume, is not applicable to all the country, but to London?—I only take that as an instance. I think the same thing might occur in the country too.

5992. Sir M. Lopes.] Do you think that sufficient benefits or advantages would accrue from any alteration to justify any different arrangement being made than at present exists?—Why I would advocate the alteration is this, that Parliament is now, year by year, asking for increased expenditure from the country, towards very very laudable objects; the better maintenance of the poor, the police, and all sorts of luxuries of legislation which are very desirable to have, and I think it is not fair that the whole of that should be borne by the occupier; if things had gone on in the old rut, merely an increase arising from increase of population, then it would have been very fair to maintain the old system of things.

Mr. R. D. Baxter.

5993. I understand you to say that any alteration, such as has been suggested, would rather tend, in your opinion, not only to increased rates, but also to increased rents?—If you worked it by the first method which was proposed, that is to say, by throwing half the whole of the rates at once upon the occupier, then I say, that would necessitate a certain alteration of rents; if you took the second way of dealing with it, that is, putting merely the increase upon the owner, it would not, I think, necessitate any alteration of rents; if you take the third way that has been hinted at, that of putting particular rates, the county rate, the police rate, or any other, upon the owner, it would, or would not, make a revaluation necessary according as the amount was large or small.

5994. You are decidedly of opinion that it would neither be advisable nor justifiable to make any alteration with regard to the present charges?—I see very great disadvantages and difficulties in doing it.

5995. I understand you to say that you think by disturbing existing arrangements, it would very probably tend to the disadvantage of the present tenants?—It would, instead of being a relief to them.

5996. That estates might probably be revalued, and the result of that would be, that they would not only have to pay the rates, but very probably an increased rent?—They would have to pay an increased rent, more than sufficient to counterbalance the relief in rates.

5997. Do you think that any alteration would tend to any economy of rates?—No, I do not think it would; the tendency would clearly be the other way, to less economy.

5998. You stated, did you not, that in your opinion, it would be right to let the rates fall upon the owner?—A certain part of the rates.

5999. And further, you thought that the rent depended not only upon the value of the land, but upon the capital which is applied to the land?—Yes.

6000. Is it in your opinion fair or just that the capital which is applied to the land should be rated in the same way that the rent which represents the value of that land?—No.

6001. In the case of improvements made by means of a money investment, is it fair, in your opinion, that those improvements should be rated to their full extent as they are now every three years?—I do not quite see how you can avoid it without a total remodelling of the law, and I have not considered the question of such remodelling; but it is one of the hardships, no doubt, that arise out of the present system.

6002. You are aware that, in England, the Union Assessment Committee revalue the land every three years?—Yes.

6003. Are you aware that, in Scotland, there is no arrangement of that kind at all; that when a man takes his farm, any improvements which he makes upon it are not rated at all during his tenancy?—I was not aware of that; but that is a very fair rule if it could be adopted.

6004. You think it would be very desirable that the same arrangement should take place in England?—I do not think that it would be unfair at all. I see great difficulty in carrying it out; but if it possibly could be carried out, I think it would be most fair and desirable.

6005. Is it not your opinion that the present system of rating those improvements made by the occupier is an unjust system, because it is rating his personal property; if the tenant, for instance, invests 1,000 l. in his holding, is it, in your opinion, fair and just that he should pay an additional 11 per cent. (which is the sum fixed) upon that outlay?—No, certainly not.

6006. So that, in your opinion, it is a heavy discouragement to the investment of capital in the improvement of land?—Yes, it is so.

6007. Therefore to that extent, it tends to the diminution of produce?—To the diminution of outlay, and consequently of produce; but then comes the difficulty, supposing that you make that exception in favour of land, what rule are you to make as regards the improvement of houses.

6008. Does not the same principle hold good, that if the rates are very high upon houses, the rents of those houses are very much decreased, and therefore the owner of such houses would get less per-centage for his investment?—Yes; as regards the poor, it is a distinct discouragement to pulling down old houses and building improved cottages for them.

6009. And therefore, to that extent, it is a discouragement to improved accommodation for the poorer classes?—Yes, it is.

6010. You mentioned the difference of valuation between two districts in London, the east and the west, and you thought it would be fair and just that the occupier should have power to deduct half those increased rates from the owner which had been recently put on by what has been called the equalisation of the poor rate in the metropolis?—Which have been put on, and the more serious ones which are in contemplation now.

6011. Do not you think that those occupiers should also have the benefit of getting some diminution from the ground rent as well?—Yes.

6012. As this is a new arrangement, do you see any reason why the owner of the ground rent should not pay something more than he did previously, on account of this new regulation with reference to the common fund?—Yes; the fair way would be to adopt the law which I believe is in force in Scotland, and I think in Ireland, namely, that you deduct the rate by a poundage from the superior landlords according to the amount of their rents.

6013. You think that all parties ought to feel the alteration in those charges?—Yes.

6014. Mr. Hunt.] Would you distinguish rates into two classes—namely, those which you described as involving a duty to the State, and those which may be considered as remunerative rates?—I have not classified them, and I do not know that I could now, without looking them over and considering them.

6015. But you would accept the principle that they must be divided under two heads, would you not?—Yes; no doubt there are two classes.

6016. You spoke of certain rates as involving a duty duty to the State?—Yes, for instance, the maintenance of the poor.

6017. And there are many rates, are there not, which are simply remunerative rates, which may be considered as investments?—Yes.

6018. Do you not think that one might treat those two classes of rates differently, as regards apportionment between owner and occupier?—I should be afraid of getting into great complication in that. There is always a difficulty in practically carrying out any new regulation. Everything must be very simple, and therefore hardship is inevitable in any new arrangement on that account.

6019. With regard to throwing half the rate upon the owner, I understood you to say that you thought it would be attended with a general increase of charge?—If you throw part of the rates upon the owner, I think it would.

6020. Is that because there would be less inducement to economy on the part of those who administer the rates?—Partly that there would be less inducement to economy on their part, and partly that those who lay the taxes, whether local or imperial legislators, would consider that they had a broader basis that could bear taxation.

6021. They would have fewer individuals to reach; the class of owners is less numerous than the class of occupiers, and therefore there would be fewer persons to cry out?—Yes; no doubt those who would cry out would be very much less numerous.

6022. There would also be the consideration that you were taxing a class of people who had larger incomes out of which to bear the burthen?—Yes, there would be that feeling.

6023. With regard to the poor rates, do not you think there might be this danger, that if the owners had to pay half the rate, the occupiers might be more reckless in throwing people out of employment when prices were low?—No doubt that might be the result, and, I believe, has been the result to some extent, by the widening of the basis of taxation in unions, transferring it from the parish to the union.

6024. Therefore the inducement to keep down the rates is less than it was before the passing of the Union Chargeability Act?—Yes, it is.

6025. And that inducement might be still less if the burthen was shared between the owner and the occupier?—Yes, that would be another change in the same direction.

6026. I understood you to give it as your opinion, that if there was such a change made in the law that a very substantial portion of the charge was thrown upon the owner, it would give rise to a general readjustment of rent?—No doubt of it.

6027. And that the landlord if he was well advised, would raise his rent to a sufficient extent not only to pay for the actual rate, but to cover any increase of rates which might be anticipated?—What he would do would be this, he would go to a valuer to know whether he could recover it, whether his tenant was under-rented, and the valuer would advise him as to the fair rent that the tenant ought to bear; that is to say in other words, the valuer would advise him to bring his rent up to the market value of the land.

6028. Take the case of the education rate, there is a Bill now before Parliament which proposes to rate occupiers within certain limits for the purpose of supplying education to the poor; and supposing that concurrently with that Bill, there was one on the table for transferring part of the charge to the owner, do you not think that in the readjustment of his rent, he would take sufficient margin to cover the educational rate?—I should connect my former answer with that; I do not think that taking a margin is exactly what would be done; I would rather say, as I said just now, that if a man found it worth his while to alter his present rent, the tendency would be to bring it up to the market value for the time being of the land.

6029. But, at present, the occupier is for the most part abler to bear the fluctuating increases of rates, because, for the most part, he is not rack rented?—That is so in England.

6030. With regard to towns and to the metropolis in particular, I understand from your evidence that you wish to throw a part of the charge upon ground landlords?—I think it fair that they should bear part of the charge, which is assessed on owners in general.

6031. How do you propose to treat them; have you considered any machinery by which the ground rents could be reached without doing injustice to the ground landlords?—As regards the machinery for reaching them, the machinery I mentioned before, which is in use in Ireland and Scotland, would be effectual in this case, namely, authorising the occupier and every successive landlord to deduct from his superior landlord a poundage on account of his rent.

6032. Supposing the ground rent was very large in proportion to the rates payable now by the occupier, or divisible between the parties, might it not be very unfair to the ground landlord, supposing those rates were mostly what I call remunerative rates, rates for improvements, if he had to pay such improvement rate, before he could derive any benefit himself from the improvements which had been created?—No doubt that would be one of the hardships which would be inseparable from such a change; but still, when you make a change, you must make it affect everybody equally, although there may be hardship in particular cases.

6033. Supposing it was decided by law that the poor rates should be equalised, it would be the duty, of course, of the owner to bear his share of the burden, but putting aside the case of poor rates, and taking the case of strictly improvement rates, the ground landlord, as the ultimate owner, could derive no possible benefit till his leases fell in?—No doubt that is so.

6034. Could you reach him in any way by charging a deferred annuity upon the land and raising money upon that deferred annuity, and that deferred annuity to take effect when the leases fell in, and the ground landlord got the benefit?—I do not quite understand how that would work.

6035. What I was suggesting was this, something added to the rate, by reason of it being deferred, and that the money might be raised upon the security of an annuity charged upon the land, but not to commence until the lease fell in?—I am afraid that it would be too complicated to work out.

6036. If it could be worked out, you could avoid all injustice to the ground landlord, would you not?—Yes.

6037. You then would tax him when his benefit accrued?—Yes, that would be the effect of it. I should like to mention an historical point which I have come across that rates when first instituted (because rates are almost coeval with history in England), used to be levied upon the occupiers, but the occupiers were at that time the owners. In the earlier stages of our history tenancy was exceedingly uncommon, and people lived, in towns or in the country, generally in their own houses.

6038. How far are you going back?—To very early times. I mean the times of the Henries and the Normans. Dating from the 15th century backwards, the old burghers, if you might call them so, were generally occupiers of their own freeholds or copyholds, because things were held then very much by copyhold tenures, or base tenures, as they were called; but still they were virtually owners, and it is only as history advanced, and as occupation became distinct from ownership that the burdens were dissociated one from the other.

6039. Mr. St. Aubyn.] You mean to convey that about the beginning of the 16th century tenants began to be rated?—I do not fix any particular date, but the tendency has been from the earliest periods of our history downwards, no doubt, to separate the two; in early times the two were almost identical, and the owner then was taxed as the occupier.

* Poor Rate receipt and population included in City of London.

† Acreage and population included in St. Margaret, Westminster.

‡ Area of Metropolis = 122 square miles and 360 acres.

§ The annual returns from which the sums in the columns of "Receipts from Local Taxation" are taken, do not in every case include the costs of collection and other incidental expenses of Vestries, &c.

‖ The amount here inserted as poor rate is said to be in error, as, on the part of the Hon. Society of Gray's Inn, it is stated they have never paid a poor rate, or any consideration in lieu thereof. A sum (not included in this Table) has been annually paid by the Society to the Holborn District Board of Works, as a donation towards paving, &c.

John Pollard, Clerk of the Board.

SEWERS COMMISSION.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, to Our most dear Cousins, Francis Thomas De Grey, Earl Cowper, Charles, Earl of Romney; John Stuart, Earl of Darnley; Our most beloved Cousin and Councillor, John Robert, Viscount Sydney; the Right Reverend Father in God, Joseph Cotton, Lord Bishop of Rochester; Our well-beloved and faithful William Samuel, Lord Wynford, Charles Morgan, Lord Tredegar, Our beloved and faithful Sir Thomas Marvon Wilson, Sir Percyvall Hart Dyke, Sir Joseph Henry Hawley, Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, Sir Frederick Currie, Baronets; the Bailiff of Romney Marsh, the Expenditors of Five Waterings, William Urquhart Arbuthnot, Henry Hulse Berens, Sidcup Richard Benyon Berens, Frederick Barne, Robert Bradford, James Chapman, William Greenwood Chapman, Henry Chapman, John Hales Calcroft, Frederick Pearce Campbell, Charles Colyer, Thomas Colyer, Edward Colyer, Southfleet Maitland Dashwood, Francis Hart Dyke, William Hart Dyke, John Alfred Edmeads, William Fleet, William Hussey Fleet, Thomas Horn Fleet, John Huggins, Edward Hall, Richard Jones, John Malcolm, John Wingfield Malcolm, Charles Wickham Martin, Charles William Minett, James Minett, Frederick William Pigou, John Stuart Roupell, James Stuart Roupell, Oswald Smith, junior, John Shaw, John Tasker, William Tasker, William Tasker, junior, William Waring, Colerain Vansittart, Robert Wilks, William Wheatley, William Cracroft Fookes, Frederick Mortimer, Lewin Richard Saunders, Frederick Stoneham, Charles Samuel Umfreville, Esquires; William Whitton, Allen, Edward Allen, Henry Morland, Austen Henry Brown, Woolwich; Andrew William Burnside, George John Blomfield, Richard Neville Cornwall, William Henry Edmeads, John Egerton, Thomas Hart Dyke, William Gardner, John Hallett Hotham, Frederick Heberden, James King, Charles Augustus Samuel Morgan, Francis Murray, Frederick William Murray, George Rashleigh, Henry Rashleigh, George Cecil Renouard, Richard Salwey, George Frederick Goddard, and George Leopold Langdon, Clerks: Greeting. Know ye, That forasmuch as the walls, ditches, banks, gutters, sewers, gates, calcies, bridges, streams, and other defences by the coasts of the sea, and marsh grounds lying and being within the limits extending from Lombard's Wall to Gravesend Bridge in Our county of Kent, or in the borders or confines of the same, by rage of the sea flowing and reflowing, and by means of the trenches of fresh waters descending and having course by divers ways to the sea, be so dirupt, lacerate, and broken, and also the common passages for ships, ballangers, and boats, in the rivers, streams, and other floods within the said limits, or in the borders or confines of the same, by means of setting up, erecting, and making of streams, mills, bridges, ponds, fish-garths, mill-dams, locks, hobbing wears, locks, and floodgates, or other like letts, impediments, or annoyances, be letted and interrupted, so that great inestimable damage for default of reparation of the said walls, ditches, banks, fences, sewers, gates, gutters, calcies, bridges, and streams: And also by means of setting up, erecting, making, and enlarging of the said fish-garths, mill-dams, locks, hebbing-wears, locks, floodgates, and other like annoyances, in times past hath happened, and yet is to be feared that far greater hurt, loss, and damage is likely to ensue unless that speedy remedy be provided in that behalf. We therefore, for that by reason of our dignity and prerogative Royal, We be bound to provide for the safety and preservation of Our realm of England, willing that speedy remedy be had in the premises, have assigned you Our Justices to carry into execution within the said limits the powers and provisions of "The Land Drainage Act, 1861," and of other Acts of Parliament in that behalf, and save and except as in the said Acts are excepted, the following powers, provisions, and purposes, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of the said Act (that is to say): To survey the said walls, streams, ditches, banks, gutters, gates, calcies, bridges, trenches, mills, mill-dams, floodgates, ponds, locks, hebbing wears, and other impediments, letts, and annoyances aforesaid, and the same cause to be made, corrected, repaired, amended, put down, or reformed, as the case shall require, after your wisdoms and discretions. And therein as well to ordain and do, after the form, tenor, and effect of all and singular the statutes and ordinances made before the first day of March in the three-and-twentieth year of the late King Henry the Eighth touching the premises or any of them, as also to inquire by the oaths of the honest and lawful men of Our said county, place, or places where such defaults or annoyances be (as well within liberties as without) by whom the truth may the rather be be known through whose default the said hurts and damages have happened, and who hath or holdeth any lands or tenements, or common, of pasture, or profit of fishing, or hath, or may have any hurt, loss, or disadvantage, by any manner of means in the said places, as well near to the said dangers, letts, and impediments, as inhabiting or dwelling thereabouts by the said walls, ditches, banks, gutters, gates, sewers, trenches, and other the said impediments and annoyances: And all those persons, and every of them to tax, assess, charge, distrain, and punish, as well within the metes, limits, and bounds of old time, accustomed or otherwise, or elsewhere, within Our Realm of England, after the quantity of their lands, tenements, and rents, by the number of acres and perches, after the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit, or after the quantity of their common of pasture or profit of fishing or other commodities there, by such ways and means, and in such manner and form as you shall seem most convenient to be ordained and done for redress and reformation to be had in the premises: And also to reform, repair, and amend the said walls, ditches, banks, gutters, sewers, gates, calcies, bridges, streams, and other the premises in all places needful, and the same as often and where need shall be, to make new, and to cleanse and purge the trenches, sewers, and ditches, in all places necessary: And further to reform, amend, prostrate, and overthrow all such mills, streams, ponds, locks, fishgarths, hebbing wears, and other impediments and annoyances as aforesaid, as shall be found by inquisition, or by your surveying and discretions, to be excessive or hurtful: And also to depute and assign diligent, faithful, and true keepers, bailiffs, surveyors, collectors, expenditors, and other ministers and officers, for the safety, conservation, reparation, reformation, and making of the premises, and every of them, and to bear the account of the collectors and other ministers of, and for the receipt and laying out of the money that shall be levied and paid, in and about the making, reforming, repairing, and amending of the said walls, ditches, banks, gutters, gates, sewers, calcies, bridges, streams, trenches, mills, ponds, locks, fishgates, floodgates, and other impediments and annoyances aforesaid: And to distrain for the arrearages of every such collection, tax, and assess, as often as shall be expedient, or otherwise to furnish the debtors and detainers of the same by fines and amerciaments, pains, or other like means after your good discretions: And also to arrest and take as many, carts, horses, oxen, beasts, and other instruments necessary, and as many workmen and labourers as for the said works and reparations shall suffice paying for the same competent wages, salary, and stipends in that behalf; And also to take such and as many trees, woods, underwoods, and timber and other necessaries, as for the same works and reparations shall be sufficient at a reasonable price by you to be assessed or limited as well within the limits and bounds aforesaid as in any other place within the said county near unto the said places: And to make and ordain statutes, ordinances, laws, and customs of Romney Marsh, in Our County of Kent, or otherwise by any ways or means after your own wisdoms and discretions: And to hear and determine all and singular the premises as well at Our suit as at the suit of any other whatsoever complaining before you after the laws and customs aforesaid, or otherwise by any other ways or means after your discretions: And also to make and direct all writs, precepts, warrants, or other commandments by virtue of these presents, to all sheriffs, bailiffs, and all other ministers, officers, and other persons (as well within liberties as without) before you at certain days, terms, and places to be prefixed, to be returned and received, and further to continue the process of the same, and finally to do all and everything and things as shall be requisite for the due execution of the premises by all ways and means after your discretions: And, therefore, We command you that at certain days and places when and where you shall think expedient, ye do survey the said walls, fences, ditches, banks, gutters, gates, sewers, calcies, ponds, bridges, rivers, streams, watercourses, mills, locks, trenches, fishgarths, floodgates, and other the letts, impediments, and annoyances aforesaid: And accomplish, fulfil, hear, and determine all and singular the premises in due form and to the effect aforesaid after your good discretions: And all such as ye shall find negligent, gainsaying, or rebelling in the said works, reparations or reformations of the premises, or negligent in the due execution of this Our Commission: That ye do compel them by distress, fines, and amerciaments, or by other punishments, ways, or means, which to you shall seem most expedient for the speedy remedy, redress, and reformation of the premises, and due execution of the same: And all such things as by you shall be made and ordained in this behalf (as well within liberties as without) ye do cause the same firmly to be observed doing therein as to Our justice appertaineth. After the laws and statutes of this Our Realm, and according to your wisdoms and discretions, saved always to Us such fines and amerciaments as to Us thereof shall belong: And We also command Our sheriff of Our said county of Kent, that he shall cause to come before you at such days and places as ye shall appoint to him such and as many honest men of his bailwick (as well within liberties as without) by whom the truth may best be known to inquire of the premises: Commanding also all other ministers and officers (as well within liberties as without) that they and every of them shall be attendant to you in and about the due execution of this Our Commission. In witness whereof we have caused these Our letters to be made patent.

Witness Ourself at Westminster, the 24th day of July, in the 27th year of Our reign.

LOCAL TAXES.

Local Rates now leviable in England and Wales beyond the Metropolis.

These may be divided into two classes:—

1. Rates levied in primary districts, such as a parish;
2. Rates levied in aggregate districts, such as a county.

Still in the present state of the law, even this classification must be qualified. The poor rate, for example, though still levied in each parish, is to a great extent expended in the union, where a union exists; and in like manner, the highway rate, though levied parochially, is expended in the highway district, where a district exists.

In some cases, where a new charge has been imposed upon the poor rate, to avoid the levying of a separate rate, provision is nevertheless made that in certain circumstances it may be defrayed out of a separate rate. Thus, the expenses of a burial board are generally payable out of the poor rate, but are leviable separately where the parishes and districts are not coterminous; the expenses of parish improvements (public walks and recreation grounds) are payable out of the poor rate, though it seems that a separate rate may be levied; the expenses of baths and washhouses, in a parish, are payable out of the poor rate, but if under a local board, out of the general district rate; and the expenses of public libraries and museums, in parishes, are to be levied like a poor rate, except as to the different scales of contribution from different classes of property. Generally speaking, a separate rate is authorised in two cases only: 1. Where the parish is not wholly within the district; 2. Where there are different scales of contribution.

CLASS I.—Rates of Primary Districts.

	Observations.
1. The Poor Rate 2. The Workhouse Building Rate 3. The Survey and Valuation Rate	2. 3. These two rates have never been levied in fact, the payments having always been made out of the Poor Rate.
4. The Jail Fees Rate	4. This is doubtless no longer levied.
5. The Constable's Rate	5. This is probably not now levied anywhere; or if levied at all, it is only in a very few places.
6. The Militia Rate	6. This is not now required, the ballots for the militia being suspended.
7. The Highway Rates	7. In some places, woods and mines are rateable to the highways, though not to the poor; on the other hand, there are special exemptions in certain cases, ratione tenuræ, or otherwise.
8. The Burial Board Rate	8. Generally paid out of the Poor Rate, and only levied as a separate rate where the Burial Board Districts are not coterminous with the parishes.
9. The Lighting and Watching Rate	9. Different scales of contribution, for "land" and for houses and other property.
10. The Public Library and Museum Rate	10. Different scales of contribution, for "lands used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, or market gardens, or nursery grounds," and for other property.
11. The General District Rate	11. Different scales of contribution, for tithes and lands of various descriptions, on the one hand, and for all other property, on the other.
12. The Sewerage Rate	12. Different scales of contribution (the same as for No. 11). This rate is leviable in parishes or special drainage districts by the sewer authorities under the Sewage Utilisation Acts, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 75; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 113.

	OBSERVATIONS.
13. The Town Improvement Rates - -	13. These are levied under Local Acts (which are very numerous), and also under the Towns Improvement and Police Clauses Acts (1847), where those Acts are adopted.
14. The Parish Improvement Rate - -	14. Apparently, this may be a separate rate, or it may be paid out of the Poor Rate.
15. The Animal Contagious Diseases Rate.	15. As regards compensation for slaughtered animals, and payment of loans and interest, the occupier may deduct from his rent one-half of the rate.
16. The Church Rates - - - -	16. Compulsory levy abolished, except as to rates to provide for existing charges.
17. The Sewers Rate - - - - -	17. 18. 19. The Sewers Rate is levied by Courts or Commissions of Sewers, to provide for the structural or permanent works; and the General Sewers Tax is levied under 4 & 5 Vict. c. 45 (1841), to meet current and contingent expenses. The Sewers Rate may be assessed upon owners as well as occupiers; but the General Sewers Tax is assessed upon occupiers only. The "Special Rate" (not exceeding 1,000 l.) under the Land Drainage Act of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133) is to be "deemed to be a tax on the owners of property," the owner being "the person entitled to the rack rent." If not paid by the owner, it may be recovered from the occupier, who may deduct it from his rent "in the absence of any agreement to the contrary." These three rates relate to the sewering of lands; as to the sewering of houses, see the three rates mentioned above, Nos. 11, 12, and 13.
18. The General Sewers Tax - - -
19. The "Special Rate" under the Land Drainage Act - - - -
20. The Drainage, Embankment, and Inclosure Rates	20. These rates are levied under Local Acts, but there is a general statute (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 35) which gives additional powers for their recovery. These Local Acts are very numerous; the list fills 18 folio pages in the Index to the Statutes, made in 1865. In a note to that list it is stated: "Subsequent to the passing of the Land Drainage Act of 1861, drainages, &c., are effected under the authority of 'Provisional Orders,' which have been confirmed by Acts passed for that purpose."
21. The Inclosure Rate - - - -	21. 22. These rates are leviable in certain cases, under the "General Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118 (1845)." Before the passing of that Act, inclosures were effected by Local Acts, the list of which occupies 99 pages of the Index to the Statutes (1865).
22. The Regulated Pasture Rate - -

CLASS II.—RATES OF AGGREGATE DISTRICTS.

(a) 1. The County Rate - - -	1. Although the amount is paid in each parish or place out of the Poor Rate, or out of a separate rate, raised like the Poor Rate, it is assessed upon each parish or place according to the "basis" or "standard" settled by the Justices, which may differ, and very often does differ, from the Poor Rate valuation. To this extent, therefore, the County Rate is not "on the basis of the Poor Rate."
2. The County Police Rate - -	2. When separate, to be raised like the County Rate.
3. The Shire Hall Rate - - -	3. It is doubtful whether the law requires this to be levied as a separate rate, and the expense is probably always paid out of the general County Rate.
4. The County Lunatic Asylum Rate	4. If separate, to be raised like the County Rate.
5. The County Burial Rate - -	5. This is to pay for the burial of dead bodies cast on shore by the sea. It is, therefore, confined to the maritime counties. Probably the amount is never raised as a separate rate, but always paid out of the general County Rate.
(b) 6. The Hundred Rate - - -	6. This is still occasionally levied. The total amount raised in England and Wales in 1868 was 5,501 l.
(c) 7. The Borough Rate.	9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. These may be separate rates, or the expenses may be paid out of the Borough Rate, or Borough Fund, according to circumstances.
8. The Borough Watch Rates.
9. The Borough Gaol Rate - -
10. The Borough Prisoners Rates -
11. The Borough Lunatic Asylum Rate
12. The Borough Library and Museum Rate.
13. The Borough Baths and Wash-houses Rate.
14. The Borough Improvement Rate -
15. The Borough Burial Rate - -

Appendix, No 6.

PURPOSES OF THE RATES.

I.—RATES OF PRIMARY DISTRICTS.

1.—The Poor Rate.

The primary purpose of the poor rate is to provide for the relief of the poor; but many other charges have from time to time been cast upon it. The chief of these (arranged chronologically) are the following:—

1. The costs of prosecuting persons for keeping disorderly houses (25 Geo. 2, c. 36; 58 Geo. 3, c. 70).

2. The expenses incurred by constables in doing the business of the parish or township (18 Geo. 3, c. 19, s. 4). [See also No 15, below.]

3. Half the expenses incurred by overseers in prosecuting masters for ill-treatment of parish apprentices (32 Geo. 3, c. 57): the other half to be paid out of the county rate. [Practically obsolete, though not repealed.]

4. The cost of prosecuting pawnbrokers in certain cases (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99).

5. The fine for not providing militiamen (42 Geo. 3, c. 90). [Suspended: see the Militia Rate.]

6. The remuneration of examiners of measures, and the cost of procuring proper measures, in certain cases (55 Geo. 3, c. 43).

7. The compensation payable to jailers and others in certain cases (55 Geo. 3, c. 50). [Probably obsolete: see the Jail Fees Rate.]

8. The costs of making out, preparing, printing, and collecting the jury lists (6 Geo. 4, c. 50; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101).

9. The cost of prosecution for felonies and misdemeanors, in places not contributing to any county rate (7 Geo. 4, c. 64). [See the County Rate.]

10. The compensations payable by the hundred, in places not contributing to any county rate (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 31). [See the Hundred Rate.]

11. The expenses of emigration in certain cases (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, and subsequent Acts).

12. The cost of offices, books and forms, in the registration of births, deaths, and marriages; and the fees to the registrars (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86; 1 Vict. c. 22).

13. The maintenance of lunatics suspected of crime; of criminal lunatics; and of insane prisoners (1 & 2 Vict. c. 14; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54; and subsequent Acts).

14. The expenses of public vaccination (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84). [First imposed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 29, and 4 & 5 Vict. c. 32, now repealed.]

15. The fees and allowances under the Parish Constables Act, and the salaries of parish constables (5 & 6 Vict. c. 109; 13 Vict. c. 20). [See also No. 2, above.]

16. The expenses of town clerks and returning officers in boroughs, and of overseers of the poor, in regard to the registration of voters and the election of Members of Parliament (6 Vict. c. 18).

17. The expenses properly incurred in the perambulation of parish boundaries, and in setting up and repairing the boundary stones (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 60).

18. The expense of fencing, draining, and levelling lands allotted under the Commons Inclosure Act for the exercise and recreation of the inhabitants (8 & 9 Vict c. 118).

The foregoing payments are for the most part made directly out of the poor rate; but in other cases a different practice exists, where the overseers are called upon to pay out of the poor rate sums to be expended by some other authority. Thus, in the following cases, the contribution from the individual parishes may be paid out of the poor rate, or out of a separate rate to be levied for the purpose, according to circumstances:

19. To the various county rates (15 & 16 Vict. c. 81).

20. To the hundred rate (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 31).

21. To the various borough rates (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 81).

22. To the expenditure of the Highway Boards in Highway Districts under the Acts of 1861 and 1864 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101). [See the "Highway Rate."]

23. To the expenses of burial boards in parishes. [See the "Burial Board Rate."]

24. To the expenses of public libraries and museums in certain cases. [See the "Public Library and Museum Rate."]

Appendix, No, 6.

25. To the expenses of parish improvements. [See the "Parish Improvement Rate."]

26. To the expenses of baths and washhouses in parishes (9 & 10 Vict. c. 74). [See the "Borough Baths and Washhouses Rate."]

2.—The Workhouse Building Rate.

3.—The Survey and Valuation Rate.

These were apparently intended to be levied as separate rates; the first, for the provision of workhouses under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76 (1834), and the second for the payment of the expense of a parochial survey (with or without a map or plan) and valuation under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96 (1836). The enactments on this subject, however, were found to be so obscure, that these separate rates have never been raised in fact; and the expenses for which they were intended to provide have always been paid out of the poor rate. One attempt was made (in a case which came before the Court of Queen's Bench in 1847) to raise a separate rate for the expense of a survey and valuation, but it failed.

4.—The Jail Fees Rate.

This rate was authorised by an Act passed in 1815 (53 Geo. 3, c. 50), for payment of compensations to jailers and others in certain cases; it is probably not now required at all; and it was perhaps never levied as a separate rate. In the Report of the Poor Law Commissioners on Local Taxation (1843), it was stated—"The jail fees rate was, we believe, never collected separately, being, in fact, too small in amount to be capable of collection; it was therefore unlawfully, but almost necessarily, paid out of the county rate."

5.—The Constable's Rate.

In the "Local Taxes of the United Kingdom" (1846), it was stated: "This rate, in its original form as a tything or township levy, is amongst the most ancient of the local taxes, having been instituted in the period when townships or tythings (and not parishes) were the chief independent districts for taxation, and the primary constituents of the aggregate districts of the hundred and the county."

Its imposition was regulated in 1662 by the Act 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, its purpose at that time being to meet the expenses incurred by constables in dealing with rogues, vagabonds, and street beggars; but in 1778 an Act was passed to reimburse constables out of the poor rate for their expenses "in doing the business of the parish, township, or place"; and it is probable that this provision superseded the constable's rate to a certain extent. [See the Poor Rate.]

Under the 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, and 55 Geo. 3, c. 51, it was authorised to be applied towards the payment of the county rate, in certain cases, and especially in the northern counties; but the present mode of collecting the county rate has now superseded the constable's rate as regards this purpose also; and if there be any places in which it is still levied they must be very few.

6.—The Militia Rate.

As the ballotting for the militia is at present in abeyance, this rate is not now required. It was intended to provide for the payments to volunteers or substitutes, and for the fines of 10*l.* for each man deficient.

7.—The Highway Rates.

The primary purpose of the highway rates is the repair of the highways.

The Highway Act of 1835 authorises the levy of three distinct rates: one for the general repair of the highways; one for the payment of compensation to owners of lands taken for widening highways, and making new ditches and fences; and one for the payment of the costs of defending indictments, appeals, and other legal proceedings.

In South Wales, the Highway Boards call for the money they require from the overseers of the several parishes, who levy the amount by means of a separate highway rate; but in other parts of the country, where highway districts have been formed, under the Highway Acts of 1862 and 1864, the Highway Boards call for the money either from the overseers or from the waywardens, according to circumstances. If the highway parish is not co-extensive with the poor law parish, or if the highway rate for seven years before the Act of 1862 had been assessed upon mines, woods, or other property not liable to poor rates, the precept is addressed to the waywarden, who is to levy the amount by a separate highway rate; but in other cases the precept is addressed to the overseers, who are to pay the amount out of the poor rate.

Where this system of Highway Districts and Highway Boards is not adopted, the highways beyond the metropolis are managed under the General Act of 1835, or under Local Acts, or by Local Boards.

It must be added that the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59 (1841), provides for the application of the highway highway rates towards the maintenance of turnpike roads which require assistance, and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118 (the General Inclosure Act) charges on these rates the costs of appeals against discontinuing or diverting highways in certain cases.

8.—The Burial Board Rate.

In any borough where the Town Council acts as a Burial Board, the expenses are to be paid out of the borough fund or borough rate (17 & 18 Vict. c. 87); or the Council may raise the amount "by means of a separate rate, to be called a Burial Rate" (20 & 21 Vict. c. 81). [See "the Borough Burial Rate."]

Where a Local Board of Health acts as a Burial Board, the amount required for the expenses may be levied "as part of the General District Rate" [see the General District Rate], or "by a separate rate, under the name and designation of a Burial Rate" (23 & 24 Vict. c. 64).

Where Improvement Commissioners act as a Burial Board, the amount required may be levied "as part of the Improvement Rate" [see the Town Improvement Rates], or "by a separate rate under the name and designation of a Burial Rate" (23 & 24 Vict. c. 64).

When Burial Boards are established elsewhere, the expenses are in general to be paid out of the poor rate [see the Poor Rate]; but where the district is not coterminous with a parish, a separate rate is to be levied (18 & 19 Vict. c. 128).

9.—The Lighting and Watching Rate.

The provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, may be adopted in any parish, and abandoned after three years, except where the council in a borough have taken upon themselves the powers of Inspectors of Lighting, under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 88. The Act may be adopted either as to lighting, or as to watching, or as to lighting and watching; and either for the whole or for any part of the parish. But it ceases as to watching, though not as to lighting, on the appointment of a watch committee in a borough, and on the establishment of a police force in a county. The purpose of the rate is to carry the Act into effect as to lighting or watching, or both, by laying down gas-pipes, putting up lamps, and lighting them with gas, or otherwise, and by providing watch-houses and watch-boxes, keeping fire-engines, paying the officers employed, and so forth.

10.—The Public Library and Museum Rate.

The Act for establishing Museums in large towns (8 & 9 Vict. c. 43), which was passed in 1845, was confined to boroughs with a population of more than 10,000, and to Museums of Art and Science. It was repealed in 1850 by the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 65, which provided for the establishment of Public Libraries as well as Museums, but was still confined to boroughs with more than 10,000 population. This second Act was itself repealed in 1855 by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 70, which made further provisions on the subject, and which was amended in 1866 by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 114.

The Act of 1855, thus amended, may be adopted in any municipal borough with more than 5,000 population, or in any district within the limits of an Improvement Act, containing more than 5,000 population, or in any parish with more than 5,000 population. It applies to public libraries or museums, or both, and to schools for science or art.

In a borough, the expenses are to be defrayed out of the borough rate, or out of a separate rate to be levied like the borough rate [see "the Borough, Library, and Museum Rate"]; and in a district under an Improvement Act, out of the improvement rate, or out of a separate rate to be levied like the improvement rate.

In a parish adopting the Act, Commissioners are to be appointed, and their expenses are to be paid out of a rate, "to be made and recovered in like manner as a poor rate," except as to the scales of contribution.

Neighbouring parishes with an aggregate population of more than 5,000, may combine; but in that case the proportion of the expenses payable by each "shall be paid out of the monies to be raised for the relief of the poor"; so that, apparently, the different scales of contribution will not be applicable.

Any parish, of whatever population, may join a borough, district, or parish; the expense to be paid out of the poor rate.

11.—The General District Rate.

This rate is levied by the Local Boards under the Local Government Act of 1858, for the various purposes of that Act, except water supply and private improvements, with respect to which special provisions are made; and special provisions are also made with regard to the repair of the roads. [See Mr. T. Taylor's evidence.]

Note.—A "special district rate" is still leviable under the Public Health Act of 1848 in certain cases, for certain purposes.

Appendix, No. 6.

12.—The Sewerage Rate.

Where the sewer authority under the Sewage Utilisation Acts is the Town Council of a borough, or the Improvement Commissioners of a district, the expenses are paid out of the borough fund or rate, or out of the improvement rate; but where the sewer authority is a parish vestry, they are to obtain the necessary funds by issuing their precepts to the overseers, who are to levy a separate rate in the same manner as if it were a poor rate, except that tithes, lands, and other properties are to be assessed in different proportions, according to the same scale as in the case of the general district rate. The principal functions of the sewer authority are to construct proper drains and sewers, to protect streams from pollution, to provide for the storing, disinfecting, and distribution of sewage, with a view to its utilisation for agricultural purposes, and also to provide for the supply of water to the district, and even to provide district hospitals, or temporary places for the reception of the sick.

"Special drainage districts" may be formed of parts of parishes; and, on the other hand, districts may be united and placed under a "joint sewerage board" (30 & 31 Vict. c. 113). In the latter case, a common fund is to be formed by contributions from the constituent localities.

14.—The Parish Improvement Rate.

The purpose of this rate is to carry out the provisions of the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 30, which may be adopted in any borough [see the "Borough Improvement Rate"], or in any parish with a population of more than 500. If adopted in any such parish, the expense may, as it seems, be paid either out of the poor rate, or out of a separate rate, to be called "The ——— Parish Improvement Rate" (though there are no distinct provisions as to the assessment or levy of this separate rate). The Act empowers the ratepayers "to purchase or lease lands, and to accept gifts and grants of land, for the purpose of forming any public walk, exercise, or playground, and to levy rates for maintaining the same, and for removal of any nuisances or obstruction to the free use and enjoyment thereof, and for improving any open walk or footpath, or placing convenient seats, or shelters from rain, and for other purposes of a similar nature."

15. The Animals Contagious Diseases Rate.

Under the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70, the compensation and expenses are either to be levied as a separate rate, or to be paid out of existing rates (county rate, metropolitan consolidated rate, borough fund or rate, or borough police rate, &c.), but the amount is to be specified in the demand upon the individual ratepayer; and it is provided (s. 89), that "any person who is not the owner of the premises in respect of which he is rated under this section to the local rate, may deduct from the growing rent due to the owner of such premises one-half of the rate payable by him for the purposes of this section," i. e., the compensation for slaughtered cattle, and the payment of principal and interest on loans. No deduction can be made from the rent in respect of the other expenses under the Act.

16.—The Church Rates.

The church rate at common law was intended to provide for the repair of the fabric of the Church, and for the furnishing of all things necessary for Divine service. Under special statutes, the enlargement of old churches, the erection of new ones, the repair of chapels, and the acquisition of new or additional burial grounds, have been included among the objects of the rate. By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 109 (passed in 1868), the compulsory levy of such rates was abolished, except in certain specified cases, as, for instance, where rates are required to pay off moneys advanced on the security of the church rates. Church rates, however, may still be lawfully made for the same purposes as formerly, and may be paid by trustees and others (see s. 7), though they cannot be legally enforced.

17.—The Sewers Rate.

18.—The General Sewers Tax.

19.—The Land Drainage "Special Rate."

The purposes of the sewers rate under the Act of 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, amended by subsequent statutes, are to make, repair, and amend walls, ditches, banks, sewers, bridges, streams, and other defences by the coasts of the sea and marsh ground; to renew and cleanse such trenches, sewers, and ditches as may require it; and to reform or overthrow all such walls, streams, ponds, locks, fish garths, hebbing wears, and other impediments and annoyances as are found to be excessive or hurtful. The general sewers tax, on the other hand, hand, is levied under 4 & 5 Vict. c. 45, to provide for the remuneration of the clerks and other officers of the court, of allowances to witnesses (and to jurymen?), of expenses incurred in surveying and valuing lands, of costs connected with litigation, and other incidental charges.

21.—The Inclosure Rate.

22.—The Regulated Pasture Rate.

The inclosure rate may be levied to meet the expenses of the inclosure of common lands under the General Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118; and the regulated pasture rate may be levied in certain cases under the provisions of the same Act, by which the Inclosure Commissioners are empowered to convert lands inclosed under the Act into "regulated pastures," to be stocked and depastured in common by the persons interested therein, in proportion to their respective rights and interests. For this purpose, "field reeves" are to be appointed, who are to manage the "regulated pastures," and whose salaries and expenses are to be defrayed by a rate payable by the owners of the several "stints," or rights of pasture.

II.—RATES OF AGGREGATE DISTRICTS.

[Note.—With regard to the rates included in this class, it may be stated generally, that they are raised by one set of officers and expended by another. There is a certain degree of ambiguity, and even inaccuracy, in saying that the justices in a county make a "county rate," or that the council in a borough make a "borough rate." They issue their precepts to the overseers, or other persons, calling for a certain amount of money to be paid to them in respect of each parish or place; but it is the overseers or other persons who make the rate, to which the individual ratepayers in each parish or place are required to contribute. In most cases, the overseers, or other persons, pay out of the poor rate the money thus called for by the justices, or the council; but in certain cases, as, for instance, where a parish is divided by the boundary line of the county or borough, they are required by the law to raise a separate rate within the part of the parish which is liable to contribute. In the case of the borough rate, also, the council may order the overseers, even in an undivided parish, to raise a separate rate. But with respect to the proceedings of the justices, or the council, the position of the matter is this: that although the greater number of the purposes for which they have to provide are comprised in one general rate (the county rate in counties, the hundred rate in hundreds, and the borough rate in boroughs), yet there are certain purposes for which they either must, or may (in some cases must, in others may), make separate rates, or to speak more strictly, make separate calls upon the overseers or other persons in the respective parishes and places included in their jurisdiction. It is in this sense, for example, that "the county police rate" is here described as distinct from "the county rate," or "the borough burial rate" from "the borough rate." It is necessary to bear in mind that a separate rate thus made by the justices over the whole county, is very different from the separate rate raised in a portion of a divided parish for the purpose of paying the required contribution towards a general rate, such as "the county rate." In the one case, the rate is separately raised, in order to confine it to the particular district which is liable; whilst in the other case, the rate is separately made in order to distinguish the expenditure, and provide for it by a particular fund.]

1. The County Rate.

In 1739 an Act was passed (12 Geo. 2, c. 29), consolidating into one rate the several distinct rates which were then leviable in counties, under the provisions of various statutes, for sundry purposes which are specified in the preamble to the Act. Those purposes comprised the repair of bridges and adjacent highways; the building of jails; the providing of houses of correction; the relief of poor prisoners, and of hospitals and almshouses; and the passing and conveying or maintaining of rogues and vagabonds. By the Act which was passed in 1815 (55 Geo. 3, c. 51), to amend the Act of Geo. 2, the justices are authorised and empowered, whenever circumstances shall appear to require it, to order a fair and equal county rate to be made "for all the purposes to which the county stock or rate is now or shall hereafter be made liable by law." These terms are repeated in 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, by which the 55 Geo. 3, c. 51, was repealed.

Some of the principal purposes to which the county rate is applicable, in addition to those enumerated in 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, and mentioned above, are the following:—

The payment of the expenses of maintaining prisons, the salaries of the officers and their superannuation allowances, the maintenance of the prisoners, their conveyance, and the allowances to discharged prisoners;

The providing and maintaining of lock-up houses, for the temporary confinement of persons in custody;

The payment of the costs connected with the prosecution of offenders; (a) at the

Appendix, No. 6.

assizes; (b) at the quarter sessions; (c) under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126; and (d) under the Juvenile Offenders Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 82;

The payment of coroners' salaries and the expenses of coroners' inquests;

The payment of expenses incurred under the Reformatory Schools Act (29 & 30 Vict. c. 117), which are to be deemed to be expenses incurred under the Prisons Act, 1865;

The maintenance of pauper lunatics, and of criminal lunatics, where the settlement cannot be ascertained; and the payment of salaries and other expenses incurred beyond the sums received in reference to houses licensed for the reception of lunatics, under the Lunacy Act of 1845, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100;

The cost of providing and maintaining militia storehouses;

The providing of copies of standard weights and measures, together with the requisite stamps, and the remuneration of the inspectors and examiners;

The payments to high constables; and the allowance to special constables;

The payment of the expenses incurred by the clerks of the peace in carrying into effect the Act relating to the registration of voters and the election of Members of Parliament;

The removal of paupers to Scotland, Ireland, and the Channel Islands, from any parish not in union, and not containing a population exceeding 30,000;

The remuneration of the county treasurers, and the payment of allowances and other expenses under the Acts relating to the assessment and collection of the county rates.

The foregoing is a general statement of the principal charges on the county rate; but there are some, and there may be many others of a less important character. As regards the purposes provided for by the separate rates hereafter-mentioned, namely, the county police rate; the shire hall rate; the county lunatic asylum rate; the county burial rate; and also the hundred rate; see the notices of those rates, post.

2.—The County Police Rate.

This rate is levied separately from the ordinary county rate, for payment of the expenses incurred for the purpose of carrying into execution the County Police Acts; such as the salaries and allowances payable to the police constables, and the cost of their clothing, accoutrements, and other necessaries, and their superannuation allowances, when the superannuation fund is insufficient (see 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69; 20 Vict. c. 2; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 68; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 32). The cost of station houses and strong rooms, cast by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88, upon the police rate, may be transferred in certain cases to the county rate, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69. The latter Act enables the Treasury, under certain conditions, to repay a proportion, not exceeding one-fourth of the pay and clothing of the constables, out of the monies provided by Parliament for the purpose.

3.—The Shire Hall Rate.

It is doubtful whether, under the terms of the Act, 7 Geo. 4, c. 63, the expense of providing the Shire Halls and Judges' lodgings is to be paid out of the ordinary county rate, or out of a separate rate levied for the purpose. If a separate rate be raised, it would be in all respects like a county rate, but limited to this particular object (see 7 Geo. 4, c. 63; 7 Will. 4, & 1 Vict. c. 24; and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 28).

4.—The County Lunatic Asylum Rate.

The Lunatic Asylums Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), enacts that in order to defray the expenses payable by any county for the purposes of that Act, the justices in general or quarter sessions "shall assess and tax a general county rate or rates upon such county, and may and shall fix a sum or rate to be contributed by all places whatsoever within such county (other than any borough being within such county or by this Act for the purposes thereof annexed thereto), and whether such places be or be not liable to contribute to an ordinary county rate."

5.—The County Burial Rate.

The expense of burying dead bodies cast on shore from the sea by wreck or otherwise is to be paid, in the first instance, by the churchwardens or overseers in parishes, and the constables or headboroughs in extra-parochial places, and is to be repaid to them by the county treasurer on the order of any one justice of the county; and for this purpose, the justices in general or quarter sessions may cause the necessary sums of money "to be raised in the same manner as rates are directed to be raised" by the Act 12 Geo. 2, c. 29. It is, therefore, a question whether, in strict law, this rate must not still be raised under the specific provisions of that particular Statute. At all events, it is required to be raised as a separate rate; but the amount is so small that the expense is probably in all cases paid out of the general county rate.

6. The Hundred Rate.

The ancient hundred rate, under the common law, is obsolete; but a hundred rate may still be levied, when necessary, for the following purposes, namely:—

Under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 31, for the payment of full compensation to persons damnified by the felonious demolition, pulling down, or destruction, wholly or partly, of certain descriptions of property, by persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together; and also, for the payment of the costs incurred by the high constables in respect of any action brought against the hundred for such compensation. The descriptions of property to which the Act thus refers are, any church or chapel, or any chapel for the religious worship of persons dissenting from the Established Church, duly registered or recorded; any house, stable, coach-house, out-house, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malt-house, hop-oast, barn, or granary; any building or erection used in carrying on any trade or manufacture, or branch thereof, or any machinery, whether fixed or movable, prepared for or employed in any manufacture or branch thereof; any steam engine, or other engine for sinking, draining, or working any mine, or any staith, building, or erection, used in conducting the business of any mine, or any bridge, waggon-way, or trunk for conveying minerals from any mine; and also any fixture, furniture, or goods whatever, in any such church, chapel, house, or other building or erection. By the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 72, these provisions are extended to every threshing-machine, whether fixed or movable, together with any erection or fixture in or about, or belonging to it.

7. The Borough Rate.

By the "Municipal Corporations Act of 1835," 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, it is provided, that in case the Borough Fund shall not be sufficient for the purposes to which it is applicable, the Council shall order a borough rate in the nature of a county rate to be made within the borough, and all sums levied in pursuance of such borough rate shall be paid over to the account of the Borough Fund. The rate is therefore levied to supply the deficiency of the borough fund; special provision, however, is made for the levy of a separate watch rate in certain cases.

Although the rate, generally speaking, is to be raised like a county rate, it is specially enacted, by the 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 81, that the Council, instead of ordering the overseers to pay it out of the poor rate, may order them to "make and collect a certain pound rate upon, and from, the occupiers, or possessors, of all rateable property within such parish or place, for the amount of the rate for which such parish or place may be liable." The enactment is somewhat vague in its terms, as it does not require the separate rate to be assessed and levied like a poor rate, but directs that it shall be made and collected upon, and from "the occupiers or possessors" of all "rateable" property within the parish. If, however, the difficulties of the language be overcome, the case is not like that of a divided parish, partly in the borough and partly in the neighbouring county, where a separate rate is required by law to be made; inasmuch as under this provision it rests entirely in the discretion of the Council to determine whether the overseers shall be ordered to make a separate rate or not.

8. The Borough Watch Rates.

These rates are to be levied like the borough rate, but are to be levied separately, in order that they may be confined to the districts that are watched (see 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 92; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 28; and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 28).

As regards the levy in the individual parishes, it is provided by 3 & 9 Vict. c. 110, s. 6, that where only a part of a parish is liable to the watch rate, the overseers shall not pay the amount out of the poor rate, but out of a separate rate, to be raised in the particular part so liable to the watch rate.

9. The Borough Gaol Rate.

This rate may be raised "for building or re-building, repairing, or enlarging the prison, court-house, and other necessary buildings to be used with the prison" of the borough. For these purposes the Council may borrow money; and in order to pay the interest and repay the loan, they may either resort to the borough fund or borough rate, or "instead or in aid thereof," may have recourse to a separate rate, termed a "Gaol Rate" in the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98.

10. The Borough Prisoners Rates.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, provides for the payment of expenses connected with prisoners sent from a borough having a separate court of sessions, to the prison of the county, where no special contract is entered into between the borough and the county. The Act further provides for the payment of the expenses "incurred in the conveyance, transport, maintenance, safe custody, and care of such prisoners;" and the language of the Act seems to require that for these purposes two separate rates should be levied, distinct from the general borough rate, and also from each other.

Appendix, No. 6.

11. The Borough Lunatic Asylum Rate.

The "Lunatic Asylums Act of 1853," 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, enacts, that in order to defray the expenses payable by any borough for the purposes of that Act, the Council "may, and shall," assess a general borough rate in the nature of a county rate upon such borough, which shall be collected, levied, and recovered, in the same manner as any ordinary rate for such borough.

12. The Borough Library and Musuem Rate.

In the work on the "Local Taxes" in 1846, "the Borough Museum Rate" was described as being authorised by the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 43, which was passed in 1845, "for encouraging the establishment of museums in large towns." In 1848, a paper by Mr. Edward Edwards on "Free Town Libraries," which was published in the journal of the Statistical Society, attracted the attention of the late Mr. William Ewart, M.P., and ultimately led to the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee, whose report paved the way for the Public Libraries Act of 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 65.

The Act of 1845 was confined to municipal boroughs with a population exceeding 10,000, and to museums of art and science. It was repealed by the Act of 1850, which was itself repealed in 1855 by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 70. The Act of 1850 extended to public libraries as well as museums, but was still confined to municipal boroughs with more than 10,000 population.

The Act of 1855, which was amended in 1866 by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 114, applies to any municipal borough of more than 5,000 population, and extends either to public libraries or to museums, or to both, or to schools for science or art. The adoption of the Act is optional; but if it be adopted in any borough, the expenses may be paid either out of the borough rate or out of a separate rate, to be made and recovered like a borough rate, provided the amount do not exceed in any one year "one penny in the pound upon the annual value of the property in such borough rateable to a borough rate."

There is a special provision enabling adjoining parishes, "of whatever population," to combine with a borough for this purpose. [See also "The Public Library and Museum Rate," ante.]

13. The Borough Baths and Washhouses Rate.

Where the Act for the establishment of baths and washhouses (9 & 10 Vict. c. 74, passed in 1846) is adopted in a borough, the expense is to be paid out of the borough fund, and for that purpose the Council may levy the required sums "with, and as part of the borough rate, or by a separate rate to be assessed, levied, paid, and recovered in like manner, and with the like powers and remedies in all respects as the borough rate." It is provided, however, that "the income arising from the baths and washhouses and open bathing places in any borough shall be paid to the credit of the borough fund thereof, and the Council shall keep distinct accounts of their receipts, payments, credits, and liabilities, with reference to the execution of this Act, to be called 'The Public Baths and Washhouses Account.'" As to the charges for the use of the baths, &c., see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 61.

14. The Borough Improvement Rate.

For a description of the objects of the Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 30, which was passed in 1860, in order to give facilities "for the purpose of effecting local improvements beneficial to the health and comfort of the people," see "The Parish Improvement Rate," ante. The Act may be adopted for any borough in the same manner as the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74, relating to the establishment of baths and washhouses, and when so adopted the expenses are to be provided for in the same manner as under that Act. [See "The Borough Baths and Washhouses Rate," ante.]

15. The Borough Burial Rate.

By the Burial Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 87), it was provided that in a borough the expenses should be paid out of the borough fund or the borough rate "as if the same were expenses incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76;" but under the amending Act of 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 81), the Council are empowered to raise the amount, "if they think fit, by means of a separate rate, to be called a burial rate, to be charged upon all property within such borough liable to be charged to the borough rate." [See also "The Burial Board Rate," ante.]

ABERDEENSHIRE:

Enumeration of rates or assessments comprised in the county rates for Aberdeenshire, all, with two exceptions, being leviable over the whole area of the county, Cochran 270–273. 279——Particulars relative to the road assessments, four in number; area over which levied, ib. 273, 274——Payment of the rates in all cases by the owner, who, in two instances, has power to recover half from the tenant, ib. 275–278——Power of the landlord to deduct half the roads maintenance tax from the tenant, ib. 276, 277.

Great facility with which the county rates are collected by witness from the owners, Cochran 281–288——Abolition by Act in 1866 of the former power of the landlord to deduct from the tenant three-fourths of the roads commutation tax, ib. 278——Power of recovery from the tenant in the event of default of the landlord, the former being entitled to deduct the amount from the rent, ib. 288–290.

Management of the county rates, save the road assessments, by the Commissioners of Supply; constitution of this body, which consists almost entirely of owners, Cochran 294–305—— Particulars relative to the administration of the several road assessments, the tenants having a voice only as regards maintenance, ib. 306–313.

Further statement on the subject of road assessments in Aberdeenshire, and throughout Scotland; reference more especially to the mode of dealing with the debts when turnpike gates are abolished, Cochran 380–382.

Accounts (Local Boards). Practice as to audit of the accounts of local boards, and obligation as to the local publication of the accounts, Taylor 502–505.

ADMINISTRATION OF RATES:

Effect of a direct charge upon the owners in increasing their interest in the good management of the rates, Fry 259, 260——Approval of the owners having a proportionate control over the expenditure if charged with half the rates, ib. 263——Equal interest practically of owners in good administration as though directly charged or rated, ib. 263, 264.

Question considered whether the direct payment of half the rates by the owners would not increase their interest in the administration, Taylor 645–652——Grounds for the conclusion that a division of rates between owners and occupiers would be a great advantage, as causing the former to take a much greater interest in the administration of the rates, Read 1289, 1290. 1322–1344. 1349–1354; Caird 4188 et seq.——Obstacles to any satisfactory administration of the rates by owners in the country; less difficulty in towns, Rogers 2702. 2731–2738. 2747——Doubt as to owners taking much more interest in the expenditure if they paid half the rates directly, Squarey 3129.

Advantage of the division of rates between occupier and owner in Ireland, as giving the latter a direct interest in the administration; expediency of a similar system in England, Grey 3550. 3564 et seq.——Sufficient interest likely to be taken in the expenditure by the occupiers if they paid one-half instead of all the rents, ib. 3712——Improved management and more judicious expenditure by combining the owners with the occupier in the payment and disbursement of the poor rate and other rates, Dashwood 3803–3806. 3811–3814. 3828, 3829. 3860, 3861. 3881–3886——Proposed share of owners in the administration if they pay half the improvement rates, Sir J. Thwaites 4117.

Conclusion favourable to the owner in England paying a moiety of the local rates, on the ground chiefly that they would take an active and economical interest in the administration, as in Scotland, Caird 4188 et seq.——Advantage of occupiers sharing in the poor poor rate and highway rate, and taking part in the administration, Caird 4194–4202. 4217–4226. 4271–4273——Expediency of a fair representation of owners as well as occupiers in the administration of the poor rate and highway rate in England if these be divided, ib. 4217–4226. 4283.

Probability of landlords taking a more active interest in the rates if they paid half, Grant 4991, 4992——Approval of owners being directly represented in the administration if they are directly rated; very good representation of the principal interests at present, ib. 5684–5686. 5709–5717. 5755, 5756. 5770–5776——Statement in favour of owners being registered in the same way as occupiers, and being fully represented in the administration if they pay a portion of the rates, Baxter 5880–5884. 5959–5968——More economical administration by occupiers than by owners; that is, in country districts, ib. 5978–5981. 5997.

Resolution of the Committee that it is expedient to adjust the system of rating in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel an immediate interest in the increase or decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs, Rep. iii——Necessity of a direct and adequate representation of the owners at the local boards for administering the rates; that is, in the event of any division of rates between owners and occupiers, ib.

Agriculture. Question considered as to the tendency of high rates and increased rents to alienate capital from farming pursuits, Read 1446–1453. 1473–1481. 1501–1506. 1524–1541. 1547. 1680. 1691–1703——Increased burden of the rates accordingly as increased capital is applied to the land by landlord or tenant, Andrews 2567–2574——Doubt as to the application of capital to land being discouraged or prevented by the pressure of local taxation, Caird 4237–4239. 4274–4280. 4346, 4347——Advantage of improved agricultural machinery and of portable manures in enabling farmers to raise increased produce at comparatively less cost, ib 4240–4246.

See also Farmers. Rent. Waste Lands.

Andrews, Henry Genge. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an owner and occupier of land in Somersetshire, 2373–2375——Statement that the rates in witness's parish have about doubled in the last thirty-two years, whilst there has been no great increase in the assessment, 2376–2396. 2403, 2404——Incidence of the increased rates almost entirely on the occupier, there being very rarely any re-adjustment of the rent, 2397–2402. 2428–2444——Difficulty of ascertaining the proportion borne by the rates in the county to the rent or to the farmers' profits, 2405–2409. 2461.

Large proportion borne by the rates on witness's land to his profits; exceedingly small amount of the latter in the past year, 2410–2427. 2526. 2538–2540——Examination as regards the incidence of the rates generally, to the effect that the tax is really upon the owner and is considered in the rent, save when there is no re-adjustment or re-letting, 2428–2435. 2490–2496. 2527–2530. 2541–2547. 2575–2584——Serious effect of the heavy rates upon the farmers' profits, 2436. 2445–2448——Instance of an increase of 100 l. a year in the rates of a farm, without any reduction in the rent, 2437–2444. 2634–2636.

Consideration of the pressure of the rates with reference to the farmers' profits in the earlier part of the present century as compared with the period since 1834; very different assessment in the two periods, 2445–2460. 2531–2537——Further statement as to the great increase in the rates generally in witness's parish and throughout Somersetshire, much of the increase arising from new poor law charges, 2450–2473. 2523–2525. 2609–2633.

Decided objection to halving the rates between the occupier and owner, it being far better to place all the rates on the latter, and to give him a direct voice in the administration, 2474 et seq.——Very little interest of the occupier in keeping down the poor law expenditure, or in employing men in order to keep them off the rates, 2512–2522. 2528–2530. 2593–2605.

Examination as to the effect produced upon the rent by the competition for land, the rise in the price of wages, the price of produce, &c., 2551–2566——Increased burden of the rates accordingly as increased capital is applied to the land by landlord or tenant, 2567–2574——Expected efficiency in the administration of the poor rate by owners, 2606–2608.

Apportionment of Rates. Contemplated apportionment of different rates according to a graduated scale, as preferable to an equal division between owner and occupier, Innes 5164–5171.

Areas

Areas of Administration. Inconvenience through the creation of a great variety of areas, in lieu of the parish, for the purposes of local government; amendment desirable, Read 1401–1411——Advantage in some instances of bringing town and country districts under one board for administration, Beloe 2935–2937——Absence of inconvenience in administration through the combination of town districts and country districts, as in the case of Lancaster Union, Grant 4893–4899.——See also Districts.

Assessment. Explanation as to the basis upon which the several rates are levied, there being much variety in this respect, Fry, 36–69——Similar basis of assessment for the general district rate as for the poor rate; exemption as regards mines adverted to, Taylor, 427–429. 545–548. 573–577——Grounds for the conclusion that the rates are for the benefit of the population, and that all property tending to amass population should be rated, ib. 431–435. 555. 662–672——Larger proportionate increase in local taxation than in the rateable value, Read 1321. 1355–1358——Large increase of assessments in England owing to the action of the assessment committees, Grey 3724–3727. 3764–3766. 3772.

Conclusion of the Committee as to the expediency of uniformity and simplicity of assessment, Rep. iv.

See also Income Tax. Poor Rate. Railways. Scotland, 3.

Audit of Accounts (Local Boards). Two-fold mode of audit of the accounts of local boards, the audit by borough auditors being very deficient, Taylor 502, 503.

See also Hampshire, 1. Lancaster. Leeds. Macclesfield. Middlesex, 10. Reading.

Avery, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As mayor of Birmingham, as overseer of the poor, and in other capacities, has had much experience in the matter of rates, 5617–5620——Exercise by the Birmingham town council, under Local Act, of the duties of the local board of health, 5621–5624——Particulars relative to the borough rate, improvement rate, and other rates levied by the town council, and the mode in which collected, 5625–5648. 5657–5660——Large exemptions from the improvement rate in the case of railways, &c., 5635–5640.

Conclusion as to the great injustice involved in the rating of railways in Birmingham and elsewhere, and in the exemptions enjoyed by the companies; details in support of this view, 5636. 5687–5693. 5728, 5729. 5754. 5777–5786——Extensive system of compounding at Birmingham in respect both of the improvement rate and the poor rate; varying deduction allowed in each case, 5649–5654——Anomaly and inconvenience in there being four different valuations in operation in the borough; suggestions for the adoption of one valuation for all purposes, 5654–5656. 5694–5698. 5759–5769.

Contribution by the borough to the county rate, the amount being comparatively small, 5659–5663——Explanations and suggestions on the subject of the representation of owners and leaseholders, and of occupiers, in the administration of the rates at Birmingham, 5664–5671. 5684–5686. 5721–5727. 5730–5732——Grounds for the conclusion that in Birmingham and in towns generally the rates are really paid by the owner and leaseholder, save that during leases or contracts any increase of rates falls upon the occupier, until there is a re-adjustment of rent, 5672–5683. 5706–5708. 5715–5720. 5741–5749.

Approval of owners being directly represented in the administration if they are directly rated; very good representation of the principal interests at present, 5684–5686. 5709–5717. 5755, 5756. 5770–5776——Advantage of two separate systems of collection of rates in Birmingham, one for parochial and the other for municipal purposes; doubt as to the expediency of but one collection, 5695–5705. 5757. 5787, 5788——Average of 1 s. 3 d. in the pound as the amount of the borough rate in Birmingham, the poor rate being now 3 s. 3 d. in the pound, 5733–5737.

Doubt as to its being feasible to collect the rates by requiring the ratepayers to bring the money to an office, 5738–5740——Injustice of the owner and leaseholder not contributing to improvement rates; witness contends that they do contribute, 5741–5749——Non-objection to a division of rates, and to collection from the owners, on the principle of the income tax, provided existing contracts be not interfered with, 5750–5753.

Approval of all persons in the borough of Birmingham contributing according to their valuation to improvement rates and to poor rates, 5759–5769——Suggested diminution in the number of guardians at Birmingham, it being desirable also to lessen the area of election, 5772–5774.

B.

Baxter, Robert Dudley. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has devoted much attention to the subject of rates and their incidence, 5789, 5790—— Belief of owners and occupiers that each pays the rates, 5791. 5800. 5865——Exception taken to the evidence of surveyors and valuers as to the rates being always paid ultimately by the owners, 5791–5793—— Determination of the rent mainly by the custom of the place and by local supply and demand, the rates not being inquired into by the generality of occupiers, 5793–5809. 5874. 5875. 5892–5894. 5908–5914——Conclusion that the rates fall on both owner and occupier, 5801 et seq.

Statement to the effect that as regards houses the rates fall more upon the occupiers than upon the ground landlords or building owners; concurrence of Adam Smith, McCulloch, and Mill in this doctrine, 5810–5830. 5908–5914——Very slight extent to which ground rents are affected by the rates, whilst they escape all increase of rates during the terms of the leases, 5810. 5820–5823——Tendency of increased rates to deter capital from building improvements, 5824–5828. 6008, 6009.

Incidence of the rates more upon the owner than the occupier in the case of land and farms; views of Adam Smith, McCulloch, and Mill on this point, 5829–5862——Objection by occupiers to a division of rates as leading to a revision of rents; expected increase of the latter beyond the amount of rates thrown on the owners, 5848–5860. 5863, 5864. 5867. 5937. 5993–5996——Hardship upon occupiers in their bearing all the increase of rates, 5865. 5941. 5985.

Proposition that as regards land all new or increased rates should fall upon the owner up to half the amount of the total rates for the time being; opinion that there would be no great hardship in applying this rule to existing contracts, 5866–5877. 5895–5907. 5938–5946. 5969–5975. 5982–5980. 5992. 6010.

Necessity, if part of the rates be imposed on owners, of enacting that the occupier must not contract to pay all the rates, 5871. 5878, 5879——Illustration of the expediency of shifting portion of the burden of increased rates in the metropolis from the occupiers to the ground landlords, 5871–5875. 5895–5897—— Statement in favour of owners being registered in the same way as occupiers, and being fully represented in the administration, if they pay a portion of the rates, 5880–5884. 5959–5968.

Similar incidence of tithes and of rates, both being a charge upon the land, 5885–5891—— Effect of a division of rates in leading to a general increase of charge, inasmuch as it would be argued that the maximum of taxation had not been reached, whilst the administration would be less economical than if the occupiers paid the whole, 5897–5900. 5958. 5978–5981. 5997. 6019–6025——Mention of the sewer's rate, as a rate in which the landlord or owner should share, 5901–5903. 5986——Fairness in the landlord contributing to the education rate, 5904–5907.

Convenience in collecting the rates from the owners where the property is small, whilst it is more convenient that the occupier should pay where the houses are large, 5915—— Similar principle to be followed in placing half the poor rate upon the owner, as in formerly placing the income tax upon him, 5916, 5917——Way in which the rates tend to prevent expenditure by occupiers in improvements; difficulty of obviating this evil, 5923–5936. 5998–6009——Operation of the proposed division of rates in the event of the rates being reduced instead of increased; difficulty in the case of leases, 5947–5951.

Contemplated levying of the rates from the landlord in the same way that the income tax is levied; doubt whether they should be deducted from mortgages, 5952–5957. 6012, 6013. 6030, 6031——Liability of the owner for the land tax, though the occupier often pays it by agreement, 5976, 5977——Approval of the whole of the county rate being put upon the owner, 5987–5989.

Further statement in favour of ground rents being charged with a portion of certain rates; machinery by which this might be effected, 6010–6013. 6030–6037——Obstacle to a classification of rates with reference to the question of deduction from the owners, 6014–6018——Circumstance of rates having been originally levied upon occupiers, who in ancient times were for the most part owners, and occupied their own houses and land, 6037–6039.

Beloe, Henry Christie. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is member of the town council of Liverpool, and is chairman of the water committee; has studied the subject of local taxation, 2792–2797——Submits sundry particulars relative to the water supply of Liverpool, as administered by the town council, more especially as regards a 6*d.* rate in aid, one half of which is deducted by the occupier from the owner; strong approval of the incidence of this charge upon the owners or landlords, 2797–2835. 2915–2919. 2967, 2968——Exceptional instances of landlords exacting their share of the water rate from their tenants, 2809, 2810. 2820, 2821.

System

System in Liverpool by which the landlords pay the rates on all small property, a considerable discount being allowed them; the rents are not raised in consequence of this arrangement, 2811. 2853. 2943–2951. 2959–2961 — Full representation of owners at the town council, 2812–2816.

Information relative to the Liverpool Improvement Bill of 1867, and the decision of the town council, by the casting vote of the mayor, to abandon the clause providing that the improvement rate should be divided between landlord and tenant; evidence adverse to such decision, 2824. 2836–2848. 2925–2927. 2973–2975. 3012 et seq.

Dissent from the view that landlords are able to impose any increase of rates upon their tenants; practice at Liverpool of reducing the rents when the rates are high, 2840–2844. 2849. 2843. 2955——Immense expenditure upon public works, parks, and other improvements at Liverpool, witness contending that the improvement rates for these purposes add largely to the value of owners' property, and should be partly borne by owners, 2845–2848. 2925–2927. 2954. 2973–2975. 2980, 2981. 3012 et seq.——Statement as to local taxation pressing very heavily upon trades and professions in which the profits are small, whilst merchants who make great profits sometimes escape almost entirely, 2849–2852. 2938–2941. 2969–2971.

Explanation relative to the sewer rate at Liverpool, it being divided between the landlord and tenant, 2854–2856. 3005–3007——Definition of the owner in the Liverpool Act of 1862 as the person receiving the rack-rent, 2857, 2858. 3053–3055——Statement as to there being no ground rents at Liverpool; way in which the land is chiefly held, 2859–2861——Separate accounts of the town council, and of the several committees of the council, there being a careful audit, 2862. 2869–2871.

Charge of the paving and lighting rates entirely upon the occupier, 2863, 2864——Considerable expenditure in sanitary matters; nature of the control over such expenditure, 2865–2867. 2976——Absence of any borough rate, the corporation possessing large property, 2868——Large sum received by the corporation in respect of the transfer of the light dues, 2872–2874——Several purposes for which the general rate of 5*d.*, levied by the local board of health, is used, 2877, 2878——Twofold sources whence the police are paid, 2879. 2881.

Enumeration of the several rates levied in the borough, together with the amount of each rate in the pound, and the mode of administration, assessment, &c., in each case, 2880. 2882. 2982–3007——Several committees by which the different rates are administered, 2883——Particulars as to the areas or districts over which the rates are levied, the parish having a different area from the borough, and there being some exemptions, 2884–2893. 2899, 2900. 2964, 2965 ——Collection of all the municipal rates at the same time, there being separate collectors for the vestry, 2894–2898.

Information relative to the borough expenditure for lunatics; contribution by Liverpool of one-third of the expense of a new asylum being erected by the county, 2901–2914——Limited representation of the borough in the matter of the carrying out of the new asylum, 2903. 2920–2924——Approval of the division of local rates generally between owner and occupier, an amended representation of owners at local boards being in such case desirable, 2925–2934. 3012 et seq.

Advantage, in some instances, of bringing town and country districts under one board for administration, 2935–2937—— Expediency of levying local rates on the principle of an income or property tax, 2941, 2942——Reference to some land of Lord Sefton, at Liverpool, which will soon be built upon; incidence of the rates in this case, 2956, 2957. 3008–3011. 3067–3074——Probable check to excessive outlay on improvements, if half the rates were paid by the owners, 2977–2979.

Examination as to the mode in which the owner or landlord should be determined in the case of ground rents, leases, mortgages, &c., with a view to a division of the rates, 3012 et seq.——Practice in the United States of levying improvement rates in the particular districts benefited, 3075–3077.

Birmingham. Exercise by the Birmingham town council, under Local Act, of the duties of the local board of health, Avery 5621–5624——Particulars relative to the borough rate, improvement rate, and other rates levied by the town council, and the mode in which collected, ib. 5625–5648. 5657–5660——Large exemptions from the improvement rate in the case of railways, &c., ib. 5635–5640.

Extensive system of compounding at Birmingham, in respect both of the improvement rate and the poor rate; varying deduction allowed in each case, Avery 5649–5654——Anomaly and inconvenience in there being four different valuations in operation in the borough; suggestions for the adoption of one valuation for all purposes, ib. 5654–5656. 5694–5698. 5759–5769——Contribution by the borough to the county rate, the amount being comparatively small, ib. 5659–5663.

Explanations and suggestions on the subject of the representation of owners and leaseholders, and of occupiers, in the administration of the rates at Birmingham, Avery 5664–5671.

5664-5671. 5684-5686. 5721-5727. 5730-5732——The value for assessment purposes should be arrived at by a valuation board appointed by the town council and by the parishes, Avery 5669. 5759——Objection to the borough rate being collected through the municipal authorities, ib. 5704, 5705.

Average of 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound as the amount of the borough rate in Birmingham, the poor rate being now 3*s.* 3*d.* in the pound, Avery 5733-5737——Approval of all persons in the borough contributing, according to their valuation, to improvement rates and to poor rates, ib. 5759-5769——Suggested diminution in the number of guardians, it being desirable also to lessen the area of election, ib. 5772-5774.

Borough Rates. See Birmingham. Lancaster. Leeds. Liverpool. Macclesfield. Reading.

Bridges (Counties). Expediency of some more uniform system in the selection of county bridges, Read 1398-1400——Proposed distinction between different kinds of bridges as regards the area of charge and of administration, ib. 1631-1637.

See also Hampshire, 2.

Britford (Wilts). Particulars relative to the increase of rates, to the extent of 24 per cent., in the parish of Britford, in Alderbury Union, between 1847 and 1868, Squarey 3116-3128. 3254, 3255. 3264-3276. 3301-3307.

Building Operations. Argument that the incidence or division of the rates, as between owner and occupier, has no effect upon the building of new houses, though the amount of the rates has doubtless an effect, Fry 228-250——Tendency of very high rates, as in the east end of London, to check building operations, Hunt 798-814——Increase in the value of land in the metropolis, as used for building sites, Sir S. H. Waterlow 3398-3403.

Exceptional circumstances under which, the ground rent being very low and the local taxation very high, the latter would fall upon the building owner, and would interfere with building operations, Hunt 4438-4445. 4455-4476. 4484-4501——Tendency of increased rates to deter capital from building improvements, Baxter 5824-5828. 6008, 6009.

Burial Rates. Information supplied by Mr. Fry relative to the burial board rate, the county burial rate, and the borough burial rate, App. 295. 298. 300.

C.

Caird, James, C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had large experience as an agriculturist in England and Scotland, and is conversant with the subject of local taxation, 4127-4130——Payment of half the poor rate in Scotland by the owner, and of half by the occupier, each moiety being collected separately, 4131-4133. 4334-4336——Division between owners and occupiers in Scotland of the charge for the repair of the roads; satisfactory working of the arrangements on this score, 4134, 4135. 4146. 4149——Practice as to payment by the tenants in Scotland towards the parish schoolmaster's salary, 4136-4145. 4330. 4332, 4333.

Satisfaction of owners in Scotland with the arrangements whereby they pay a portion of the rates, 4150, 5151——Statement to the effect that the rates on land are considered in the rent, but that the latter is mainly fixed by the amount of competition for farms, and that any increase of rates during a lease or tenancy falls upon the occupier, 4152-4187. 4314-4320——Conclusion favourable to the owner in England paying a moiety of the local rates, on the ground chiefly that they would take an active and economical interest in the administration, as in Scotland, 4188 et seq.

Advantage of occupiers sharing in the poor rate and highway rate, and taking part in the administration, 4194-4202. 4217-4226. 4271-4273——Difficulty in the case of leases and existing contracts as regards the transfer of a portion of the rates to the owner; unfairness of such transfer, unless there be some means of readjustment of the rent, 4203-4216. 4248-4251. 4281, 4282. 4289-4298——Lower rents in England than in Scotland; undue competition for land in the latter country adverted to as partly explaining this difference, 4206-4208. 4252-4270. 4308-4320. 4323-4329. 4367, 4368.

Expediency of a fair representation of owners as well as occupiers in the administration of the poor rate and highway rate in England if these be divided, 4217-4226. 4283——Very little antagonism between owners and occupiers in Scotland in the administration tion of the rates, 4227-4229. 4331——Expediency of a moiety of permanent improvement rates falling upon the owners, 4227-4231——Good effect in Ireland, as well as in Scotland, of the division of rates between owner and occupier, 4232-4236.

Doubt as to the application of capital to land being discouraged or prevented by the pressure of local taxation, 4237-4239. 4274-4280. 4346, 4347——Advantage of improved agricultural machinery, and of portable manures, in enabling farmers to raise increased produce at comparatively less cost, 4240-4246——Approval of a division of the proposed education rate between landlord and tenant, 4247——Payment of all the rates by landowners in Scotland, except half the poor rate and a proportion of the highway rate, 4284-4288. 4322.

Careful inquiry into the amount of rates before farms are taken by tenants, 4299-4303——Influence exercised by owners, or their factors, at local boards, when several parishes belong to one owner, 4304-4307. 4339——Probable advantage in dividing the county rate between owner and occupier in England, though in Scotland it is all paid by the landlord, 4321, 4322.

Satisfactory operation in Scotland of the system of a separate collection of the poor rate from owners and from occupier, 4334-4338——Varying system in Scotland as to the repairs of the roads and their management, 4340-4344——Annual assessment of land in Scotland with reference to the actual rent, so that expenditure by a tenant in improvements does not at once subject him to increased rates; different practice as to revaluation in England, 4345-4353. 4391-4395.

Explanation as to the abolition of rating in Scotland, according to means and substance, and as to the amended system now in operation, 4354-4361——Effect of a division of the rates in causing landlords to protect themselves in the rent, the latter however being mainly governed by competition, 4361-4365——Opinion as to a profit of 10 per cent. being a fair profit for a farmer to make on his capital, 4369-4382——Doubt as to the rates preventing the reclamation and improvement of land, 4383-4389.

City of London. Mention of the several rates levied in the City, the total as paid by witness averaging about 4 s. in the pound, Innes 5005 —— Statement to the effect that there might in justice be a division of the City consolidated rate, the main drainage rate, and the poor rate, between landlord and tenant, ib. 5014-5026. 5121-5124——Large increase of assessments in the City in recent years, the value of property having enormously increased, ib. 5032-5040. 5113-5120. 5216-5220.

Very little opportunity of owners in the City to take an active interest in the administration of the rates; illustration of this, Innes 5043-5064. 5146. 5153. 5162, 5163—— Improvement if the City were not excluded from the General Vestry Act, and if there were plurality of voting, ib. 5043-5048. 5147, 5148——Expediency of owners paying a portion of some of the rates, and being duly represented in the administration, ib. 5049 et seq. 5144-5148. 5162-5174. 5209, 5210——Explanation of the practice as to assessment, and the deduction made from the rent, ib. 5154-5160.

See also Dwellings of the Lower Classes. Offices.

Classification of Rates. Advantage of a classification of the poor rates and other rates in order that it may be clearly seen how the money is applied, Read 1442, 1443. 1496—— Obstacle to a classification of rates with reference to the question of deduction from the owners, Baxter 6014-6018.

Clergy, the. Opinion that the clergy in the country are not rated too highly as compared with the farmers, Squarey 3259, 3260. 3316-3322.

Clerks of the Peace. See Hampshire, 3.

Cochran, Francis James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As a collector of county rates in Aberdeenshire, and in other capacities, has had large experience in the matter of local taxation, 265-269——Enumeration of rates or assessments comprised in the county rates for Aberdeenshire, all, with two exceptions, being leviable over the whole area of the county, 270-273. 279—— Particulars relative to the road assessments, four in number; area over which assessed, 273, 274——Payment of the rate in all cases by the owner, who in two instances has power to recover half from the tenant, 275-278.

Great facility with which the county rates are collected by witness from the owners, 281-288—— Power of recovery from the tenant, in the event of default of the landlord, the former being entitled to deduct the amount from the rent, 288-290——Much greater convenience in collecting from the owners than from the tenants, 291-293——Management of the county rates, save the road assessments, by the Commissioners of Supply; constitution of this body, which consists almost entirely of owners, 294-305——Particulars relative to the administration of the several road assessments, the tenants having a voice only as regards maintenance, 306-313.
